and offend the enemy. Neither had they sustained and held out the first shout, charge and shock of the Romans (as having now for certain years past been used ever more to go away defeated and vanquished) but that a mightier fear imprinted and settled in their heart roots, held them perforce from running away: for they ever had continually represented in their eye, the whole furniture of that secret sacrifice; of those armed sacrificers and Priests with naked swords; of that hideous butchery of men and of brute beasts, lying slain one with another in their blood intermingled together; of the Altars besprinkled and stained with the lawful shedding of the one; and the detestable effusion of the other; of the dreadful and horrible execrations; and to conclude, of that frantick, furious, and detestable form of words, composed and devised to the detestation and malediction of their line and race. Being fast bound, I say, with these bonds for fleeing away, they stood to it, and stirred not back, fearing their own countrymen more than the enemies. The Romans from both points, and from the middle and main battailon charged hotly, beat them down, killed and cut them in pieces, thus amazed and astonished as they were with dread of gods and awe of man. Small resistance made they, as who only feared to flee and run away: so as by this time, there was execution and havock made of them almost to the very Standards. At which very instant, there appeared overthwart from the one side a dust, as if a mighty army had raised it to their march; namely, Sp. Nautius (or as some say, Octavius Metius) who had the leading of certain Cohorts called Aleria, mounted upon Mules; which on purpose made a dust greater, then for that number they were. For those varlets and new horsemen, as they sat on their Mules and Sumpter-beasts, drew after them trailing on the ground, boughs of trees full of branches and leaves: and first, there appeared in the fore-front (as it were, through a dusky and dim light) their armour and guidons: but the dust behind them, rising higher and thicker, made shew of a troop of horsemen flanked an army of footmen: wherewith not only the Samnites but Romans also were deceived. And the Consul himself, to avow the error and bear them down it was so; cried aloud amongst the foremost Ensigns, so as his voice reached unto his enemies, That Cominium was won, and his Brother Consul was come with victory; and therefore, they should endeavour and enforce themselves to get the day, before that another army should win the honour out of their hands. Thus cried he out on horseback galloping among the ranks to and fro. Then he commanded the Colonels and Centurions, to make a way for the men of arms. Himself afore, had willed Trebonius and Ceditius, that when they espied him to bear his spear upright and to shake it, then they should with all the might they had, put forth the Cavalry and charge the enemies. Every thing was done at a beck, according as they were directed and instructed before-hand. The wayes were made wide between the files. The horsemen sling out, and with spear in rest charge upon the middle battailon of the enemies, and brake their arrayes wheresoever they charged. Volumnius and Scipio seconded them with the Infantry: and while they were disarrayed overthrew them, and bare them to the ground. Down went these linnen Cohorts now, when God and man fought against them, and were discomfited: and as well those that took the oath, and the other that were unsworn, fled again; and without respect of one thing or other, feared none but their enemies. All the footmen that escaped the batle, were beaten into their camp at Aquilonia. The Gentlemen and the men of arms fled toward Bovianum. The Cavalry of the Romans pursued the horsemen; and the Infantry chased the footmen. The wings took divers ways, the right toward the camp of the Samnites, the left unto the Town. Volumnius was somewhat before, and got the Camp. Scipio found more resistance in the City: not for that vanquished men, as they were, had more courage and resolution, but because that walls are stronger to endure an assault, and better to keep out armed men, then a plain trench and rampart. For, from the Courtine, with stones they beat and repulsed the enemy. Scipio foreseeing well enough that they should be longer about the assault of a strong and fenced town, unless he dispatched the matter quickly and went through with it, in their first affright and confusion, before they took heart again: demanded of his souldiers, If they could take it well, and abide to see the camp won by the other point, of the batle, and themselves (being likewise Conquerors) to be repelled from the City Gates? When they all cried, No; and said they would never endure that disgrace: himself with his target over his head, approached the gate, the others following after under a target-sense, rush into the City, thrust down the Samnites about the Gate, and gat to the Walls: but to engage themselves farther into the City, they durst not, being so few as they were. The Consul himself at the first knew nothing of all this, but was occupied about the retreat, and rallying of his men: for now the sun was well neer down, and the night coming on apace, caused every thing even to the very victors to seem dangerous and suspicious. But when he was advanced farther, he saw on the right hand the camp taken: and on the left, he heard a confused cry and tumult in the City, compounded of the noise of fighting men, and frighted persons: and even at that instant, it fortuned, that they skirmished at the gate. Then he rode on, neerer and neerer, and saw his own men upon the Walls, howbeit nothing yet fully performed; but through the rash adventure and fool-hardiness of some few, an overture only made, and some advantage got of performing a great piece of service and worthy exploit. Whereupon, he commanded the forces that were retired, to be called, and with banner displayed to enter the City. So soon as they were in, they took the next quarter to the Gate, and for that the night approached, there they rested, and went no farther. But even in that very night, the enemies abandoned the Town.

There

A There were slain that day before Aquilonia 3634^o Samnits, and 3870 taken prisoners: and of field ensigns they went away with 90. Moreover, this is reported and recorded of Papyrius, that there had not been lightly seen a General in any battel more lightsome, chearfull, and merry; were it of his own natural disposition, or upon assured confidence of victory. Upon which courage and resolution, he could not be revoked from battel, albeit there was some question and scruple about the Auspice: and even in the hottest time, and dangerous point of the conflict, at what time as the manner is to vow temples to the immortal gods: he vowed unto Jupiter Victor, if so be that he defeated the Legions of the enemies, to present him with a cup of a sweet and pleasing mead, before he drank any strong and heady wine of the grape: which vow the gods accepted and blessed of, and turned the ill presage of the Auspices to good.

B The other Consull had as good speed at Cominium: For at the break of day he approached with all his forces to the wals of the town, and invested it round about: and set strong guards at the gates, for fear they should issue or sally forth. And even as he was about to give the signall of assault, there came a messenger post from his fellow Consull, who in great affright brought word of the coming of twenty cohorts to the succour of them within the City: which both kept him short from giving the assault, and caused him to call back again part of his forces, which were arranged and ready under the counterescarp to assail the defendants. Then he gave charge to Decius Brutus Serrus, one of the Lieutenants, to take the first legion and twenty cohorts of the wings, and other horsemen, to make head against the rescue of the enemies aforesaid: and wheresoever he met them, there to impeach them, yea, and if occasion served, to give them battel: and in no case to suffer that power to come to Cominium. Himself commanded that ladders should be reared on every side of the town, and under a fence of targets approached the gates. So that in an instant the gates were burst open, and the wals scaled on every part. The Samnits, as their hearts served them well enough to keep the enemies from entrance, before they saw any armed men upon the wals: so, after they perceived, that they were assailed not aloof with stones and darts, but fast by and with hand-strokes: and how that they, who hardly and with great difficulty from the plain gat up the wals, having now gained and surmounted the place (which they most feared before) could fight at ease from aloft with their enemy, who was not able to match them in the even ground: quit their towers and wals, and gathered all together in the market place, and there for a while tried the utmost hazard of battel. But afterwards throwing down their weapons, 15400^o of them yielded themselves to the Consull his mercy. There were slain 4380. Thus went the game at Cominium, and thus at Aquilonia.

C In the mid way between these two Cities, where a third battel was looked for, the enemies were not to be found. And when they were seven miles off from Cominium, they had a countermand from their own country-men, and were called away, and so came not to the rescue, neither in the one battell nor the other. In the shutting in of the evening, when it began to be dark, being within the sight of the Camp of one hand, and Aquilonia on the other: they might hear a like noise and cry from both parts, which caused them to pause. But afterwards, when they were over-against the Camp which was fired by the Romans: the flame spreading far abroad declared the defeat of the Samnits more evidently, and staied them there for going farther. In which very place they laid down here and there in their armour (as they were) and passed a restless and unquiet long night, expecting (and yet fearing) the light of the day. At the dawning whereof, and so soon as it began to peep, while they were uncertain and doubtfull what way to take, they hapned to be discovered by the cavalry of the enemies: and suddenly in a fearful amaze and affright, they took them to their heels and fled in great disorder. Those horsemen having pursued the Samnits, who in the night season escaped out of the town, chanced to espy this foresaid multitude, and perceived they were neither entrenched, nor defended with a good corps de guard. This company was descried also even from the wals of Aquilonia: whereupon, by this time the legionary footmen likewise made after them; but they could not overtake them in the chase, so fast they fled: howbeit the horsemen cut off some, and slew two hundred and fourscore in the tail of the rearguard. In this affright they left much armour behind them, and eighteen ensigns, and so the rest of the army saved themselves, and as well as they might in so fearfull confusion, recovered Bovianum. The joy of these two Romans armies was wonderfully encreased, to see one another have so good and fortunate success in their enterprises. Both the Consuls, by each others advice and consent, gave their towns thus won unto the souldiers to be sacked and rifled: and after the goods were out, to set fire on the empty houses; in such wise, that in one and the same day both Aquilonia and Cominium were burnt to ashes: and the Consuls, with mutuall congratulation and joy, as well between their Legions as themselves, feasting one another joyned both their Camps in one. Afterwards in the sight of both Armies, Carvilius highly commended and praised his souldiers every one as he deserved, and rewarded them with gifts accordingly. Papyrius also for his part, who had performed many and sundry skirmishes as well in the field and battel: as about the winning of the Camp and forcing the City, bestowed by way of honour upon Sp. Nautius and Sp. Papyrius his brothers son, as also upon four Centurions and the band of the Hastati or Javelineers, bracelets and coronets of gold: and namely, Nautius for that he bare himself so worthily in that journey and expedition, wherein with his counterfeit troop of horsemen upon Mules, he so terrified the enemy, as if he had conducted a main army of men at armes: and young Papyrius for his good service with his cavalry as well in the battel and con-

fleet, as also in that night, wherein he forced the Samnites to flee secretly, and quit the City Aquilonia: the Centurions and souldiers, in this regard, that they were the first who seized the gates and walls of that town: as for all the horsemen, in consideration of their manifold travells, and brave exploits shewed in sundry places, he gave them bracelets and little horns of silver. This done, forasmuch as it was time now to withdraw their army from out of Samnium, either both twain, or one of them alone, they sate in Council and consultation thereupon: and thought it was the better course (to the end that the Samnites might be brought lower, and their state more sensibly decayed) to go forward still, and charge them with greater force and resolution, and to pursue the rest that was behind: that Samnium might be delivered up to the Consuls their successors, utterly tamed and subdued: since that the enemies now had no army abroad in field, like either to give or abide another battell: and there remained but one manner of making war, even to besiege and assault their Cities and strong Towns: by the winning and subversion whereof, they might with the pillage enrich and make their own souldiers for ever, and withall impoverish their enemies, and make a hand of them quite, being now at the last cast forced to fight for Church and Home. Hereupon the Consuls dispatched their letters to the Senat and people of Rome, containing the effect at large of all their exploits: and then divided themselves, and took two severall waies: Papirius marched with his legions to the siege of Sepinum; and Carvilius with his to besiege Volana.

The Consuls letters were read and heard with exceeding joy, as well in the court of the Council of the City, as in the Common Hall of assemblies; and this publike contentment and rejoicing was solemnized with generall processions, for the space of four daies, and with marvellous zeal, affection, and devotion of private persons in particular. And to say a truth, this victory was to the state of Rome not only great and honourable, but also of great consequence, in regard that it fell out in so good and commodious a time. For even then, news came, that Tuscany was revolted and rebelled, and men began to cast in their minds, and discourse how they should do (in case ought should hap but well in Samnium) to withstand the forces and invasions of the Tuscans: who taking heart, and presuming upon the Samnites, and their cursed and execrable oath, by vertue whereof they were obliged to fight to the utmost extremity, embraced the occasion and opportunity of taking armes again, whiles both the Consuls and the whole forces of Rome were diverted and withdrawn into Samnium, and there employed. The Embassadors of their allies and confederats, were by M. Attilius the Prætor brought into the Senat, and had audience given them: where they complained, that their Territories were over-run, burnt, and spoiled, by the Tuscans their next neighbours; and all because they were unwilling to revolt from the people of Rome: humbly beseeching the LL. of the Senat, to defend and protect them against the violence, wrong, and outrage of common enemies. Answer was returned unto the Embassadors: That the Senat would have regard, that their allies should have no cause to repent of their faithful allegiance, and constant loyalty; and that ere many daies went over their heads, the Tuscans should taste of the same cup that the Samnites had begun unto them. Howbeit, they would have been slack and cold enough in dealing with the Tuscans, had not fresh news come, that the Falisci also, who had for many years continued in amity and friendship with the people of Rome, were combined with the Tuscans, and entred into arms, as well as they. The near neighbourhood of this nation, gave an edge to the Senators, and whet them on, to take care and ordain, that their Feiall Heralds should be addressed thither to demand restitution and amends for harms done: which being denied, and no goods restored; by the advice and authority of the Senat, together with the grant of the people, war was proclaimed against the Tuscans: and the Consuls were commanded to cast lots, whether of them should paise out of Samnium with his forces, into Tuscany.

By this time now Carvilius had won Volana, Palumbinum, and Herculanum, towns appertaining to the Samnites. Volana was forced within few daies: Palumbinum, the same day that he came before the walls: but at Herculanum, he fought two severall battels, with doubtfull and uncertain issue, yea, and with more loss of his own part than of the enemies. But afterwards, he pitched his camp before the town, beleaguered the enemies, and kept them within their walls, gave the assault, and won it in the end. In these three towns there were either taken prisoners or slain in all, to the number of ten thousand: but so, as through fear the greater part by far, suffered themselves to be captives, rather then to dye on the edge of the sword.

The Consuls cast lots for their Provinces; and it fell unto Carvilius to go into Tuscany, as the souldiers wished and desired, who could no longer away with the rigour of cold weather in Samnium. As for Papirius, he found a greater power of enemies, and more resistance, before Sepinum. Many a time he was fought withall in battell arranged: oft skirmished with in his march: yea, and oftentimes under the very walls, the enemies sallied out against him from the Town, in such sort, as he could not tell what to make of it: for neither was it to be called properly a siege alone, nor yet altogether a battell fight: considering that the enemies were no more protected and covered themselves, by the strength of their walls: than the walls were defended by force of arms, and men of war: howbeit in the end, what with fighting and what with skirmishing, he lodged them within the City, so as they durst come abroad no more, but kept themselves close, and were besieged indeed: and after long siege, as well with forcible assaults, as by trenches, bastils, and rampiers, he was master of the town: and therefore after he was possessed of it, upon anger and choler

A choler that they had so long stood out and put him to so much trouble, that there was more blood-shed; and seven thousand died by the sword, whereas under three thousand were taken prisoners. The spoil and pillage, which was exceeding great, considering that the Samnites had laid up all their gods in some few Cities, was given to the souldiers. And now lay the snow thick all over upon the ground: neither could men endure abroad in the field without house and harbor: and thereupon the Consul retired his Army out of Samnium. Against his coming to Rome, it was decreed by the general voice of all men, that he should triumph: and so he triumphed whilst he was in his Magistracy, with great magnificence, and sumptuous pomp, as those daies would afford. For as well his footmen as horsemen marched and passed by in a shew, adorned with their gift and prizes of honour. Many a civick, vallare and minale garland was seen worn that day. Much looking and wondring there was at the spoils also of the Samnites armour and apparel: for with their goodly beauty and glorious hue were they comparable to those that his father had won before him, which were commonly seen, and well known in the publike places of the City, adorned and beautified therewith. Moreover, there were led before him in this triumph and pompous entrance of his into the City, certain captives and prisoners of noble blood defended, men of great worth sometime, and name, as well for their own deeds, as their fathers acts. Great store of Brasse Bullion in Ingots, and not coined, was carried in shew, amounting to the weight of 1200533 pound: which mass of brasse or copper was raised of the ransome of prisoners. But the silver which was got in the sackage of the towne came to 1330 pound weight and above. All the brasse and silver was laid up in the common Treasury of the City, and nothing at all of the whole booty given to the souldiers: and the discontentment and heart-burning that grew thereby, was so much the greater in the common people, by reason they were charged besides with an exaction and contribution for souldiers pay: whereas if the Consul had not upon a vain-glorious humour brought into the City-Chamber, such sums which he had gained from the enemy there might a good portion thereof have been bestowed freely amongst the souldiers, & of the surplussage their due wages paid and dispatched. Moreover, whilst he was Consul, he dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which his father, being Dictator, had vowed: for, that himself vowed it in the very time of the battell. I find not in any ancient writer; and certainly in so short a space, he could not possibly have built and finished it. He trimmed it besides, and garnished it with the spoils of the enemies, whereof there was such store and abundance, that not only the foresaid Temple and the market-place were therewith set out and bravely decked, but they were distributed abroad to their allies also and Coloners, near inhabitants, for the decoration and beautifying of their Churches and publike places. After the triumph ended, he brought his Army to winter in the Territory of the Veiins, because those quarters were distressed and annoied by the Samnites.

In this mean while, Corvilius the Consul, having at his first coming given the assault unto Troilum, a City in Tuscany, granted license to 470 of the richest Citizens, to depart from thence and by composition, to pay a great sum of money unto him. The rest of the multitude fell into his hands, after he had won the town by mere force. This done, he forced five Castles, situate in places of great strength: where were slain of enemies 2400, and not all out 2000 taken prisoners. He granted to the Falisci (who sued for peace) truce for one year, and yet to make present payment of 100000 Asse, and to discharge the souldiers wages for that year. After these exploits achieved, he departed to his triumph: which as it was less honourable and glorious than that of other of his companion in government, in regard of the service performed against the Samnites: so, if we consider withall, the Tuscan war, it was equal and comparable unto it every way. Of brasse money he brought into the common Chest 300000 pound: of the surplussage of the pillage and other spoils, he caused the Chappel of Fortuna to be built, near unto the Temple of the same goddess, dedicated by King Servius Tullus. To the souldiers that served on foot, he gave of his booty 100 Asse a piece, and twice as much to every Centurion and horseman. Which reward they accepted more thankfully at his hands, by reason of the nigardise and misery of his Colleague before him. And so gracious was this Consul, that he protected and saved L. Volturnus, one of his Lieutenants, against the people: who being arrested and called to his answer by M. Caninius, a Tribune of the Commons fled for his last help to his Lieutenantship (as they say) and avoided thereby the danger of their judgement: for that during his absence in that charge, his accusation might well be set on foot and followed, but brought to a final end and definitive sentence, it could not be.

After this year expired, the new Tribunes of the Commons entred their office: and for that there was supposed some error in their creation, the fifth day after were other chosen in their stead. The same year there was a Lustrum or solemn survey of the City, held by P. Cornelius Arvignus, and C. Marius Rutilius Censors. In which were numbered and assessed 262322 polls of Roman Citizens. There were in order the six and twentieth Censors from the beginning: and this was reckoned the nineteenth Lustrum after the first institution. In this year, and never before, the spectators of the Roman Games and Plaies, in regard of their happy success in wars, stood adorned with wreaths and garlands of flowers upon their heads: and then came up the fashion at Rome, borrowed from the manner and custome of Greece, to honour those with branches of the olive tree, who won the prizes, and were victors in those solemn Games.

The same year the Ediles Curule, who exhibited the said pastimes and exercises of Activity, paved paved the causey or high-way with flint or pibble stone, from the Temple of Mars unto Boville: H and the fines of certain Publicans or farmers of the City, that were gravers and condemned, paid the charges. Then Papyrius held the great Assembly for election of new Consuls, and created Q. Fabius Gurges the son of Maximus, and D. Junius Brutus Scaeva, Consuls. Papyrius himself was chosen Prætor. This year, so joious and fortunate in many respects, could hardly countervail and recompence with all other comforts, one only calamity, namely a pestilence and mortality, which consumed and devoured both town and country. In so much, as for the strangeness and extremity thereof, it was held for a prodigious and portentous sign beyond all course of nature, and reach of reason. Whereupon, the books of Sibylla were perused, to know out of them, what issue and remedy the gods would vouchsafe to shew of this malady and misery. Wherein they found, I that the Image of Æsculapius must be sent for, from as far as Epidaurus to Rome. But for that by year, reason that the Consuls were busied in the wars, nothing was done, but only one day bestowed wholly in supplications and devout Letanies, to the honour of the said god Æsculapius.

The ten Books next following of T. Livius (usually called the second Decade) are lost: The Arguments whereof remain yet extant in the Abridgments or Breviaries of L. Florus, which instead of the History it self, are set down in this place.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the Eleventh Book.

Vhen Fabius Gurges the Consul, had fought an unfortunate battell against the Samnites, and the Senate were about to discharge and remove him from his Army: Fabius Maximus his father, besought them for his sake, not to offer him that disgrace and dishonour. For rather than that should come to pass, he promised to serve in person under his son in quality of his Lieutenant. Which moved the Senate, and prevailed more than anything else. And he was his words master. For he went to the field, and by his means and good advice, the Consul his son was so well assisted, that he defeated the Samnites, triumphed over them, led captive before his triumphant Chariot C. Pontius, Lord General of the Samnites, and afterwards struck off his head. Whiles the City [of Rome] was pitiously visited and afflicted with the plague, there were certain Embassadors addressed and sent to Epidaurus, for to translate the Image of Æsculapius from thence to Rome. And instead thereof they brought away a great snake or serpent, which of it self embarked in their ship, and wherein they were verily persuaded, that the puissance and divine power of the said god was resident. And when they had conducted it with them by sea as far as to Rome, it went forth of its own accord, and swam to the Island within Tyberis, where it sailed: and in that very place where it took land, they erected a Temple to Æsculapius. L. Posthumius, a Consular man [i.e. who had been Consul] having the charge of an Army, was condemned, and had a round fine set upon his head, for that he employed his souldiers about some work in one of his farms. The League was now the fourth time renewed with the Samnites, at their earnest suit and request. Cn. Dentatus the Consul, after he had defeated and slain the Samnites, vanquished the Sabines, who were revolted and rebelled, and received them under his obedience, triumphed twice during the time of one Consulship. Three Colonies were erected, and peopled, to wit, Castrum, Sena, and Adria. The three Triumvirs to sit upon capital crimes were then first created. A sassing was holden, and a solemn Iustrium, wherein by just account were numbred 273000 Citizens of Romans. The Commons, because they were deeply engaged in debt, in regard of grievous and long seditions and dissensions, retired in the end to Janiculum, from whence they were reclaimed and brought again into the City, by the means of Q. Hortensius the Dictator, who died in the very time of his Magistracy. This book containeth moreover the exploits against the Volturnians, and also the Lucans, against whom it was thought good and ordained, to send aid and succours to the Tyrrhenians.

The

The Breviary of L. Florus to the twelfth Book.

THe Roman Embassadors being murdered by the Senonians in Gaul, and war thereupon denounced and proclaimed against them, Lucius Cæcilius the Prætor, furnished with his whole army to be defeated by them, and put to the sword. When the Roman fleet was spoiled and ransacked by the Tarentines, and their Admiral besides slain, the Senat dispatched their Embassadors unto them to make complaint of these wrongs and outrages; but they were evil intreated and sent away with great abuse. Whereupon, defiance was likewise given unto them, and war proclaimed. The Samnites revolted. Against whom together with the Lucians, Brutians, and Tuscans, sundry battels were fortunately fought by divers Roman Captains. Pyrrhus the King of the Epirots [or the Albanos] passed over into Italy, for to aid the Tarentines. When a Legion of the Campanians was sent under the conduct of Decius Jubellius to Rhegium, there to lie in garrison, they treacherously slew the naturall inhabitants, and seized the City of Rhegium to their own behoof.

Valerius Levinus the Consul lost the field against Pyrrhus: by occasion principally that his souldiers were terrified and amazed at the uncomon sight of the Elephants. After that battell, when Pyrrhus viewed and beheld the dead bodies of the Romans, lying slain on the ground; he observed and marked, that all their faces were turned toward the enemy affront. From thence he went forward spoiling and wasting all the way to Rome. C. Fabricius was sent unto him for to treat about the redemption and ransom of the prisoners: and was solicited by the King (but in vain) to abandon the service of his own country. The foresaid prisoners were enlarged and sent home without paying any ransom at all. Cynæas was sent as Embassador from the King unto the Senat; who required, that the King his Master, for to end and compound all quarrells, might be received into the City and amity of the people of Rome: but when it was thought meet to debate and consult of this important matter, in a more frequent assembly of the Senators, Appianus Claudius, who many a day had not intermeddled with the affairs of State and Council, presented himself in the Court among the Senators: where his opinion carried the matter clear away, and Pyrrhus his demand was flatly denied. P. Domitius, the first Censor of the Commoners, held a Lustrum or survey of the City, in which were found 278222 Roman Citizens by the poll. A second field was fought against Pyrrhus, but with doubtful event and issue. With the Carthaginians, the alliance was renewed now the fourth time. When a certain fugitive traitor that ran from Pyrrhus, offered to C. Fabricius the Consul for to poison the King, he was sent back again, and the treason was discovered to the King. Over and besides, this book containeth the prosperous affairs in war against the Tuscans, Lucanians, Brutians, and Samnites.

PYRRHUS passed the seas into Sicily. When among other prodigies and fearfull tokens, the image of Jupiter in the Capitoll was overthrowen and smitten down with lightning, the head thereof was recovered and found again by the soothsayers. Curius Dentatus, as he was taking maisters, sold in port-sale the goods of one that would not answer to his name when he was called. He defeated Pyrrhus after his return again out of Sicily into Italy; and forced him to avoid and depart once for all. Fabricius a Censor, casted and displaced out of his Senators room P. Cornelius Rufinus, one that had been Consul, for that he had in silver plate to the weight of ten pounds. There was a Lustrum holden by the Censors, and therein were found 271224 Citizens. A society and alliance was contracted with Ptolemy King of Egypt. Sextilia a professed vestall Nun was convicted of uncleanness and fornication, and buried quick. Two new Colonies were erected, to wit, Pofidonia and Cosa. A fleet of Carthaginians arrived to aid the Mæmærentins by occasion whereof the league was broken. This book compriseth also, the happy exploits against the Lucanians, Samnites, and Brutians: together with the death of King Pyrrhus.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the fifteenth Book.

THe Tarentins being vanquished hath peace granted, and liberty also restored unto them. The souldiers of the Campan legion aforesaid, which had possessed themselves of Rhegium, were besieged: and after they had absolutely yielded were every one made shorter by the head. Certain lusty youths of Rome, who had misused and beaten the Embassadors of the Apolloniats, sent unto the Senat, were delivered unto their hands to be used according to their discretion. The Picenes were overcome in battell, and obtained peace. Two Colonels were sent, the one to Ariminum within the marches of Picenum, (i.e. Ancona) the other to Beneventum, in Samnium. Now and never before began the Romans to use silver coin for their money. The Umbrians and Salentins were vanquished, and their submission of obedience received. The number of the Quæstors was augmented [to be eight.]

THe first rising of the Carthaginians, with the beginning of their City, are in this book related: Against whom together with Hiero King of the Syracusians, the Senat of Rome ordained to send aid unto the Mamertins: and after much arguing and debate about this point, whiles some perswaded, & others again dissuaded the gentlemen of Rome, who served on horseback, then first crossed the seas, and bare themselves bravely in many battels and to good purpose against Hiero: who at length craved peace, and had it granted. The Censors held a Lustrum and numbred the people: and enrolled* 372224 Citizens of Rome, into the subsidy book. D. Junius Brutus was the first that ever represented combats of sword-fencers at the sharp to the utterance, in the honour of his father late deceased. One Colony was planted at Aesernia. This book comprehendeth besides, the good success of the affairs against the Carthaginians and the Volscinians.

CNENS Cornelius the Consul, being surprised and environed with a fleet of Carthaginians, and under colour of a parley, trained forth and called unto them: was villanously taken prisoner and kept still with them. Cn. Duillius the Consul fought with happy success against this their foresaid fleet: and was the first Roman Captain that rode in triumph, for a naval victory at sea. In regard whereof this honour for ever after was done unto him, That when he supped forth in any place of the City, as he returned home to his own house, the Waits should sound, the hautboies all the way, and a man go before him with a burning torch. L. Cornelius the Consul won a field in Sardinia against the Islanders, together with the Corsicans, and Hanno the Generall of the Carthaginians. Attilius Calatinus the Consul, having unadvisedly engaged his army within a place of great disadvantage, whereas the Carthaginians lay round about in ambush, retired and escaped by the valour and industrious means of M. Calphurnius a Colonel: who with a regiment of 300 foot venturously sallied out, and turned all the forces of the enemies upon himself. One Annibal a Carthaginian Commander, upon the defeat of the Armado, whereof he was Admiral was by his own souldiers trussed up and crucified. Attilius Regulus the Consul, having in battell at sea vanquished the Carthaginians sailed over into Affrick.

ATtilius Regulus the Consul slew [in Affrick] a serpent of a mighty and wonderful bigness, but with the exceeding loss of his souldiers. And after many encounters and battels with the Carthaginians, when the Senat by reason of his so happy conduct and management of the wars, sent no other to succeed him, he dispatched his letters unto them and complained thereof: and among other pregnant reasons that he alledged for to have a successor to come unto him, this was one: That the little inheritance and living which he had suffered waste, by the default or lewdness of his bailiffs of husbandry. Meanwhiles, as if fortune had been disposed and sought means to shew a notable example in the person of this one man Regulus, as well of adversity as prosperity, he was overthrowen in plain field, and taken prisoner by Xan-Mthippus, a renowned Captain of the Lacedamonians, whom the Carthaginians had waged, and sent for to aid them. After this the sundry shipwracks of the Roman Navy, eclipsed, obscured, and disfigured all the other exploits that the Roman Captains had fortunately atchieved before, as well by land as sea. T. Coruncanus was the first High Priest or Arch-Prelate, created out of the body of the Commons. M. Sempronius Sophus and M. Valerius Maximus the Censors, when they made a review of the Senat, casted thirteen, and took their embroidered purple cloaks from them. They held a survey also of the whole City, and enired into their subsidy book 317217 Roman Citizens. Regulus being sent from the Carthaginians to the Senat of Rome, to treat a peaceable accord, or if he could not obtain so much, so deal about the exchange of prisoners one for another, bound himself by an oath to return again to Carthage, if he sped not for the exchange aforesaid. And being come to Rome, himself dissuaded both the one and the other: howbeit, to accomplish and perform his promise by oath given, he made return accordingly, and by the Carthaginians was despitefully put to cruell torture, and so died.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the nineteenth Book.

CAius Cecilius Metellus, in consideration of his fortunate conduct of the wars against the Carthaginians, rode in a most stately and magnificent triumph: wherein were shewed and led captive thirteen chief Captains of the enemies, and 120 Elephants. Claudius Pulcher the Consul, who managred the adverse presages of the Auspices, would needs hazard a battell, commanded the sacred Pullets to be doused and dripped over the head in the water, to see if they would drink, since they refused to eat their meat: and received an overthrow at sea, in a conflict with the Carthaginians. For which he was called home by the Senat, and commanded to nominate a Dictator: whereupon he declared C. Glaucia, a base companion, and a person of the meanest degree and quality: who being constrained to resign his Magistracy, yet notwithstanding afterwards beheld the games and plaies in his mantle of estate. Attilius Calatinus was the first Roman Dictator, that led an army out of Italy. An exchange was made of Roman captives for Carthaginians. Two Colonies were transported, namely, to Fregellæ, and to Brundisium, in the

- A the territory of the Salentins. Another Lustrum was taken by the Censors: wherein were reckoned of Roman Citizens 251 222. Claudia, the sister of that P. Claudius, who in contempt and despite of the Auspices fought a battle to great loss, fortun'd upon a time as she came from the great Plaies to be crowded in the thrust and press of people: whereupon she cried out with a loud voice, Would God my brother were alive again, and had the charge of another Armado: for which words she had a good fine set on her head, and paid it. Two Praetors were now created, the first that ever were at Rome. Cæcilius Metellus the High Priest kept perforce within the City. A. Posthumius the Consul, because he was besides the Flaminio Mars: and would not suffer him to be Non-resident, and absent himself from his charge. After sundry battels and conflicts that many Roman Captains had against the Carthaginians, C. Luctarius the Consul obtained the honour of the final victory, when he had defeated their Fleet: and so made a full end of the first Punick war. The Carthaginians therefore sued for peace, and had it granted. At what time as the Temple of Vesta was on a light fire, Cæcilius the High Priest recovered and saved out of the flame the holy reliques. Two Tribes were added to the rest, Velina and Quirina. The Falisci rebelled, & within six daies were subdued, and brought under subjection.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the twentieth Book.

- A Colony was planted at Spoletum. An army was led against the Ligurians [i.e. Genovais], which was the first time that they were warred upon. The Sardinians and the Corsians, who revolted and took arms were subdued. Tuccia a Vestal virgin and a Potary was condemned and executed for her incest or whoredoms. War was proclaimed against the Illyrians: for that they killed one of the Embassadors which were sent unto them, and being defeated, confessed themselves subjects to the Romans. The number of the Praetors was encreased from two to four. The Gauls inhabiting beyond the Alps (toward France) who came down and entred into Italy, were overthrowen and put to the sword. In which war the Romans had by report of the Latins and other confederats and allies, so the number of 300000 fighting men that served under them. The Roman forces passed then first over the river Padus [i.e. Po.] where the French Insubrians [i.e. Lombards] after certain discomfitures were glad to be ruled by reason, and rendred themselves. Mar. Claudius Marcellus the Consul, having slain Viridomarus the General of the Lombards with his own hand, went away with the honour of the third rich and royal spoiles got from the enemy.
- D The Istrians were subdued: so were the Illyrians also, after they had revolted and put themselves in arms: and were so tamed, that they came under obedience. The Censors held a Lustrum, and took account of the number of the Roman Citizens, and found in all 270000. The Liberins (or slaves enfranchised) were reduced into four tribes by themselves, to wit, Esquilina, Palatina, Suburrana, and Collina: whereas beforetime they had been dispersed indifferently, and mingled among the rest. C. Flaminius the Censor paved the high way called Flaminia, and built the great Cirque or Theater named Flaminius Circus. And two Colonies were established within those Territories that were conquered from the Gauls, to wit, * Placentia, and Cremona.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and twentieth Book.

- F In this book are rehearsed the acts which passed in Italy, as touching the second Punick war, and how Annibal, the Chief Commander of the Carthaginians, contrary to the accord of alliance, passed over the river Iberus: by whom Saguntum, a City belonging to the allies of the people of Rome, was in the eighth month of the siege forced by assault. For to complain of those wrongs and injuries Embassadors were sent to the Carthaginians. And for that they would not make satisfaction and amends therefore, war was proclaimed against them. Annibal having passed over the mountains Pyrene, and discomfited the Volsians, who made head against him, and would have emperched his passage, mounted the Alps, and after he had passed through them with great difficulty and pains, and repulsed also the French mountainers in sundry skirmishes and battels, he descended into Italy: and near the river Ticinius, discomfited and disarrayed the Romans in a battle of Cavalry. In which conflict, when P. Cornelius Scipio was wounded, his son (the same who afterwards was surnamed Africanus) rescued him, and saved his life.
- G Annibal after he had defeated the Roman army a second time, near the river Trebia, passed over the Appenine: where his souldiers were mightily afflicted and distressed, by reason of foul weather and violence of storm and tempest. Cn. Cornelius Scipio sped well in his war against the Carthaginians within Spain, and took prisoner Mago, the General Commander of the enemies.

The

The one and twentieth book of T. Livius.

THe same may I well say, in the Preface and entrance of this one part of my work, which most writers of histories have promised and made profession of, in the beginning of the whole, to wit, That I will write the most famous and memorable war that ever was, even that, which the Carthaginians under the conduct of Annibal fought with the people & State of Rome. For neither any other Cities or Nations are known to have warred together more wealthy and puissant than they; nor at any time ever were they themselves so great, so strong in forces, and so mighty in means, as now they were. Moreover, they came not newly now, to wage war, without knowledge of the prowess and martiall skill, one of another; for trial they had made thereof sufficient already, in the first punick war. Besides, so variable was the fortune of the field, so doubtfully were their battels fought, that neerer loss and danger were they, who in the end won the better, and achieved the victory. And to conclude, if a man observe the whole course and proceeding of these their wars, their malice and hatred was greater in a manner than their forces: while the Romans took fou) (corn and disdain that they, whose hap before was to be vanquished, should unprovoked begin war afresh with the Conquerors; and the Carthaginians were as male-content, and thoroughly offended, as taking themselves (notwithstanding they were overcome) to be abused too much at their hands by their proud, insolent, and covetous rule over them. Over and besides all this, the report goeth, that Annibal being but nine years old, or thereabouts, came fawning and flattering as wanton children do to his father Amilcar, that he would take him with him into Spain, at what time, as after the Affrican war ended, his father was offering sacrifice, ready to pass over thither with an army: where he was brought to the altar side, and induced to lay his hand thereupon, and to touch the sacrifice, and so to swear, that so soon as ever he were able, he would be a professed and mortal enemy to the people of Rome. Vexed (no doubt) at the heart, was Amilcar himself, a man of high spirit and great courage, for the loss of the Islands Sicily and Sardinia: for not only Sicily was overhastily yielded (as he thought) as despairing too soon of the state thereof, and doubting how it should be defended: but also Sardinia was by the cunning and fraudulent practice of the Romans surprized out of the Carthaginians hands, while they were troubled with the commotion and rebellion of Affrick: and a Tribute besides imposed upon them. He being disquieted, I say, and troubled with these griefs and discontents, so bore himself for five years space in the Affrick war, which ensued immediately upon the peace concluded with the Romans; and likewise after, in Spain, for nine years together, enlarging ever still the dominion of Carthage: that all the world might see, he intended and designed a greater war than that he had in hand; and if God had spared him longer life, it should have been well seen that the Carthaginians under the leading of Amilcar, would have made that war upon Italy, which afterward they waged by the conduct of Annibal. But the death of Amilcar hapning in so good season [for the Romans] and the childhood and tender nonage of Annibal together, were the cause that this war was put off and deferred. In the meantime, between the father and the son, Asdrubal bare all the rule for the space almost of eight years. This Asdrubal had been Amilcar his minion, grown highly into his grace and favour, at the first (as men say) for the very prime and flower of his youth; but afterwards, in regard of the singular forwardness of a brave and haughty mind, which soon appeared in him, and for his forwardness to action, he was preferred to be his son in law, and married his daughter. Now, forasmuch as he was Amilcar his son in law, he was advanced to the sovereign conduct of the war, with no good liking at all and consent of the Nobility and Peers, but by the means and favour only of the Barchin faction, which bare a great stroke, and might do all in all, among the souldiers and the common people. Who managed all his affairs, more by policy and sage counsell, than by force and violence: and using the authority and name of the Princes and great Lords of those countries, and by entertaining friendship with the chief Rulers, won daily the hearts of new nations still, and by that means enlarged the power and seignory of the Carthaginians in Spain, rather than by any war and force of arms. But for all this peace, with (forrein States, he was never the more sure of his own life at home. For a certain barbarous fellow, for anger that his Master and Lord was put to death, slew him in open place: and being laid hold on by them that were attendant about Asdrubal his person, he kept the same countenance still, as if he had escaped and gone clear away: yea, and when he was by cruell torments all mangled and torn, he looked so cheerfully and pleasantly on the matter, as if he had seemed to smile. For his joy of heart surpassed the pains and anguish of his body. With this Asdrubal, for that he had so singular a gift and wonderfull dexterity, in soliciting and annexing unto his dominion the nations aforesaid, the people of Rome had renewed the League, upon these two capitulations and conditions: first, that the river * Iberus should limit and determine the seignories of them both: Item, that the Saguntins, seated in the midst between the territories of both nations, should remain free, and enjoy their ancient liberties.

Asdrubal killed.

The wonderfull constancy and resolution of a slave.

No doubt at all there was now, but when a new Commander should succeed in the room of Asdrubal, the favour of the people would go clear with the prerogative voice and choice of the souldiers: who presently brought young Annibal into the Generall his pavilion, and with exceeding

A ding great acclamation and accord of all, saluted him by the name of Captain General. For this you must understand, that Asdrubal by his letters missive had sent for him, being very young, and hardly fourteen years of age; yea, and the matter was debated first in the Council-House at Carthage, where they of the Barchine side laboured and followed the matter earnestly, that Annibal should be trained in warfare, and grow up to succeed his father in equal prowels & greatness. But Hanno the chiefe man of the contrary faction: "It is but meet and reason (quoth he) that Asdrubal doth demand: and yet for mine own part I think it not good, that his request should be granted. When they mused and marvelled much at this so doubtfull speech of his, and wist not what construction to make of it. "Why then (quoth Hanno) to be plain, That flourish and beauty of youth, which Asdrubal himself yielded and parted withall sometimes unto Annibals father, for to use or abuse at his pleasure: the same he thinketh by good right he may challenge and have again, from the son, to make quittance. But it becometh not us for to acquaint our young youths with the Camp, that under the colour, and instead of their military institution and teaching, they abandon and give their bodies to serve the lust and appetite of the Generals. What? Is this the thing we fear, That the son of Amilcar should tarry too long ere he see the excessive grandeur and sovereignty of his father, and the stately shew as it were of his royalty? Or doubt we, that we shall not soon enough serve in all dutifull allegiance his natural son unto, whose son in law, all our Armies have been left (as it were) in lawfull right of inheritance? Nay, I am of opinion, and this is my judgment, That this youth be kept in awe at home, under obedience of laws, under civill Magistrates, and learn a while to live in equal condition with the rest of the Citizens and subjects: for fear lest at one time or other, this little spark do burn outright, and raise a mighty flame. A few, and those were, in a manner, all of the best sort and soundest judgment, accorded with Hanno. But, as commonly it is seen, the greater number over-weighed the better.

* Amilcar the father of Annibal was the son of Barcha, from whence arose the Barchin faction so often named in this story. The speech of Hanno in the Senate of Carthage.

Thus Annibal was sent into Spain, and immediately at his first coming, drew all the whole army after him; so highly he was regarded and beloved. The old souldiers beleevd verily that Amilcar was alive again, and come amongst them: they thought they beheld and saw the same vigour and spirit in his countenance & visage, the same quickness and liveliness in his eyes, the same proportion, feature and lineaments of his face. And afterwards, within short time, he had so wrought and wound himself into their favour, that the late remembrance of his father was the least matter of all others, that won him grace and love among them. Never was there one and the self-same nature, framed and fitted better, for two things that are in quality most contrary: namely, to rule, and to obey. Whereby, a man could hardly discern and judge, whether he was more dear unto the General for the one, or to the Army for the other. For neither Asdrubal would make choice of any one before him, when there was some valiant service or brave exploit to be executed: nor the souldiers put more confidence in any other Leader, nor go more boldly and resolutely to any enterprize, than under him. Most forward he was and hardy to all hazards and dangerous adventures: right provident and wary again, at the very point of perill and jeopardy. No travell was able to weary and tire his body: no pains-taking could daunt and break his heart. He could away with heat and cold alike. For his diet and feeding, he measured both his meat and drink by his naturall appetite, and not by pleasure and delightfome taste. For sleeping, for waking, day and night was all one with him. When he had once performed his service, and finished his exploit: if there were any spare time after, therein would he take his rest and repose: and that should not be upon a soft bed neither, nor procured with great curiosity by still silence, and making no noise about him. Full often many a man hath seen him lying on the hard and bare ground, under a good souldiers jacket and homely cassock cast over him, even among the sentinels and corps de guard. For his apparel, it was not more costly nor braver than his fellows and companions: mary, in his armour and horses he loved ever to be goodly be-seen above all other. Amongst footmen and horsemen both, he would alwaies be a great way foremost. And to conclude in giving a charge upon the enemy, and to begin to battell, he was by his good will ever the first: and when the fight was done, the last man seen to retire out of the field. Of these so noble qualities and manly vertues, he had not so many, but there were as great vices and imperfections in him again, to counterpoise the same. Cruelty most savage and inhumane, falshood and treachery more than Punick: no truth, no honesty, no fear of God, no regard of oath, no conscience, nor religion.

His vertues.

His vices.
* Ordinary in Carthaginians.

Disposed thus as he was, and inclined by nature, to vertues, and vices, he served full three years under General Asdrubal. During which time, he omitted and forgot no one thing that was meet either to be executed or enterprised by a man that was himself another day to be a Captain and chief Commander in the wars. From the very first day that he was chosen and declared Lord General: as if at the same instant, Italy had been the Province assigned unto him, as if, I say, he had received Commission to war with the Romans, he thought good to make no delays, for fear lest haply whiles he lingered and slacked the time, some mischance might prevent his designs and cut him short, like as it had overtaken his father first, and Asdrubal afterwards: but presently determined to make war upon the Saguntines, by assailing whom, the Romans no doubt were touched, and would take arms and enter into the quarrel. But first he led his army into the marches of the Olcadet (a nation beyond Iberus, rather siding and taking part with the Carthaginians, than under their jurisdiction) that he might not seem to have shot at the Saguntins and intended intended ought against them directly: but that by order and course of his affairs, after he had subdued the countries bordering upon them, he had been drawn (as it were) for vicinity and neighbourhood sake to that war, and to joyn them also with the rest unto the Empire. And first he wan by force, and sacked ^b Carthia, a rich City, the seat town and chief place of all that nation. Whereupon, other meaner and smaller Cities also, for fear came under his obedience, and yielded to pay tribute. His Army then after these victories, and enriched with spoil and pillage, was brought back to new Carthage, there for to winter. Where he made sure unto him the hearts and affectionate love, as well of his own countrymen as of the allies, partly, by bestowing the pillage liberally among them, and partly, by making true payment of souldiers wages for the time past. And then in the very prime of the spring, he went forward to war upon the Vacei. He forced by assault Hermadica and Arbacula, two Towns of the Carthi. Arbacula by the manhood and multitude of the Townsmen held out a long time. But certain fugitives that were fled from Hermadica, having rallied themselves, and joyned with other exiled persons of the Olcades, a nation the summer before subdued, raised also the Carpetans to take arms: and set upon Annibal, in his return from the Vacei; and not far from the river ^b Tagus, troubled and disordered his march, heavily charged with spoil and booty. Annibal forbore to fight, and encamped himself upon the bank of the river: and so soon as the enemies were in their first sleep, and all still and hush, passed over with his Army at the foord: and after he had pitched his Camp far off from the river side, as that his enemies might have room enough to march away besides him, he determined to set upon them as they should pass over the river. To his horsemen he gave commandment to charge upon the Regiment of footmen, so soon as they perceived them to have taken the water: and upon the bank he arranged forty Elephants afont them. There were of the Carpetans, counting the aids and succours of the Olcades and Vacei, 10000 strong: an Army invincible, if they had fought on even and indifferent ground. Who being both by nature fierce and courageous, and for multitude confident; presumptuous besides, upon their imagination that the enemy was retired for fear; supposed that the only stay of their victory was, because the river ran between: and setting up a shout and out-cry, without direction of any Leader, in all disorder they ran into the river here and there, every man what way was next him. Now from the other side of the bank, a great troop of horsemen were entred into the river, encountred them in the midst of the channel, and fought with great advantage. For whereas the footmen unsteady and not able to keep fast footing, and hardly trusting the foord, might easily be cast aside and overturned, even by naked horsemen, if they did but put forth and prick forward their horses it killed not how the horsemen on the other side having their bodies at liberty, and able to wield their weapon, with their horses under them standing sure even in the midst of the stream and whirlpools, might with ease either fight close hand to hand; or assail the enemies aloof. Many of them besides perished in the water: some by the whirling waves of the river were driven upon the enemies, and by the Elephants trodden under foot, and crushed to death. The hindmost, who might with more safety recover their own bank, after they were rallied together into one from divers places, as fear had scattered them; before they could upon so great a fright, take heart and come again to themselves, Annibal who with a four-square battailon had entred the river, forced to flie from the bank: and when he had wasted the country, within few daies brought the Carpetans also under his obedience.

And now all beyond Iberus was subject to the Carthaginians, the Saguntins only excepted. With whom as yet he would not seem to war: howbeit, to minister some cause and occasion thereof, quarrels were picked, and seeds of dissensions sown between them and their neighbors, namely, the Turdetans. Unto whose aid, when he was come, that was himself the sower of all the variance, and had set them together by the ears; and when it appeared plainly that it was not a matter of right to be tried by law, but an occasion rather sought of fight and open war; then the Saguntins sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave aid against that war, which doubtless was at hand. The Consuls at that time of Rome, were P. Cornelius Scipio, and Titus Sempronius Longus, who having brought the Embassadors into the Councill House, and proposed matters unto the LL. there, concerning the weal publike, and decreed to send their Embassadors into Spain to take survey, and looke into the state of their allies: who also if they thought it meet, should give Annibal warning, not to meddle with their confederats, and molest the Saguntins; and withall, to sail over to Carthage into Affrick, and there make relation of the complaints and grievances of the allies of the people of Rome: when, I say, this Embassage was decreed, but yet not sent, news came sooner than all men looked for, that Saguntum was already besieged. Then was the matter propounded new again before the Senate. Some were of mind to dispatch the Consuls unto the Provinces of Spain and Affrick, with commission to make war both by sea and land. Others thought better to bend all their forces wholly into Spain against Annibal. There were again of opinion, that so great and weighty an enterprise was not hand, over head, and rashly to be attempted; but rather that they should attend the return of the Embassadors out of Spain: and this advice that seemed most safe, was held for the better and took place. And therefore so much the sooner were these Embassadors P. Valerius Flaccus, and Q. Bibius Pampilius, addressed unto Annibal before Saguntum, with direction, from thence to go forward to Carthage (in case he would not desist and give over war) and for to demand the Captain himself, for amends and satisfaction of breaking the league. But whiles the Romans were amused about these consultations & decrees,

A decrees, Saguntum was by this time with all forcible means assaulted. This City of all other most wealthy and rich, stood beyond Iberus, situate almost a mile from the sea. The inhabitants are said to have had their beginning out of the Island Zacynthus; and some among them, were descended from Ardea, a City of the Rutilians: but they grew within short time to this poissance and wealth of theirs, partly by the fruits and revenues of their lands, and partly, by the traffick and gain of their merchandise, and commodities transported by sea, as also by the great affluence and encrease of people, and lastly, by their strait rule of discipline, whereby they observed their troth and loyalty with their allies, even to their own ruine and final destruction.

B Annibal after he had invaded their confines as an enemy, and by way of hostility, with his Army overrun and wasted their countrey, besieged and assailed the City three waies. There was one canton or angle of the wall shooting out into a more plain and open valley, than any other place all about: against which he meant to raise certain mantlets or fabricks, under which he might approach with the Ram to batter the wall. But as the place far from the wall, was even enough and handsome for such engines of battery to be driven upon: so after that they came to the proof and execution indeed, the success answered nothing to the enterprise begun. For besides that there was a mighty tower over-looked and commanded them, the wall it self (as in a place doubted and suspected) was more fortified and raised higher there than elsewhere: and also the chosen youth and ablest men were bestowed, to make more forcible resistance, where there was like to be most trouble and danger. And first with shot of darts and quarrels, and such like, they put the enemy back,

C and would not suffer the pioneers and labourers in any place to entrench or raise rampiets in safety. In process also, they shot not from the wall only and that towers, and shewed themselves there in arms for defence, but also their hearts served them to sally forth, and to break into the guards of the enemies: yea, and to enter upon their trenches and fabricks. In which skirmishes there died not many more Saguntins than Carthaginians. But so soon as Annibal himself, approaching unadvisedly under the wall, happened to be wounded grievously in the forepart of his thigh, with a dart or light javelin, and therewith fell to the ground: they all about him fled so fast, and were so scared, that they had like to have given over quite and abandoned their mantlets, and other fabricks aforesaid. After this, for some few daies, whiles their General was under cure of his hurt, they lay at siegerather, than followed the assault. In which mean time, as they rested from skirmish, so they ceased not to invent new devices, and to prepare new fabricks. Whereupon the assault began again more hot than before: and in many parts at once they fell to raise rolling mantlets, so many and so thick, that some places would not receive them: and withall, to drive the Ram against the walls. Annibal had men good store, for it is thought he was 15000 in Camp strong.

D The townsmen with devising means to defend, and see to every place, began to have their hands full: but all would not serve. For now were the walls beaten with the rams, and many parts thereof shaken and battered: and at one place above the rest, by continual battery there was such a breach, as the town lay open and naked to the enemy. After that, three turrets, and all the wall between fell down with a mighty and horribly crash, insomuch as the Carthaginians thought verily that with that rush the town had been won: by which breach, as if the wall had protected both

E parties before, they ran forth together on each side to fight. The battell was not like to a tumultuary skirmish, such as are wont to be about assaults of Cities, by the occasion and advantage of the one part or the other: but a very set and ranged field (as it were) in an open ground between the breaches of the wall, and the houses of the town, that stood a pretty way distant within. Of one side they were pricked forward with hope, on the other with despair: whiles Annibal thought verily that he was master of the town already if he held on but a little longer: and the Saguntins seeing their town bare, and void of walls, opposed their bodies in the breach, not one stepping back a foot, lest in the space between he should let in the enemy. The more fiercely therefore, and the thicker and closer that they fought together on both parts, the more were wounded: and there was not a dart could light in vain between their bodies and their armour, but it did mischief.

F The Saguntins used a weapon called Falarica, in manner of a dart, which they let fly and lanced from them, having a long shaft of steel, round and even every where, toward the one end, where it was headed with iron, and bound about with tow, and smeared with pitch. The iron head was three foot long, that it might pierce both harness and body through. But the greatest scare that it did was this, although it stuck fast in the target, and entered not into the body, that being driven and flung, when the middle part was set on fire, by the motion thereof as it flew, it gathered much more fire, forced the souldier to forsake his armour, and exposed him disarmed and naked to the shot following. Well, the fight continued doubtful a long time, by reason that the Saguntins took better heart unto them, because they had rested beyond their hope and expectation: and the Carthaginians took themselves vanquished, for that they had not got the victory, and better hand: whereupon, the townsmen all at once set up a cry, and beat the enemies back to the very breaches, and ruins of the wall, and from thence thrust them out clean, whiles they were thus encumbered and affrighted, yea, and at last discomfited them, put them to flight, and chased them as far as their Camp.

G In the mean while news came, that there were Embassadors arrived from Rome: unto whom Annibal dispatched certain messengers to meet with them at sea side, and to give them to understand, That neither they might safely with security of their persons come among the broiles of so many barbarous & fierce nations: nor their Master Annibal amidst those dangerous and troublesome

ble some affairs, had any leisure to attend or give audience unto embassages. He knew full well, that the Embassadors being not received and entertained, would straight to Carthage. Whereupon, he addressed a forehand his letters and curriers to the chief of the Barchine faction, to frame and prepare the minds of that side, so, as they of the other part might not gratify, or do any thing in favour of the Romans. By which means, besides that they were neither admitted by Annibal, nor audience given them, that embassage also was in vain, and took no effect at Carthage. Only Hanno notwithstanding the whole body of the Senate was against him, spake with great silence and assent of the hearers, by reason of his authority and reputation, and pleaded to the point of the breach of League, in this wise: "I have, quoth he, foretold and warned you in the name "and for the love of the gods, who are the witnesses and judges of covenants and confederacies, I "I have, I say, admonished you, that ye should not send Amilcar his son, or any of his breed unto "the Camp: for that neither the ghost and spirit, nor the progeny and race of that man can rest "and be quiet: nor the Roman league will ever be assured and established, so long as there remaineth one alive of the Barchine name and family. But sent ye have, for all my words, unto "your armies, a youth boiling in ambition, enflamed with a covetous desire of being a King, and "one that seeth no other way thereto, but by raising one war after another, to live guarded with "armies and legions about him. In which action of yours, ye have as it were ministered dry fuel, "and put oil to the fire: ye have, I say, fed that fire, wherewith ye now all are set a burning. Your "armies now besiege Saguntum, from which by covenant and vertue of the League they are deterred. Within a while and shortly will the Roman legions lie in siege before Carthage, under "the conduct and guidance, no doubt, of those gods, by whose support and aid in the former war, they were revenged for the breach of the accord and alliance. What? know ye not yet, either "your enemy, or your selves, or the fortune of both nations? This good Captain and gentle General, forsooth, of your making, would not admit and receive into his Camp Embassadors coming from our allies, and in the behalf also of our allies: wherein he abolished the law of Nations. Howbeit, they having taken a repulse, from whence even the very Embassadors of enemies, are not wont to be repelled, are come unto you, and by vertue of their League demand amends of "trespass and restitution or satisfaction for their damages. And presuppose the State be not touched nor culpable in this Action, they require no more, but to have the author himself in person, "who is the offender. The more gently they deale, and the longer it is ere they begin, the more "obstinat they will be, and continue with greater rigour (I fear me) if they once begin. Set before "your eyes the Islands Egates, and Eryx: and what for these four and twenty years past, ye "have endured both by land and sea. Neither was this beardless boy our Captain then, but his father Amilcar himself, even a second Mars, as these his supports would have him. But what of "that? We could not then, according to our league, hold our hands, and let Tarentum in Italy alone: like as now we are doing with Saguntum. Therefore, both God and man took the matter in hand, and vanquished us in the end: and when we were at angking and debating the case "with discourse of words about this point, Whether Nation of the twain had broken the league? the event of war, as an indifferent and equall judge, awarded victory where the right was. And "Carthage it is, against which, Annibal even now hath reared manlets, towers, and other engins "of assault: even now, battereth and shaketh he Carthage wals with the Ram. The ruins of Saguntum (God grant I be a false Prophet) will fall upon our heads, and the war begun with the Saguntins, we must maintain against the Romans. How then? (will some man say) shall we yield "Annibal unto them? I know well, how small my authority is in this point, by reason of the old "grudge and enmity between me and his father deceased. Howbeit, as I rejoyced, that Amilcar "was dead, for that if he had lived still, we should ere now have warred with the Romans: so this "very youth, an impe of his, I hate and detest as the very fury and fire-brand of this war: whom "I would have by my good will, not only to be rendred unto them, for to purge and expiate the "breach of league: but if no man would challenge him for to be punished, I would award, that he "should be carried and transported as far as there is sea or land, and to be sent away thither from "whence we might not once hear of him again, and where he might never trouble the quiet and "peaceable state of this City any more. Over and besides, my opinion and resolution is, that some "Embassadors be sent presently to Rome, to satisfie the Senate: and others also, with a message to "Annibal that he withdraw his forces from Saguntum: and with commission to render up Annibal himself into the Romans hands, according to the tenour of the League: and a third Embassage likewise to the Saguntins, for to make restitution and amends for their harms and losses already sustained. When Hanno had made an end of his speech, it was altogether needless; that any one man there should make reply, and debate the matter with him by way of Oration, the whole Senate was so possessed already and wrought for Annibal: and with one voice they blamed Hanno, and sounded it out, That he had made a bitter speech, and more favouring of an enemy, O than Flaccus Valerius himself the Roman Embassador. After this, the Roman Embassadors had this answer returned, That the war began by the Saguntins, and not by Annibal. Also, that the people of Rome offered them injury, in preferring the Saguntins before the most ancient alliance of the Carthaginians. Whiles the Romans thus spent time in sending Embassages, Annibal having wearied his men, what with skirmishes, and what with trenching and raising mounts and fabricks, he gave them rest some few daies and bestowed certain good guards to ward and keep the manlets and of her engins of battery. In the mean season he encouraged his souldiers, and set their hearts

A hearts on fire, partly, by pricking and provoking them to anger against their enemies, and partly, by drawing them on, and alluring them with hope of great rewards. But after he had once in a general assembly made proclamation, That the spoil and pillage should be the soldiers share; they were all so enkindled and enflamed, that if presently he had sounded the signal of battel, it seemed, that no force in the World had been able to resist them. The Saguntins, as they had some rest from skirmish, and continued certain dayes, neither assailing nor assailed: so they gave not over labouring night and day, for to make up a new wall and counter-mure, on that side of the Town which lay open by reason of breaches. But after this, grew the assault more hot and furious than before: neither wist they well (the shouts and alarms were so divers and dissonant on every side) whether to come first, or where was most need of help and succour. Annibal himself was present in person to encourage and exhort his souldiers, where as the rouling Tower was driven, which was so high, that it overlooked all the mures and counter-Fabrick of the City, and being once approached near the walls, furnished as it was in every loft and story, with ordnance of quarrel shot, brakes, and other artillery, beat the defendants from off the walls, so as none durst abide upon them. Then Annibal taking the time, and supposing that he had now a good opportunity presented unto him, sent about 500 Africans that were pioneers with pick-axes, mattocks and such like tools, to undermine the wall, yea, and to dig into it from the very foundation. And that was no hard matter to do, for that the cement or mortar was not hardened and bound with lime, but tempered with earth and clay, after the old manner of building: and therefore the wall came tumbling down before it was hewn and wrought into: and through the wide breaches, whole troops of armed souldiers entered the Town: and withal, they seized one high place above the rest, whereon they planted their artillery and ordnance of slings and brakes, and cast a wall about it, that they might have within the very City a fort and bastillon of their own, like a Castle to overlook all. The Saguntins likewise raised another mure within along that side where the Town as yet was not taken: So that on both sides they made fortifications, and also fought with all their might and main. But the Saguntins defending the inner parts, by little and little brought their Town daily into a smaller compass. And by that means, as also by reason of the long siege, as scarcity and want of all things grew more and more, so the expectation of forraign aid and succour was every day less than other: the Romans their only hope, being so far off, and their enemies so near on every hand. Howbeit, the sudden rode and journey of Annibal against the * Oretans and * Carperans, refreshed for a while their troubled and afflicted spirits. These two Nations being risen upon a discontentment of a freight muster and rigorous levy of souldiers, had staid and detained those Muster-masters, that had in commission to take up all sufficient and able men for the wars and so, made some shew and fear of rebellion: but being prevented in the beginning by the speedy coming of Annibal, were soon quiet, and laid down their arms. But the assault of Saguntum continued nevertheless. For Maharbal, Himilco his son, whom Annibal had left behind as Lieutenant, so bestirred himself, that neither the Townsmen nor the enemy found the miss or absence of the General. This Maharbal had made some fortunat skirmishes, and with three rams shaken a good part of the wall, so as he shewed to Annibal at his return, all lying along E and every place full of fresh ruins. Whereupon the army was presently brought against the very Castle of the City, where began a cruel and bloody conflict, with the slaughter of many on both sides, and one part of the said fortress was forced and won.

Afterwards there was some treaty of peace and agreement, by means of two persons, Alcon a Saguntine, and Aloron a Spaniard, and some small hope there was of it. Alcon supposing he could somewhat prevail by way of request and entreating, without knowledge of the Saguntins, departed away by night to Annibal. But after that he saw, that with all his weeping he could do no good, but that heavy and intolerable articles and capitulations of peace were exhibited, as from a wrathful conqueror, of an Orator, proved to be a very traitor, and remained still in the camp with the enemies, saying, that he was sure to die, whosoever should move the Saguntins to peace, F under those conditions. For demanded it was of the Saguntins, Imprimis, to make restitution to the Turdetans of all harmes and losses. Item, to deliver up all their gold and silver. Item, to quit the Town, and depart but with one sure of apparel a piece; and there to dwell, where the Carthaginians would appoint. When Alcon avouched plainly, that the Saguntins would never accept of peace with these conditions, Aloron replied again and said, That seeing all things else now failed them, their hearts also must needs come down, and fall like wise; and therewith promised to deliver unto them the tenor of the said peace, and to be a mediator and dealer in the compassing thereof. At that time he served Annibal as a private souldier: howbeit, a publick friend he was, and an host and guest of old to the Saguntins. Who having in sight of all men yielded up his offensive arms, to the warders of the enemies, and passed the rampiers, was brought (for so himself desired) before the Governor and Provost of Saguntum. Thither came running presently, a number of all sorts of people: but after the rest of the multitude were commanded to void, Aloron was called into their Council house, and having audience given, made this or the like speech unto them. "If Alcon your countryman and fellow citizen, as he came from you to Annibal for "to treat about peace, had likewise brought back again unto you from Annibal the conditions "and articles of peace, I needed not to have taken this journey; who am come unto you neither "as an Orator from Annibal, nor yet as a fugitive. But seeing he, hath remained with the enemy, "either through your default or his own, I know not whither, if he pretended and fained causeless

of Saguntum.

To the hearing of this Oration the people had flocked about, and by little and little enter-mingled their own assembly with the Senators: and all of a sudden the chief of them withdrew themselves and departed, before answer was given: and brought all their silver and gold, as well publick as private, into the market place: and when they had cast it into a great fire made hastily for that purpose, most of them threw themselves into it headlong after. Whereupon there being a fear and trouble already throughout the whole City: behold, another outcry besides and noise was heard from the Castle. For a certain Tower that had been a long time battered and shaken, fell down: and at the breach thereof, a band of Carthaginians made entry, and gave sign to their General that the City was abandoned of the ordinary Watchmen and corps de guard of the enemies, and altogether lay open and naked. Annibal supposing it was no wisdom to neglect and slack so good an opportunity, with all his forces at once assailed the City, and wan it in the turning of an hand: and presently gave order that all above fourteen years of age should be put to the sword. A cruel commandment, no doubt, but yet needful, as afterwards it was well seen in the end and upshot of all. For who would have spared and taken pity of those, that either shut themselves with their wives and children into their houses, and burnt them over their own heads, or in their armor, gave not over fight before they died? Thus was the Town won with exceeding store of pillage within it. And albeit much was spoiled on purpose by the owners, and that in the massacre and execution they had no respect of age in the fury of their anger: and for all that, the prisoners fell to the souldiers share: yet certain it is, that of the goods sold in port-sale, there arose a good round piece of mony: and much rich household stuff and costly apparel was sent to Carthage.

Some there be that write, how Saguntum was won the eight Month after the siege began: and that from thence Annibal departed to winter in new Carthage: as also, that the fifth month after he departed from Carthage, he arrived in Italy. Which being so, it cannot be, that P. Cornelius N and T. Sempronius should be the Consuls, unto whom both in beginning of the siege, the Sagun- tin Embassadors, were sent; and who also in their year of government fought with Annibal, the one neer the river Ticinus, and both together a good while after, at Trebia. And we must say, that either all these things were atchieved in shorter time a good deal, or else that Saguntum in the beginning of that year, wherein P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls, began not to be besieged; but finally was forced and won. For the battel at Trebia could not be so long after, as to fall in the year wherein Cn. Servilius and C. Flaminius were Consuls. For that Flaminius entred his Consulship at Ariminum, and was created by T. Sempronius, Consul, who after the battel of Trebia came to Rome to elect Consuls, and after the Election was ended, returned again to his army, into the wintering harbours.

About the same time, as well the Embassadors which returned from Carthage, brought word to Rome that there was nothing but war: as also tidings came, of the destruction of Saguntum.
 And so greatly grieved and sorrowed the Senators, and pitied withal their allies thus unworthily massacred, so ashamed in themselves they were, that they had not sent aid in time, so deeply offended and incensed with indignation against the Carthaginians, yea, and so mightily feared the losse of the very main chance at home, as if the enemy had been already at the gates of the City:
 that in very deed, having their minds possessed at one time, with so many troubles, they rather trem-

A trembled and quaked for fear, than felted themselves to consultation and counsel. For they considered and saw very well, that neither a more fierce and warlike enemy ever encountred with them: nor the State of Rome was at any time so reddy, so feeble, and so undispensed to war. Moreover, it was commonly said, that the Sardi, Corfi, Hifti, and Illyrici had rather challenged the Romans, and made bravados of war, than exercised and toiled them in any hard conflicts: as for the Gauls, they were but tumults, rumors, and alarms which they made, and no wars indeed: but the Carthaginians their enemies, they were old beaten soldiers, injured and hardened for this 23 years in most difficult service of war, amongst the Spanish Nations, and went away ever with victory: first trained and practised under Amilcar, then under Asdrubal, and now lastly under the conduct of Annibal, a right hardy and valiant Captain. Considering moreover, that now he cometh fresh from the ruin of Saguntum, a most rich City, and passeth straight-ways over Iberia: drawing after him a train of so many nations of the Spaniards, exercised already by him in the wars: and will no doubt raise the Gauls, a people at all times ready to take arms: so as now they were to wage war in Italy, with no more but all the World besides, yea, and under the walls of Rome, for the defence of the City.

Now had the Provinces been nominated and appointed before to the Consuls: but then were they commanded by casting lots, to part them between them. To Cornelius fell Spain: To Sempronius Affrick and Sicily. Likewise decreed it was, that for that year, there should be levied six Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: also that as great a navy as might be, should be rigged and set out. So there were enrolled 24000 Roman footmen, and of horsemen 1800: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horse, 120 gallies, with five course of oars on a side, and twenty foists, were set afloat. After this, a bill was preferred unto the people, that it might please them to determine and grant, that war should be proclaimed against the people of Carthage. And in regard of that war, there was also a solemn supplication holden through the City: wherein the people adored and prayed the Gods to prosper and bring to an happy end, this war which the people of Rome had determined. And betwixt the Consuls thus were the forces divided: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, consisting of four thousand foot, and three hundred horse a piece: also of allies sixteen thousand foot, one thousand and eight hundred horse, besides 160 gallies, and twelve barks or foists. With this power for Land and Sea service,

D was Sempronius sent into Sicily, from thence to passe over into Affrick, in case the other Consul were able to impeach the Carthaginians for coming into Italy. Cornelius had the charge of a smaller power: for that L. Manlius the Pretor, was sent in person into France with a sufficient army: but in the number of ships especially, was Cornelius scantied 60 gallies of five banks of oars he had, and no more, (for it was supposed that the enemy would neither come by Sea, nor fight in that kind of service) and two Roman Legions with the full proportion of Horsemen and 14000 footmen of allies, with 1200 men of arms. That Province of France (in those parts where the Carthagian was was expected) had that year two Legions of Roman footmen, 14000 allies, besides 1000 Horse from them, and 6000 of the Romans. When all things were thus prepared, to the end that before war began, it might appear they dealt by order of law, and with justice: and that all due complements might be performed, they sent certain grave and ancient personages in Embassie into Affrick, to wit, Q. Fabius, M. Livius, L. Amylius, C. Licinius, and Q. Bebius. First, to demand and know of the Carthaginians, whether Annibal by their publick warrant and authority, besieged and assailed Saguntum: then, if they avowed the act, and stood to it (as they were like to do) confessing that it was done by the counsel of the State: to give defiance, and proclaim open war against them. The Romans being arrived at Carthage, had audience given in their Senat-house: where, after Q. Fabius had briefly demanded nothing else, but that one thing which he had in charge and commission, there a principal Senator amongst the Carthaginians stood up and said:

F "Your former Embassage, my masters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and would needs have Annibal to be yielded unto you: as if he had besieged Saguntum of his own head. And as for this, that you come with now, howsoever in words it seem more mild and smooth, in very deed and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Annibal only charged and demanded to justice: but now are we both urged to acknowledge a fault, and also forced to make restitution and satisfaction out of hand: as if we had avowed, and confessed the action. For mine own part, of this mind am I, that the case ought thus to be laid, and the question brought to this issue, not whether Saguntum was besieged by a privat person, or publick Council, but whether by right, or wrongfully. For to enquire and examine whether our citizen and subject have done this by our advice, or of himself, pertaineth to us alone, as a to censure and punish him accordingly: with you we are to debate this point only, Whether it might stand with the league to do it, or no? And therefore since it pleaseth you, that we should dispute and distinguish, between the action of a General, warranted by the publick State, and an enterprise proceeding from his own motive; ye shall understand, that there was indeed a league between you and us, contracted by Laetanius the Consul, wherein there is a clause, comprising the allies of both parties: as concerning the Saguntins (who as then were none of your confederats) there was not one word at all therein, but in that league, (ye will say) that was contracted with Asdrubal, the Saguntins are expressly named and excepted: to which I have nothing to plead, but even that which I have learned of you. For ye your selves denied, that ye were bound to stand

"to that accord which C. Lutatius your Consul first made with us, because it passed neither by the consent of the nobles, nor grant of the people. Whereupon, there was another league anew drawn out, and by publick agreement enacted. If you then, be not tied to observe your leagues, unless they be authorized by the nobles, or ratified by the people; no more can the league of Asdrubal oblige us, which he concluded without our privity and knowledge. Forbear therefore to speak either of Saguntum, or Iberus; and what your mind hath so long conceived, let it hatch now at length, and bring it forth. Then Q. Fabius the Roman Ambassador, having made a hollow lap within the plait and fold of his side gown, Here quoth he, within this lappet, we present and offer war and peace unto you, take whether ye will. At which word, they all cryed out at once with as great stomack and boldness: Many even which you will your self. Whereat he let his robe loose again; Why then, there is war, quoth he, take it amongst you; Let come say they all again, and welcome be it; and as willingly as we accept thereof, so shall we follow and manage it as throughly.

This direct demand, and round denouncing of war, seemed more for the honor of the Romans, than to make much dispute and argument about the right of the cause, and of the covenants; a vain matter before, but now especially, after the winning and destruction of Saguntum. For if the question were to be decided by words and reasoning, that league of Asdrubal which was exchanged for the former of Lutatius, was not the same, nor the tenor thereof to be compared: seeing that in the accord of Lutatius, this branch and proviso was expressly added, [That it should stand good, and be ratified, if the people approved thereof:] but in this of Asdrubal, there was no such condition at all: and besides, the covenant for so many years space during his life, was so established and confirmed, and no word to the contrary; that when the very maker and author thereof was dead, there was no change and alteration. And yet, put case they should have stood upon the former alliance; the Saguntins were therein well enough comprised and provided for, in that the allies of either part were excepted and comprehended. For neither was this clause added [They who at that time were allies] nor yet were they excepted against, who afterwards should become, or be admitted allies. And seeing that it was lawful to entertain new confederats, who is it that would judge it reasonable, either that no man should be received unto amity for any good desert whatsoever; or being once received into protection, should not be defended accordingly: Provided alwayes, that no allies of the Carthaginians should either be solicited to rebellion, or received again, if of themselves they once revolted.

The Roman Ambassadors, as they were commanded at Rome, passed the seas from Carthage into Spain, for to visit all the Cities, and to see whether they could either draw them to their society, or withdraw them from the Carthaginians. And first they came to the Burgosians, where being courteously entertained (for weary they were of the Carthaginian government) they stirred up many other nations beyond Iberus, to have a desire to change for a new world. From thence they came to the Volsicians, whose notable answer reported throughout all Spain, turned away all other States from banding with the Romans: for thus in a solemn assembly a sage and ancient father among them framed his answer. "With what face can ye (Romans) require us to prefer your friendship and amity before the Carthaginians; seeing that the Saguntins who did the same, have been more cruelly by you their allies betrayed, than by their enemies the Carthaginians destroyed? "By my advice go and seek you confederats there, where the woful calamity and misery of Saguntum is not known. The lamentable ruins of which City, as it is a doleful example, so it shall be a notable warning to all nations of Spain, that no man ever after repose trust in the protection and society of the Romans. Whereupon, they were commanded to depart the borders of the Volsicians immediately, and in no Diet or Council of Spain, had they afterwards any better entertainment, and more courteous language. Thus having in vain gone through all Spain, they took their way into Gaul: where they saw a strange sight, and a fearful fashion: for all in armour (such was the guise and manner of the country) they came to their publick assemblies: and there, these Ambassadors after they had set out in goodly words the greatness and glory of the people of Rome, and highly magnified their large empire and dominion, and thereupon made request, that they would not give the Carthaginians leave (who minded to make war upon Italy) for to pass through their Cities and Towns: hereat they set up such a laughter, with a certain grumbling and murmuring, that scarcely could the youth be stilled and quieted by the Magistrates and Elders; so foolish, so foolish, and shameless seemed this demand, in their conceit: that they should once imagine that the Gauls were such allies, as they would be content (rather than to let the war passe into Italy) to avert and turn it upon themselves, and to suffer, yea, and offer their own territories to be spoiled and foraged, for the safety (forsooth) of other mens Lands, who were but meer aliens and strangers unto them. The noise and garboil being at length hushed and appeased, this answer was returned to the Ambassadors: "That neither the Romans had deserved so well, nor the Carthaginians so ill at their hands, that they should take arms either for Romans, or against Carthaginians. But contrary-wise, they were advertised, that some of their nation, were by the people of Rome driven out of the marches and confines of Italy, put to pay tribute, yea, and endured other outrages and indignities. The like demands and answers passed to and fro in other Councils and Assemblies of Gaul: neither could they meet with any friendly entertainment, or have peaceable words given them, before they came to Masilia: where, after diligent inquiry, and faithful search made by their allies, they had true advertisements, that Annibal

Aforehand had wrought the hearts of the Gauls to his own purpose, and was possessed of them: but they understood withal, that they were not like to continue long in good terms of kindness and favor even to him, (so fierce and savage, so untractable are they, and untamed by nature) unless their Princes and Rulers be ever and anon well fed and plied with gold, whereof that nation of all other is most greedy and covetous. The Roman Embassadors, having thus gone their circuit over all the States of Spain and Gaul, returned to Rome: not long after that the Coss. had taken their journey into their Provinces: where they found the whole City possessed with the expectation of war: so rise and currant was the rumor and bruit abroad, that the Carthaginians were already passed over the River Iberus.

B Annibal after the winning of Saguntum, had retired himself to winter in new Carthage: and there having intelligence what had been done and decreed as well at Rome, as at Carthage [in Africk] and that he was reputed not only the Captain General and Conductor, but also the very author and cause of all this war: so soon as he had divided and sold the rest of the booty and pillage that remained, thought good now to make no longer delays, but assembled the souldiers of the Spanish Nation, and to them he spake in this manner: "My trusty friends and loyal confeder-rats, I am perswaded, that ye your selves do see as well as I, now that all the States of Spain are in peace and quietness, that either ye are to make an end of souldiery, and all our forces to be cased and discharged from service: or else that ye must remove the war into other Lands. For so

C shall these Nations prosper and flourish, and not only enjoy the blessings of peace, but also reap the fruits of war, if we will seek to gain riches, and to acquire glory and honor from others.

Since therefore we are to war shortly far from home, and doubt it is, when you shall see again your houses, and whatsoever there is dear unto you: if any of you be desirous to visit home, his wife and children, kinsfolk, and friends, I give him licence and free passport. But I command you withal, to shew your selves here again before me, in the beginning of the next spring: that with the help of God, we may in hand with that war, whereby we shall purchase both worship and wealth. There was not one in a manner but well accepted of this liberty so frankly offered by himself, and were desirous to have a sight of house and land both for that every one already longed for their friends and kindred, and foresaw in farther time to come, a greater miss, and cause of more longing after them. This rest all Winter time, between their travels past, and those they

D were soon after to endure, refreshed as well their bodies as their minds, and prepared them to abide and endure all new pains whatsoever. So in the very prime of the spring, according to the Edict aforesaid, they all assembled together again. Annibal having taken a muster and survey of the aids that were sent unto him from all those Nations, went to Gades: and there, to Hercules he paid his old vows, and bound himself to new, if the rest of his enterprizes should speed well and have good success. After this, dividing and casting care indifferently, as well for offensive as defensive war, doubting lest while he went by Land through Spain and France into Italy, Africk should lie open and naked to the Romans from Sicily side; purposed to fortifie and make that part sure with strong garrisons. In lieu whereof, he sent for fresh supply out of Africk, specially of Archers and Javelotiers, and those lightly armed: to the end, that the Africans might serve in

E Spain, and the Spaniards in Africk; like (both the one and the other) to prove the better souldiers, far from their own countries; and being bound as it were, with mutual and reciprocal pledges. So he sent into Africk 13850 footmen, armed with light targets, and 870 slingers of the Islands * Baleares, 1200 Horsemen also out of sundry Nations. Which forces he disposed, partly for the defence of Carthage, and partly to be divided through Africk, for the guard thereof. He sent withal, certain Commissioners into all their Cities to take up souldiers, and enrolled 4000 of their chosen youths, who should be brought to Carthage, there to lie in garrison, and to serve for hostages. And supposing that Spain was not to be neglected, and the rather, because he was not ignorant how the Roman Embassadors had visited the same round to see how they could sollicit and work the Princes and rulers to their mind; he committed the charge of that Province to his

F brother Asdrubal, a valiant and hardy man: and furnished him with good forces, especially out of Africk, to wit, 11850 Africans footmen, 300 Ligurians, 500 Balear Islanders. 200 Horsemen of Ilergetes out of Spain. And because he should want no manner of Land help, fourteen Elephants besides. Moreover, there was a fleet allowed him for the defence of the Sea-coasts. For by what forces and service the Romans had before got victory, thereby it was likely, that they would still maintain and continue their wars, 57 Gallies therefore of five banks of oars, he had at Sea, two of four, and five of three. But of the five oared gallies aforesaid, he had no more but two and thirty, fitted and well appointed with rowers and mariners, and so were the

From Gades, the army of Annibal returned to winter in Carthage: and from thence he passed by the City * Erovisia, and marched forward with his forces to Iberus and the Sea-coasts. Where it is reported, that in his sleep he dreamed, and saw a vision namely a young man of divine shape and semblance, saying, That he was sent from Jupiter to guide him in his voyage into Italy, and willed him therefore to follow him, and in no wise to turn his eyes from him one way or other. Also, that at the first he being scared and affrighted, durst not look either about or behind, but followed him still afterwards (as men by nature are curious) when he cast and discoursed in his mind, what it might be, that he was forbidden so to see behind him, he could not hold and rule his eyes, but must needs look back: and then he beheld behind him, a serpent of huge greatness coming again, and all the way as it went, to bear down trees, groves, and thickets: and after all that, he perceived a great storm and tempest ensuing, with mighty thunder-claps. Now when he was desirous to know what this so great confusion and strange sight might signify, he heard a voyce, saying, That it betokened the ruins and wasting of Italy: willing him therefore, to go still forward with his voyage, and search no further into the secrets of the Gods, but leave them to the hidden destinies. Annibal right joyous at this vision, passed over Iberus with his whole power, divided into three parts, having sent certain before him with gifts and rewards, into all parts whereas he should march with his army, to gain the hearts of the Gauls: and withal, to seek out and discover the passages of the Alpes. So he crossed the River Iberus with 90000 foot, and 12000 Horse, strong. After this, he subdued the Hergetes, the Bargusians, Auselans, and Aquitain, which lyeth under the hills Pyrenai. The government of all these Nations, he let over to Hanno, that he might have at his command the straights which joyned France and Spain together. Unto whom he allowed 10000 footmen, and 1000 horse, for to defend and keep in obedience those countries. After that his army was on foot and began to march through the Forrest Pyreneus, and that there ran amongst the barbarous people a more certain bruit, That they were to make war with the Romans: three thousand footmen of the Carpenats, returned back: and for certain it was known, that they departed not, for fear so much of the war, as the tedious journey and unpassable wayes of the Alpes. Annibal, considering that either to recal them or to keep them by violence, was a dangerous matter: for fear lest thereby he should provoke the fierce stomachs of the rest: sent home again above 7000 of such, as he perceived to be weary, and to have no mind to the service: and made semblance withal, that the Carpetans were by his leave discharged. And doubting lest long stay and ease there, might tempt his souldiers, and give occasion of mutinies, with the rest of his forces he passed Pyreneus, and pitched his camp before the Town Illiberis. The Gauls, albeit they were advertised, that it was Italy, at which Annibal shot; yet because the bruit was blazed, That the Spaniards beyond Iberus, were by force subdued, and strong garrisons placed in their Cities: certain Nations of them, for fear of servitude and bondage, rose up in arms, and assembled together at Ruscino. Which being related to Annibal, he fearing more that they would stay him in his journey, than endanger him in fight: sent certain Orators or Embassadors to their Princes and great Lords, to signify unto them, "That himself in person would gladly parlie with them, and that it should be in their choice whether they would come neerer to Illiberis, or himself go forward to Ruscino: where, being neer together, they might more easily meet and confer. For as he was willing to receive them into his camp, and would be glad to see them there: so he would not think much of his pains, to repair unto them himself, as one that was thither come, as a friend and guest unto France, and not as an enemy: and would not by his good will draw a sword (if the Gauls would let him alone.) before he were entred within Italy. And thus much verily passed by messengers and courriers between. But so soon as the Lords of France, who presently removed their camp to Illiberis, were come willingly enough to Annibal, as being bribed and corrupted with money and presents, they gave his army good leave to pass through their confines along the Town Ruscino.

In Italy this while, the Embassadors of Marseilles had brought no other word to Rome, but that Annibal was only gone over Iberus: but, by that time, the Boii had stirred up the Insubrians to mutiny, and were revolted themselves, even as if he had passed the Alpes already: which they did not so much upon old rancour and malice to the people of Rome, as for that, they took it ill and were discontented, that there were Colonies brought lately into the Gauls country, to be planted about Padus, Placencia and Cremona. Whereupon they arose suddenly, took arms, and entred by force into those parts, and made so foul work and fearful havock, that not only the country people and villagers, but also the three Roman Commissioners called Triumvirs, to wit, Caius Lucatius, Aul. Servilius, and Titus Annins, who were come to set out the Lands and territory to the said Colonies, not trusting the walls of Placencia, fled to Mutina. That Lucatius was one of them, it is not doubted: but some records have Q. Acilius and C. Herennius, instead of A. Servilius and T. Annins: and others again, nominate P. Cornelius Asina, and C. Papirius Mase. It is uncertain also, whether they were the Embassadors sent to the Boii, to reason or expostulate the matter, that had abuse offered them, and were evil intreated: or that the Triumvirs above said, were set upon and assailed as they were measuring out the Lands. But whiles they were thus besieged at Mutina, and those Boians lying at siege (a nation unskilful altogether in the fear of assaunting Towns, and likewise of all other most cowardly, to attempt any martial exploits) whiles they lay idly about the wals, and never once advanced against them, they began to make shew of a treaty for peace. Whereupon the Roman Embassadors or Commissioners, being by the chief of the Gauls called out to parlie, were not only against law of nations, but with breach also of their faithful promise, and word which they had given that time, apprehended: and the Gauls said plainly they would not let them go, unless their hostages were delivered them again. These news touching the Embassadors being reported and Mutina with the garrison in danger: L. Marcius the Pretor, in great anger and indignation, brought his army in more haft than good order, before Mutina. There were in those dayes great woods about the high way, and most part of the country wilds

A wilds and waists, not inhabited: where he having engaged himself without his espials, was intrap-ped within an ambush: so that many of his men, and hardly recovered the open champaign country.
There he incamped himself strongly: and for that the Gauls had no heart to assault, nor hope to win the camp, his soldiers courages were refreshed: albeit it was well known that they had received a shrewd foil, and knew their forces to be much impaired. Then began he to march on, in his journey afresh. And so long as he led his power through the open country, the enemies were not in sight: but when they were entered the forests again, they set upon the rereward of them: where, besides the great fright and damage of all the rest, 800 Roman soldiers were left dead in the place, and the enemies went away with six ensigns. But afterwards, the Gauls ceased to molest B and trouble, and the Romans gave over to fear, so soon as they were passed, and escaped the rough, cumbersome, and unpassable forests. And the Romans being now able in the open and champian country to march with safety, made halt to get to Tannetum a village neer unto the Po. * Tannetum.

mies, whose number daily increased. After this sudden tumult was reported at Rome, and that the L.L. of the Senat were advertised, that besides the war with the Carthaginians, the Gauls were up in arms: they gave order, that C. Asinius the Pretor should go (with one Roman Legion, and four thousand allies, who were enrolled by the Consuls in a new levy) to aid Manlius: who without any skirmish (by reason that the enemies were fled for fear) came to Tannetum. Also P.
C. Cornelius having newly levied one Legion in lieu of that which was sent with the Pretor, departed from the City of Rome, and passing with 60 Gauls along the coasts of Tuscany, Liguria, and so danus. (for the river is divided into many branches, and so dischargeth it self into the Sea) being not fully of belief that Annibal as yet had passed over the mountains Pyrenae. But when he understood, that he was ready even then to pass Rhodanus also; and doubting in what place to encounter and meet him, his people as yet not well recovered, after their being sea-sick: he sent before, 300 elect men of arms, guided by the Massilians, and certain Gauls that came to aid: for to discover all, and to take a full view of the enemies safely without danger.

Annibal having appeased the rest of the country, either for fear or by means of money, was now both the banks of Rhodanus: and mistrusting that they were not able to defend their Lands against the Carthaginians, on that side of the River which lay to them: because they might have the whole River to serve them for a good defence and rampier, transported over the Rhone all in manner that ever they had, and kept the bank on the other side. The rest of the inhabitants neer to the River, and even those also in whose territories Annibal had set foot already, both he himself with gifts allured to get together from all parts shipping, and to frame new vessels: and they of themselves likewise, were as willing to have his army transported, and their own country eased and delivered (they cared not how soon) of so great a multitude of troublesome guests. Whereupon, there was got together an huge number of lighters, barges, and boats especially, which E were made in halt without great workmanship; in which the people inhabiting thereby used to transport wares and commodities from one to another. Other new whirries also, the Gauls began first to make of the hollowed trunks of trees: and after them, the souldiers for that they had both store of timber and saw the workmanship but sleight and easy, made in halt certain bottoms, such as they were, like troughs without form or fashion, regarding no handsomeness at all, so they would but store on the water, and receive burden, in which they might convey over themselves and that which they had.

Now when they had prepared and made all ready for their passage, the enemies on the other side right against them, kept and covered all the bank along with men and Horse, putting them to much trouble and fear. Annibal therefore to withdraw them from that place, commanded Hanno F the son of Bomilear, at the first watch of the night, to go up the stream along the river side, one dayes journey, with part of the forces, and thole most of them Spaniards: and wheresoever he first could espie a convenient place, to cross the river, and to land as secretly as he could: and then to fetch about with his men, that when need were he might charge upon the back of the enemy.
Hereunto were appointed certain Gauls for guides: who from thence conducted them some 25 miles above, to a little Iland compassed about with the river, which here spread out in breadth by reason that it divided it self, and thereby the channel was not so deep: where they shewed him a place of passage. There, in all haste they cut down and hewed timber, and made boats, to set over Horse and man and other burthen. The Spaniards made no more ado, but fastning their apparel to vessels of lether like bladders, full of wind, and laying their bucklers thereupon, sat aloft and G passed over nimbly. The rest of the army also, with joyning planks and troughs together, was set over. Where having encamped neer the river, as being weary with their night journey, and toilsome work, they rested one day to refresh themselves, whiles their Captain studied and was occupied, to execute his commission and his intended service in good and convenient time. The morrow after, they removed from thence, and gave knowledge by smoke that they were passed over and not far off. Which when Annibal perceived, for that he would not lose the vantage of that time, he gave signal to his men also to get over the water. Now had the footmen already their boats prepared and fitted. And the courie and ranks of barges (which to receive and break the force of the current from above, transported the Horsemen, besides the Horses that swam after) made for the small boats that passed beneath, a gentle and calm water. For a number of Horses swam after the ships, haled by the bridle reins which were tied to the pouns, besides those, which being saddled and bridled, and fitted to serve the men of arms so soon as ever they were landed, were bestowed in barges and ferry boats. The Gauls stood upon the bank with loud hooping, hollowing, yelling and singing after their manner, who shaking their targets over their heads, brandishing and flourishing their swords in their right hands, shewed themselves ready to receive them, albeit so great a number and World of barges and boats full in their eye over against them, together with an hideous roaring of the water, might have scared them: besides sundry noises of mariners and souldiers, who laboured and strived to break the power and force of the water, and who being on the other side of the bank encouraged their fellows that were passing over. And thus frightened enough as they were, with the tumult and noise presented before their faces: behold there arose a more fearful and terrible outcry behind their backs, upon the forcing and winning of their camp by Hanno. And himself in person came soon after: so that they were put in fear on both sides. For not only out of the ships there was a great multitude got to Land, but also a power at their backs unlooked for, came forward and charged them. The Gauls, after they had made some resistance, and saw they were easily put back; brake through, where they espied the way to lie most open, and so in great fear they fled divers wayes into their Towns and Villages. Annibal then, having conveyed over the rest of his forces by leisure, cared no more now for any French stirs and tumults, and so encamped himself. But for the transporting of the Elephants, I suppose there were sundry devices: and certainly, how ever it was, the thing is diversly recorded. Some say, that when the Elephants were gathered together upon the bank, the most couragious and fiercest of them all, was chafed, angered, and failed of purpose by his master or keeper: and when he was purined of the beast, and to save himself fled from him, and took the River, thereupon the Elephant followed after him as he swam, and so drew after him the whole drove of the rest: and as any one of them, (fearing the depth) failed to wade, the very force of the River carried him to the other side. But it is more credibly and certainly reported, that they were conveyed over in certain barges: which as it was a safer way and surer course before it was practised, so when it was done and past, it was more easily credited. They caused therefore one vessel or barge, 200 foot long, and 50 foot broad, to reach from the strand side and the shore into the River: which because it should not be carried down with the course and stream of the water, they fastned to the bank above with many strong ropes, and like as it had been a bridge, they covered it over with earth, that the beasts might boldly go thereon as upon the firm ground. Now there was another barge full as broad, but of length only 100 foot; fitted and appointed to pass the River, and was tied and coupled thereto: and when as the Elephants (driven after the females going before) upon the steady barge, as it had been upon a causey, were gone over into the lesser which was fastned unto it: then presently was it loosed from the bonds wherewith it was slightly tyed, and so haled and drawn by certain galley boats, directed with oars through to the other bank. Thus when the first were landed, they went for more still, until they were all set over: and verily, so long as they were driven on still, as it were upon a long bridge, they nothing feared: the foremost only were afraid when the barge was loosened, and they parted from their fellows, and so were caried away into the wide and deep River, where thronging and struggling together, and jussling one another, they made some trouble, whiles they that were outmost gave back from the water as much as they could, until such time as very fear (when they saw all about them nothing but water) caused them to be quiet. Some of them also like raging beasts as they were, and unruly, fell out into the River, but by reason of their heaviness, they stood sure, and casting their Governors, they sought the sounds foot by foot, by little and little, and got safe to Land.

While the Elephants were thus transporting over, Annibal in the mean time had sent 500 Numidian light Horsemen to the Romans camp, as espials to discover the ground, where they were to learn what forces they had, and listen after their designs and purposes. This wing and troop was encountred by three hundred Roman Horsemen, sent as is aforesaid, from the mouth of Rhodanus: where there was a more cruel skirmish than for so small a number, for besides many hurt, there were slain on both sides in a manner alike: but in the end, the fear and flight of the Numidians gave the victory to the Romans, being now already much travailed and wearied: on whose part (being the winners) were slain 160, not all Romans, but some Gauls: and on the losers side who were overcome, there dyed above 200. This beginning and prognostication as it were of the war, as it portended and presaged an happy end and success of the whole unto the Romans: so it shewed plainly, that the victory would hang long in equal balance, not without much effusion of blood, and danger of their part. The conflict being thus determined, they returned each one to his own Captain. As for Scipio, he could not resolve to take any course himself; but according as he saw the plots and enterprizes of the enemy, so to frame his own. And Annibal again being uncertain whether to go forward with his journey begun, into Italy, or to give battel unto the first army of the Romans that came in his way and met him: was drawn away from all present conflict, by occasion of the coming of the Embassadors of the Boii, and of a great Lord and Potentate, called Maralus, who promising to be his guides unto him in his voyage, and companions in his perils, thought it good, and gave advice to invade and set upon Italy first of all before any

A any other war, whiles forces were entire in heart, no where put to the hazard, and to give them as it were the first hanſel. The common multitude of the Carthaginians (for that the former war was not clean forgot and out of remembrance) feared verily their enemies, but more their infinite journey, and the Alps eſpecially, the name whereof to men not experienced, was very fearful & terrible. Whereupon, Annibal being now reſolute to march onward in his journey, and to paſs into Italy, aſſembled his people to an audience, and by ſundry means, as well by way of rebuke, as alſo by encouragement, windeth and aſſayeth the minds of his ſouldiers. "I marvel (quoth he) what ſudden fright or new fear hath poſſeſſed your hearts, that ever before now have been undaunted; who have ſerved ſo many years, and alwayes won the victory; who departed not out of Spain, before that all thoſe Nations and Lands, which lie enclowed between two divers Seas, were brought in ſubjection to the Carthaginians; who taking indignation and great diſdain, that the people of Rome ſhould require all thoſe to be yeilded unto juſtice (as offenders and male-factors) that had beſieged Saguntum, have thereupon paſſed the river Ilerus, with this intent even to deſtroy and extirp the Roman name, and to ſet free the whole world out of their ſervitude and bondage: no man thought it long then of his travel from Eaſt to Weſt, from the ſetting of the ſun, to the riſing of the ſame: now when as ye ſee the greater part (by far) of our journey done and paſt, the foreſt and mountain of Pyrenæus, amid moſt fierce and cruel nations, ſurmounted; that great river Rhodanus, paſſed over; mangre the hearts of ſo many thouſand Gauls that would have impeached your paſſage, yea, and the force of his main ſtream overcome: now I ſay, when you are within the ſight of the Alps to the other ſide whereof lieth Italy cloſe; ye ſeem as it were, and ſtand ſtill tired at the very gates of the enemies. Why? what other thing take ye the Alps to be but high hills? And imagine they be higher than the cliffs of Pyrenæus, what? there is no land (I am ſure) that reaches up to heaven, and no place for men unſuperable. But for the Alps, they are inhabited, and they are tilled, they breed and feed living creatures and cattel: and are they acceſſible indeed, and paſſable for ſome few, and unpaſſable for whole armies? Theſe very Embaſſadors whom you ſee here, flew not over the Alps with wings, neither were their anceſtors time out of mind born and bred there, but came from other parts as ſtrangers, and inhabited Italy before; yea, and oftentimes have gone over the ſame Alps in huge multitudes, together with their wives and children, in manner of travellers and pilgrims that ſeek new countries to inhabit: what ſhould there be unpaſſable then or impoſſible for the armed ſouldier, carying about him nothing but instruments of war? For the winning of Saguntum, what perils were adventured, what travels were endured and ſwallowed for eight months ſpace? ſhould any thing then ſeem ſo hard and difficult as to ſtay them in their enterpriſe once begun, who aim at no leſs than to conquer Rome, the head City of the world? And have the Gauls indeed forced and won that in times paſt, which the Carthaginians deſpair now to come unto? Therefore, either ye muſt confeſs your ſelves inferior in ſtomack and valor to that nation, which ſo oft (theſe dayes paſſed) by you have been vanquiſhed; or elſe make reckoning with aſſured hope, that the goodly fair fields that lie between Tiberis and the walls of Rome are the end of your journey.

When in theſe terms he had exhorted and encouraged his ſouldiers, he commanded them to take their reſt and repoſe, to cheriſh and reſreſh their bodies, and to prepare themſelves for the march. The morrow after he departed croſs from the banks of Rhodanus, and entered the inland parts of France: not for that it was the more direct way to the Alps, but becauſe he thought the further he went from the Sea ſide, in ſo much leſſe danger he ſhould be of meeting the Romans, with whom he was not minded to fight, before he was arrived into Italy. After that he had travelled four dayes journey, he came to an Iſland where the two rivers * Arar and Rhodanus ſpring out of ſundry parts of the Alps, and taking a direct courſe, after they have run through a good part of the country, fall at length together and meet in one and the ground lying between is called by the name of the Iſland. Neer there inhabit the * Allobroges, a Nation even in thoſe dayes nothing inferior, either in wealth and power, or in fame and reputation to any people of ſtate of the Gauls whatſoever. But at that very time there was ſome diſcord and variance among them, by occaſion of two brethren who were aſſeſſed for the crown and Kingdom: the elder (whole name was Brancus, and had before enjoyed the ſeignory) was depoſed and thruſt out by his younger brother, and a luſty crew of the youth who as they had leſs right on their ſide, ſo they were the mightier. The deciding of this variance, was referred and put over unto Annibal, in as good and ſeaſonable time for his purpoſe, as he could have wiſhed: and he forthwith was made the umpire and judge, to determine whether of them ſhould be King: who reſtored the elder to the Kingdom: like as it would have been adjudged by the award of the Senators and Nobles of the country. For which benefit and good turn, he was ſerved with victual, and ſtore of all things abundantly, yea, and with ſayment and apparel, which he was driven to provide aforehand, for the name that went of the Alps, which for their coldneſs were in great diſreſpect.

Having thus appeaſed the debate of the Allobroges, and binding now to ſet forward to the Alps, he would not go the direct ſtraight way, but turned on the left hand to the * Tricassins, and from thence paſſing by the frontiers of the * Vocantians, he marched into the * Tricorians; and never was he ſtayed or impeached in his journey, before that he came to the River * Druentia, which deſcending alſo out of the Alps, is of all other Rivers in France moſt hard to be paſſed over: for although it carry with it a mighty force of water, yet will it bear no veſſel, becauſe it is kept and reſtrained with no banks, but running at once by many divers channells, maketh ever new new foords, and casteth up new shelves and whirl-pits; (for which cause also a footman hat h much ado to wade therethrough, and knoweth not the foords) besides; it rolleth down round stones and pibbles, whereby there is no sure nor safe footing for him that would wade through. And it chanced at that time, that it swelled and was risen high by fall of rain, and by land-floods, and caused them to have very much to do, that passed over it: and over and besides all other difficulties, they were of themselves troubled and disquieted through their own fearfulness and sundry cries which they made. Publius Cornelius the Consul, about three dayes after that Annibal dislodged from the bank of Rhodanus, was arrived with his army. (arranged in a four-square battel) as far as the place where the enemy was lately encamped, purposing without any stay to give him battel. But seeing the hold abandoned, and that he was not like to overtake him, being so far gone forwards; he returned to his ships at Sea, supposing by that means, with lesse danger and difficulty, to encounter Annibal as he descended from the Alps. But lest that Spain (which was the Province allotted unto him) should be left disarmed of Roman succours; he sent his brother Cn. Scipio with the greatest part of his forces against Asdrubal: not so much to defend their old allies, and procure new, as to drive Asdrubal out of Spain. Himself with a very small company returned to Genua, with intent to guard Italy, with that army which was about the Po.

* Genua.

Annibal being departed from Druentia, marched for the most part through the champion countries, and came in peace and quietly, to the foot of the Alps, for any trouble from the peasants that there inhabited. And albeit he had some knowledge of the Alps before by report, (which useth to make things that are uncertain, much more than indeed and truth they are) yet seeing now neer at hand the height of those Hills, and the snows, entermingled along with the skie; the rude and mishapen houses set upon rocks; the cattel, sheep, oxen, and hories, singed with cold; the people with long shagg'd hair, and without any trimming, both living and liveless creatures, even parched, stiff and stark with frost; and all things else more strange and illfavoured, than can be spoken: then began his souldiers to fear afresh. So soon as they advanced forward, and began to march up the first cliffs, there appeared over their heads the mountain people, who had seized the Hills: who if they had kept the secret and hidden vallies, and suddenly all at once charged upon them they would have made a foul slaughter of them; and put them to flight. Then Annibal commandeth the ensigns to stand still, and sent certain Gauls afore, as espials: by whom he understood, that there was no passage that way: whereupon, he pitched his camp amongst those craggy and steep rough places, upon as large a plain and valley as he could find. Then by the same Gauls (who much differed not in tongue and manners from the others) and had entermingled themselves in talk with the mountaineers) he understood, what they kept the passage, but in the day time, and slept away in the night, every one to his own harbour. So at the break of day he mounted those steep hills, as if he would openly in the day time march through the streights. Thus having spent the day in making semblance and shew of one thing: and intending another, he encamped himself strongly in the place where he had rested and laid: and so soon as he perceived, that the mountain people were departed from the steep hills, and kept not so streight watch and ward; after that he had made shew of fires, more than for the number of those that remained behind; and left with the Cavalry all the bag and baggage; with the greatest part of the footmen: himself in person took unto him the nimblest, most active, and valiant souldiers lightly appointed, and with all speed passed through the streights aforesaid, and encamped on the very hills which the enemies before held and beset. Then in the morning betime his camp dislodged: and the army behind, began to march and set forward. By which time the mountaineers, at the ordinary signal given, came forth out of their Castles and Fortes, and met at the usual place of their accustomed guards: but then all at once they might see some of the enemies over their heads, to have gained their own fortresses, and others also marching in the way. Both which objects at one time presented to their eye, made them blank and to stand still in a muse a good while. But afterwards, when they saw Annibal his army, distressed in the streights, and in great trouble and disorder among themselves in the march, by reason especially the hories were so affrighted: supposing, that the least fear and terror (besides) that they could procure, would be enough for their enemies overthrow and confusion, they crossed the rocks overthwart, and (as they were accustomed and used to them) ran to and fro, up and down through the blind and unlighted ways. But then verily the Carthaginians were much encumbered, as well by their enemies, as also by the disadvantage of the place, and more ado there was among them (whiles every one strove who should first escape the danger) than with the enemy. There was nothing that disordered and troubled the army in the march, so much as their own hories, which (by reason of the dissonant and divers cries, that the echoes between the woods and vallies redoubled) were affrighted: and also if any of them chanced to be stricken, galled, or wounded: they kept such wining, and singing about them, that they overthrow and made great havock of men, and of all sorts of carriage. Besides, the press was so great, and the streights of both sides so steep and craggy, that many a man was thrown down head-long a mighty height: yea, and some of them armed: and the sumpter hories and beasts for carriage especially tumbled down again with their loads as if a house or Castle had come down with a mischief. Which, although it were terrible to behold; yet Annibal for a while stood still, and kept his own men together for fear of encreasing this disorder and affright. But after that he saw his army disbanded and marching in disarray, and that it was to no purpose

A pose to lead his army safe through the streights, if he lost the carriages: for fear hereof, he ran down from the higher ground, and albeit, with the violence of his charge, he discomfited the enemy, yet he increased the trouble and fear of his own people. But that was soon appeased in a very moment, after the wayes and passages were once cleared, by reason of the Mountainers that were fled: so that within a while the whole host passed through, not only at ease and leisure, but also in a manner without any noise at all. This done, he seized upon a Castle, which was the chief strength of that country, with other villages lying about it: and for three dayes space he victualled and maintained his whole army, with the Carrel of his prisoners. And for that he was now neither molested with the Mountainers, who were at the first discomfited, nor B greatly encumbered with the difficulties of the wayes, in those three dayes he rid a good deal of ground, and journeyed a great way into the country: until at the length he came to another coast well peopled (for such Mountain and Hilly quarters;) where he had like to have been overtaken, not by open force, but even in his own professed cunning: first, by a subtile practice, and after by a secret ambush. Certain ancient men, the Rulers and Governours of the Castles, repaired unto Annibal as Orators, saying, That they having been taught and made wise, by the profitable example of other mens harms, made choice, rather to trye the amity, than prove the force of the Carthaginians: and therefore were willing to do his commandment, and be at his devotion: requesting him to take at their hands victuals and guides for their journey, yea, and hostages also for better assurance of promises to be performed. Annibal neither overhastily be-
 C lieving them, nor yet churlishly distrusting and refusing their offer, left being rejected and cast off, they might become open and professed enemies; gave them good language, and a courteous answer, received the hostages whom they gave, accepted victuals, which they had brought with them to maintain his army by the way, and followed their guides, but so, as his army was not disarrayed in their march, as if he had been amongst his friends, and in a peaceable country. First, went in the van-guard the Elephants, and the Horsemens: himself marched after with the flower and strength of his Footmen, looking all about him with an heedful eye. So soon as he was entered a narrow passage, which of the one side lay under a steep Hill that commanded them aloft, the barbarous people rose out of their ambush from all parts at once, both before and behind, and charged upon him both a far off and neer at hand: yea, and rolled
 D down mighty huge stones upon them as they marched. But the greatest number came behind upon their backs: against whom he turned and made head with the power of his footmen, and without all peradventure (if the tail both of his army, had not been strong and well fortified) they must needs have received in that lane and streights, an exceeding great overthrow. And even then, as it was, they came to an extremity of danger, and in manner fell into a present mischief. For whiles Annibal made long stay, and doubted whether he should engage the Regiment of footmen within the streights, for that he had not left any succours in the rereguard to back the footmen, like as himself was a defence to the Horsemens; the mountainers came overthwart, and flanked them; and breaking through the files of the battel, beset the way, and crossed upon him. So that Annibal took up his lodging for one night, without his carriages and Horsemen. The morrow after, when as the barbarous people ran between them more coldly than before, he joyned his forces together, and passed the streight, not without great damage and loss; but with more hurt of the sumpter Horses than of men. After this, the Mountainers (fewer in number, and in robbing wise rather than in warlike sort) ran in heaps, one while upon the van-guard, other while upon the rereward, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by staying another while behind, win and catch any occasion and opportunity. The Elephants as they were driven with great leisure, because through these narrow streights, they were ready ever and anon to run on their noses: so what way soever they went, they kept the army safe and sure from the enemies; who being not used unto them, durst not once come neer. The ninth day he won the very tops of the Alps, through by-lanes F and blind cranks: after he had wandred many times out of the way, either through the deceitfulness of their guides; or for that when they durst not trust them, they adventured rashly themselves upon the vallies, and guessed the way at adventure, and went by aim. Two dayes abode he encamped upon the tops thereof, and the souldiers wearied with travel and fight rested that time: certain also of the sumpter Horses (which had slipped aside from the rocks) by following the tracks of the army as it marched, came to the camp. When they were thus overtoiled and wearied with these tedious travels, the snow that fell (for now the star Vergily, was set and gone down out of that horizon) increased their fear exceedingly. Now when as at the break of day the engines were set forward, and the army marched slowly, through the thick and deep snow; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, slothfulness and desperation: Annibal advanced before the standards, and commanded his souldiers to stay upon a certain high Hill, (from G whence they had a goodly prospect and might see a great way all about them) and there shewed unto them Italy, and the goodly champlain fields about the Po, which he had under the foot of the Alpine Mountains: saying, That even then they mounted the wals, not only of Italy, but also of the City of Rome; as for all besides (saith he) will be plain and easy to be travelled: and after one or two battels at the most, ye shall have at your command, the very Castle and head City of all Italy. Then began the army to march forward: and as yet the enemies verily themselves adventured nothing at all, but some petty robberies by stealth, as opportunity and occasion served.

How-

Howbeit they had much more difficult travelling down the hill, than in the climbing and getting up; for that most of the passages to the Alps from Italy side, as they be steeper, so they are more upright: for all the way in a manner was steep, narrow, and slippery, so as neither they could hold themselves from sliding, nor if any tripped and stumbled never so little, could they possibly (they staggered so) recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well Horse as Man. After this they came to a much narrower rock, with crags and rags so steep downright, that hardly a nimble souldier without his armor and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep down. This place being before naturally of itself steep and pendant with a down-fall, now was choked and dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful and monstrous height. There the Horsemen stood still as if they had been come to their wayes end: and when Annibal marvelled much what the matter might be that stayed them so, as they marched not on: word was brought him that the Rock was unaccessible and unpassable. Whereupon he went himself in person to view the place, and then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compass about, yet he had gained nought thereby, but conducted his army, to passe through wilds, and such places as before had never been beaten and trodden. And verily that (of all other) was such, as it was impossible to pass through. For, whereas there lay old snow untouched and not trodden on, and over it other snow newly fallen, of a small depth; in this soft and tender snow, and the same not very deep, their feet as they went, easily took hold: but that snow, being once with the going of so many people and beasts upon it, fretted and thawed, they were faine to go upon the bare ice underneath, and in the slabbery snow-broth, as it relented and melted about their heels. There they had soul ado and much struggling, for that they could not tread sure upon the slippery ice: and again, going as they did (down hill) their feet sooner failed them: and when they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands or knees; if they chanced to fall again, when those their props and stayes deceived them, there were no twigs nor roots about, whereon a man might take hold, and rest or stay himself, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the poor beasts could do, was to tumble and wallow only, upon the slippery and glasse ice, and the molten slabby snow. Otherwhiles also, they perished, as they went in the deep snow, whiles it was yet soft and tender: for when they were once slidden and fallen, with flinging out their heels, and beating with their hoofs more forcibly for to take hold, they brake the ice through: so as most of them, as if they had been caught fast and fettered, stuck still in the deep, hard frozen, and congealed ice. At last, when as both man and beast were wearied and overtoiled, and all to no purpose, they encamped upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado cleared the place aforehand for that purpose: such a deal of snow there was to be digged, shovelled, and thrown out. This done, the souldiers were brought to break that rock through which was their only way: and against the time that it was to be hewed through, they felled and overthrew many huge trees that grew there about, and made a mighty heap and pile of wood: the wind served fitly for the time to kindle a fire, and then they set all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot, they powred thereon strong Vinegar for to calcine and dissolve it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with picke-axes, and made the descent gentle and easy, by means of moderate windings and turnings: so as not only the Horses and other beasts, but even the Elephants also might be able to go down. Four dayes he spent about the levelling of this rock: and the beasts were almost pined and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grass: and look what forage there was, the snow overhilled it. The dales and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sun, and rivers withal, neer unto the woods, yea, and places more meet and becoming for men to inhabit. There were the labouring beasts put out to graze and pasture, and the souldiers that were wearied with making the wayes, had three dayes allowed to rest in. From thence they went down into the plain country, where they found both the place more easy and pleasant, and the natures of the inhabitants more tractable.

In this manner, and by this means principally, entred the Carthaginians into Italy, five months after they departed from new Carthage (as some write:) and within fifteen dayes overcame and passed the Alps. What power Annibal had, when he was arrived in Italy, the historians do not agree. They that speak with the most, write that he was 100000 foot, and 20000 horse strong: they that make the least of it, say they were 20000 foot, and 6000 horse. L. Cincius Alimentus, who hath delivered under his hand, that himself was taken prisoner by Annibal (a writer of great authority) would induce me sufficiently to believe him, but that he setteth down the number of confusedly, by adding to the rest, the Gauls and Ligurians. He recordeth, that counting them, the Infantry was 80000, and the Cavalry 10000, which was conducted into Italy (but likely it is that from all parts there came more thither than so, and so some Authors do report) and that he heard from Annibal his own mouth, that after he had passed Rhodanus, he had lost 26000 men, and a great number of Horses and other beasts of burden, when he was come down into the Taurins Country, which was the next Nation in Italy, adjoining to the Gauls. Which being a thing agreed upon amongst all, I marvel so much the more, that there is any doubt, on which side he went over the Alps: and that commonly it is believed, that he passed by a place called Penninum, and that thereupon the top of the Alps took the name, and was so called. Cornius faith, he took his way over by the top of Cremus: both which passages surely would have brought

A brought him not into the Taurins country, but through the mountain forests, unto the Gauls called Libui. But neither is it probable, that in those days the same passages were open into France: considering, that the wayes which lead to Penninum were environed with nations half Germans. And certainly the Veragrians, who inhabit this very top (in case a man may build ought upon this conjecture) never knew that these mountains took the name of any passage of the Carthaginians, that way: but of some one place consecrated in the top of the hill, which the peasants and mountaineers called Penninum.

Very happily, and fitly it fell out for the enterprise of his first designments, that the Taurins the next nation he came unto, made war upon the Insubrians. But Annibal being busied in refreshing his army (that now had most feeling of their harms which they had caught before) could not arm the same to the aid and assisting of either party: for ease after travel, plenty upon icaricity, good keeping and delicate, after loathsome natiuells, did by a sudden change greatly alter and dissemper their lean and pined bodies, well near savage and wild grown. Which was the cause that P. Cornelius the Consul, being arrived and landed at Pisa, after he had received of Manlius Attilius an army of new and raw souldiers, fearful for some shameful disgrace and defeat lately received, made haste and highed him to the Po, for to give battel unto the enemy, before he were well refreshed and in heart again. But by that time that the Consul was come to Placentia, Annibal had dislodged and removed his camp, and won by assault the chief City or Town of the Taurins, because it willingly yeelded not to accept of his amity and protection; and lured by fear only, but also of voluntary good will, he had gained unto him the Gauls that inhabited about the Po, but that the sudden coming of the Consul interrupted and surprized them, as they were casting about to spie some opportunity of rebellion. So Annibal dislodged, and removed out of the Taurins country, with this opinion, that the Gauls especially, being doubtful as yet what part to take, would follow him being present in place. Now were the armies in manner one in sight of the other, and the Generals approached nigher together: and as they were not yet well known one unto the other, so they had already both of them a great opinion, and reciprocal admiration one of the other. For as Annibal was much renowned, and his name right well known among the Romans, even since before Saguntum was lost: so Scipio was taken of him, and reputed for some singular and excellent man, in that he especially above all other, was choien General against him. Which mutual conceit and impression they had, they augmented themselves one to the other: for that Scipio, albeit he was left behind in France, yet he met Annibal, and was ready to make head against him, so soon as he was passed the Alps: and Annibal again, because having enterprised so great an adventure, as to pass the Alps, and now brought the same to good effect. But Scipio to prevent Annibal in crossing the Po before him, removed his camp to the river Ticinus: and for to encourage his souldiers, before he brought them forth to battel, he made an Oration unto them, and began in this manner.

"My valiant souldiers and trusty friends, if I were now to lead that army into the field, which I had with me in France, I would have forborn to make any speech at all unto you; for to what purpose needed I to exhort, either that Cavalry, which so valiantly had vanquished the horsemen of the enemies at the river Rhodanus: or those legions, with whom I followed in chase as it were; even these very enemies, and whose falling off and refusing battel, I take to be a confession of victory? But now for as much as that army, being indeed levied for the province Spain, serveth with my brother Cn. Scipio, under my name and commission, where it pleaseth the Senat and people of Rome, they should be employed: to the end that ye might have a Consul to be your Captain, against Annibal and the Carthaginians, I have willingly offered my self to this war. If being then, your new Captain, and you my new souldiers, meet it is and convenient I should use a few words unto you. And to the end you should not be ignorant, either of the manner of this service, or quality of your enemy: with those men ye are to fight, whom in the former Punick war ye overcame both by land and sea: of whom for these twenty years ye have received tribute; from whom ye have won (as the due wages and reward of the war) Sicily and Sardinia both, and them do hold and occupy. In this battel therefore, both you and they are to carry that mind, and so to be affected, as winners and losers are to be: for never think that it is valor and hardiness that provoketh them now to fight, but meer necessity and compulsion enforceth them to the field. Unless you will believe, that they who when they had an entire army and unfoiled, refused battel, should now have greater hope, and take more courage, after they have lost two parts of their horse and foot, in the very passage of the Alps: and of whom, there have more perished in a manner, then remain alive. But well some man say, True it is, few they are in number, but stout in heart, and tall of hand, whose strength & puissance, no force is hardly able to abide. Images they are, say to say more truly, the very shadows of men, and no better: with hunger bitten, with cold starved, lost for want of keeping, spoiled with nastiness, and filthy, G ordure, bruised and weakened amongst hard rocks and craggy cliffs: over and besides, joints and marrow dried up and burnt, their sinews shrunk hard, and stiff again with cold and chilling snow, their limbs singed with bitter frost, their armor crushed, bruised and their weapons broken: their horses, no other then lame jades and poor hide-bound Tirs. See what horsemen, lo what footmen ye are to fight withal. Believe me, ye shall have the very reliques and last remnants of enemies, and not enemies indeed. And I assure you, nothing fear I more than this, that before ye shall skirmish with this kind of enemy, it will be thought that the Alps already have G g vanquished "vanquished and defeated Annibal. But peradventure it was so meet, and reason would, that "the gods themselves without mans help, should against that Captain and nation, which had bro"ken league and covenants, begin the war first, set it in good forwardness, and bring it to the point

 "of an end: and then we, who next to the gods have been offended and wronged, should finish
 "the same thus begun to our hands, and brought to so good a pass. I fear not that any man here
 "doth think, that I utter these brave and glorious words only for to hearten you, and that my "self think otherwise in heart, then I speak with tongue. I might have gone my self well enough
 "into Spain, my proper and peculiar province, (where I had been sometime) and with an army "of mine own: I should have had my brother there, both a counsellor to me in my distresses, and "a companion with me in my dangers. I found Asdrubal rather then Annibal mine enemy, and "no doubt, the affairs and charge of the war far less then here. But when I sailed by the coast of "France, and upon the bruit and news of this enemy was set a land, I sent my Cavalry before, and "removed camp as far as to Rhodanus, and in a battel of horsemen (for with that part of my forces
 "it was my hap to encounter and fight) I discomfited the enemy: and for that by land I could "not overtake his Infantry, so hastily they marched away, like men that fled) I was faine to return "to the sea, and embark again into my ships: and with as great expedition and speed as I could "make (considering so great a compass about of sea and land) at the very foot of the Alps, I was "ready to encounter and affront him. Can it be thought then, that whiles I shunned and avoided
 "fight, I fell by chance and at unawares upon this dread and redoubted enemy? or rather, that "I followed him hard at heels? and challenged him, to draw him forth unto a battel, thereby to "have it decided who should have the victory in the end? I would gladly make tryal, whether "all of a sudden the earth hath brought forth for these twenty years, Carthaginians, of another
 "mould or new stamp: or whether they be the same that fought neer the Islands Ægates, and "whom ye sent away, and let go from Eryx, valued after the rate of 18. * deniers a piece, and no "more: and faine would I see, whether this Annibal be the concurrent of Hercules; to undertake "his journeys and voyages, as he saith himself: or one left by his father, a tributary, a vassal, and
 "a slave of the people of Rome: who, but that he is tormented in conscience for the outrage and
 "and cruelty committed upon Sapuntum, would have some respect and regard, if not of his na"tive country (conquered and subdued) yet of his own house, of the peace and covenants writ"ten by his father Amilcar, and his own hand: Amilcar (I say) who at the commandment of our "Consul, removed his garrison from Eryx: who fuming and storming, received with sorrowful "heart the grievous and heavy conditions of peace imposed upon the conquered Carthaginians;
 "who capitulated and covenanted to abandon Sicily, and to pay a tribute to the people of Rome: I "would have you therefore (my hardy souldiers) to fight against him, not only with the same con-
 "rage as you do with other enemies, but in a certain heat of choler & indignation, as if you should "see your own servants and slaves on a sudden to rise up in arms against you. We might wel, if we "had been so minded, when they were enclosed and shut fast within Eryx, have put them to the "nimost extremity of all worldly pain, and famished them. We might have passed over with our "victorious Armado into Africk, and within few days forced and razed Carthage, without any "battel fought. We pardoned them at their humble request, and took them to mercy: we let them "out where they were besieged and beleaguered; and notwithstanding that they were by us sub"dued, we made peace, and contracted amity with them: and afterward, when they were mole"sted and distressed with the Africans war, we counted them within our protection. In recom-
 "pence of these good favours and demerits, they come against us, under the leading of an humo"rous brain-sick and furious young man, to invade and assail our country. And I would it had "pleased God, that we had all this war for our honor only and reputation, and not for our safety "and our lives. But we are to fight now, not for the holding and possession of Sicily and Sardinia,
 "as in times past: but for our freehold, and the inheritance of Italy: and that which more is,
 "there is no army behind our backs, to withstand and make head against the enemy, if we chance
 "to fail of victory: neither are there any more Alps, which while he is getting over, we might have "leisure in the mean time to assemble and prepare new forces. Here in this very place (souldiers)
 "must we stand to it, and make resistance, as if we were fighting under Rome walls. Let every man "think that he is not only to defend and ward his own body, but to protect his wife and little chil"dren: and let every one regard and take care, not for his privat affairs and domestical charge, "but often consider this, That even now the Senat and people of Rome beholdeth and seeth our "hardy deeds, and look how our force and valor now speedeth and sheweth it self, such from "henceforth will the state and fortune be of that City and Empire of Rome.

These words had the Consul to the Romans. But Annibal, supposing that his men were first to be encouraged by representation of some deeds, & then exhorted with words; having marshalled his army in a round compass (as it were) to behold some spectacle in a Theatre: he set in the midst of them all, the prisoners mountainers, bound (as they were) hand and foot: and casting down at their feet, the armor and weapons of the Gauls, he demanded of them by a truchman, or interpre-rer, Which of them (upon condition to be eased of his bands, and to have armor, and an horse of service, given him for a prize of victory) would enter into combat, and fight at the utterance for his life. And when they all answered with one voice, That they would with no better, and not one of them but called for a sword & required to fight: and therupon, the lots were shuffled to be cast, & not one there was but wished himself to be the man, whom fortune would chuse for the combat.

Then

* xx. lib. 2. d.

A Then every man as his lot fell in token of cheerfulness and contentment of spirit, leapt for joy among his fellows that rejoiced in his behalf, fell a dancing after their manner, and so (hastily) took arms and weapons: all the while that they were in fight there appeared such affection and disposition of mind, as well in them that were in the same state and condition, as also in those who stood there as spectators only in the multitude to look on; that no less happy and fortunate were they accounted, whose chance it was to die in the place, then those who had the upper hand. Upon the sight of some couples that were thus matched in combat, he dismissed them: and whiles he saw them in this good mind, so well affected and resolute, then he assembled them all together to an audience, and thus by report he spake unto them.

B "My valorous souldiers, if in the consideration of your own fortune, ye will anon but bear that mind, which even now ye shewed in beholding the example of the state of others; the journey is ours, and we have the victory. For that was not a dumb shew and bare pageant, but a very mirror and pattern of your own condition: and I wot not, whether fortune hath compassed about with harder bonds and greater necessities, your own selves, or your prisoners. On both hands, as well the right as the left, enclosed ye are, and shut up within two seas: and have not so much as one ship, to embark in for to escape away, and save yourselves. Before you neer at hand is the Pe, a greater river, and more violent then Rhodanus; behind you are the Alps to hem you in; the Alps, I say, which ye hardly passed when you were in heart and lusty. Here must ye either get victory (firs) or lose your lives, even where ye have first encountred your enemy: and the same fortune, which hath laid upon you necessity of fight presenteth and profereth unto you (if you go away with victory) such rewards, as men use not to wish for greater and more honorable at the hands of the immortal gods. If by our manhood and valour we should but recover and win again Sicily and Sardinia, which were got from our fathers; those were rewards and prizes sufficient; but now, over and besides, what riches or treasure the Romans in so many triumphs, have gathered, laid up, and held in possession, all that will be ours, yea, and the owners thereof themselves withal. Go to it then a Gods name, and take arms, in assured hope of gaining so rich a booty and reward. Ye have all this while been long enough a coursing and chasing the wild beasts in the wide and desert mountains of Lusitania and Celtiberia, and have seen

* Portugal.

Aragon.

D "no recompence and fruit of your travels and dangers: it is now high time for you to serve in the wars for good pay and rich rewards, and to receive great wages and prizes for your labour and painful service; you that have measured so long a voyage, passed over so many mountains and rivers, and marched through so many armed and warlike nations. Here is the place where fortune hath set down the utmost bound, and pitched the farthest point & limit of your labors; here will she give you a condigne recompence and salary, after you have served and followed the wars the full time, by order and law required. Never think that the victory will be so hardly achieved, as the war in name is counted difficult. For oftentimes an enemy of small or no reckoning and regard, hath given a bloody battel; yea, most noble States, most renowned and glorious Kings, have in the very turning of an hand been overthrown. For, setting aside this

E "goodly, gay, and glittering name only of the Romans, what is there wherein they are with you to be compared? To say nothing of that continual warfare of yours, for 20 years space, with such valour and happy success: even from Hercules pillars, from the Ocean, from the utmost bounds of the earth, through so many nations of Spain, and most fell and cruel Gauls, ye are come thus far with victory. And now shall ye fight with an army of new and untrained souldiers, who no longer ago then this very summer, were beaten, put to the sword, vanquished and besieged by the Gauls; an army (to say a truth) not known at all to their own Captain, & as little acquainted with him. And to speak of mine own person, if not born yet at leastwile brought up in the very tent and royal pavilion of my father (a most noble warrior and renowned Captain of his time) who have subdued Spain, conquered Gauls, overcome not only the people of the Alps, but that which is much more, the very Alps themselves. Should I make comparison between my self,

F "and this half-year Captain, who hath abandoned and left his own camp and army? Unto whom, if a man should this day, present the Carthaginians and Romans together, without their ensigns and colours, he could not tell, I dare well say, of whether army he were the leader and Consul. For I make no small account, I tell you of this (my tall fellows) that there is not one of you all, who hath not many a time and often seen and beheld my self in person, performing some warlike and military exploit; and unto whom I (as beholder and eye witness of his valor) cannot recount the time and place of his worthy deed & service. Then ye praised and commended me, then ye rewarded & honored me with divers gifts & presents. And even I (who have been a souldier trained up and taught by you, before I was your General) will march in battel against them, that know not one another, and are unknown likewise unto their Captain.

G "Which way soever I turn and cast mine eyes, me thinks, I see all full of courageous stomack, and forcible puissance. The footmen, old beaten and practised souldiers, lances and men of arms, with hard horses, and the light horsemen likewise, chosen forth of most hardy and valiant Nations: of one side, most faithful and resolute allies; on the other, doughty Carthaginians, ready to fight, as well in countries defence, as also for most just and due revenge. We come of our selves to make war, and we descend into Italy with banners displayed, resolved to fight with so much more courage, as they commonly who are assailants, have greater stomack and more hope then the defendants. Over and besides, our hearts are kindled, and our minds pricked

“on and provoked with sense of injuries and indignities. First and foremost they acquired, that I “your General should be delivered unto them, as a condemned prisoner at the bar: then they “would have had all you that were at the assault of Saguntum, yielded up into their hands, to be “put to most extream torturs & execution. A people they are, full of all excessive cruelty, insolent “and proud beyond all measure: they would have but all in their power, and at their disposition “they must prescribe, limit, and set down, with whom we should war; with whom we may “make peace; restraining and enclosing us within the terms and bounds of hills and rivers; “which, forsooth, we must not pass: and they themselves keep not the limits, which they appoint.
 “Pass not (say they) Iberus in any wise; meddle not at all with the Saguntins: come not near “them, Saguntum standeth upon the river Iberus, step not one foot forward, we advise you. It “sufficeth not their turn, that they have taken from us our ancient Provinces, Sicily and Sardinia, “unless they may have away Spain too. And if I should depart from thence, and quit that “Realm also, they would not stay there, but will pass over straight into Africa: nay, they have “sent over this year already two Consuls, the one into Africa, the other into Spain: nothing “have they left for us, but that which we can win and hold with the sword's point. Well may “they be cowards, and play the idle larks, having a place of refuge to retire unto, who in their “own country and ground may be received, when they take their heels and run through wayes “without danger, to save themselves. As for us, it stands us upon to play the men, and to make “account of no mean designs between victory and death, but upon certain despair of all shifts be“sides, either to obtain victory; or if fortune shall fail and give us the foil, chuse rather to die fight“ing, than to be killed flying. If this be settled and deeply imprinted in your hearts, if this be your “resolution, I will say once again, The day is yours. A more poynant and sharper goad, than “this, to provoke men to victory, never gave the immortal gods to any whatsoever.

When by these Orations, the souldiers hearts of both sides were inflamed to fight, the Romans made a bridge over Isonus: and for defence of the bridg, erected a sconce and fort thereupon. But Annibal while the enemies were busie at work, sent Maharbal with a Cornet of Numidians, to the number of 500. light horsemen, to overrun and waste the territories belonging to the allies of the people of Rome: commanding him withal, to make as great spae of the Gauls as he could, and to sollicit and perswade their Nobles and Lords unto rebellion. After the bridg was finished, the Roman army passed over into the Insubrians country, encamped themselves upon certaine hills, five miles off from a village where Annibal also lay in camp: who seeing there was a battel toward, sent speedily for Maharbal back again, and the horsemen: and thinking belike, that he could never say enough to his souldiers, and admonish them sufficiently to do well and animate them to fight, he called them all again together to an audience: where he proposed, and promised unto them openly, certain assured rewards, the hope whereof might incite them to fight; namely, Imprimis, that he would endow them with fair lands, in Italy, Africa, or Spain, where they would themselves, to have, and to enjoy to him and to his heirs for ever, as free hold in frank tenure, without service: if any one would chuse to have money rather than land, him he would content with silver. Item, of the allies, as many as hereafter were desirous to be enfranchised Citizens of Carthage, they should have their free burgeoisie: & those that had a mind rather to return home again, he would endeavor and bring about that he should live so well, as not one of them would wish for to exchange his state with any of his neighbors and countermen whatsoever. Last of all, look what bond-servants attended and followed their masters, to them he promised freedom: and that in lieu of them, he would deliver again unto their masters, two for one, of the slaves taken captives in war. And that they might be assured, that he would perform all these promises, he held with his left hand a Lamb, and in the right a flint stone, and prayed solemnly. That if he failed herein, Jupiter and the rest of the gods, would so kill him, as he slew that Lamb: and presently after his prayer done, he smote the Lamb on the head, and dashed out the brains. Whereat they all every one, conceived and embraced assured hope unto themselves, that the gods said Amen and were on their side: and supposing that the only stay of enjoying their hopes, and obtaining their rewards, was, because they had not fought already; with one heart and voice they called for battel.

The Romans for their part, were nothing so lusty; for besides other things, they were affrighted with new prodigies and fearful sights. For it hapned that a Wolf entred their camp, & after he had worried and torn those that came in his way, escaped unhurt. Also a swarm of Bees settled upon a tree that grew over the General's pavilion. Which strange tokens being purged and cleared by an expiatory sacrifice, Scipio with his Cavalry and darts lightly appointed, went toward the camp of the enemy, to view their forces, and to observe how many and of what condition and quality they were: and there he encountred Annibal, who also was gone forth with his horsemen to discover the country about. At the first they saw not one another, but afterwards, by reason of the thick dust that rose upon the march of so many men and horses, they knew that enemies approached near. On both sides the battailions made a stand, and every man buckled himself to the skirmish. Scipio placed his Archers and horsemen of the Gauls in the forefront: the Romans and strength of Allies, he bestowed behind for succours in the rereguard. Annibal set in this battel, his great baybed horses with his lances and men of arms, and strengthened the wings with Numidian horsemen. The very first charge and shout was scarce done, when the Archers aforesaid retired among the rereguard in the second battailon: by occasion whereof, the horsemen alone fought a good while in equal

A qualbattel: yea, and afterwards, because the footmen that were intermingled among troubled and disordered the horses, many either fell, or else alighted from their horses, to go thither where they saw their fellows to be environed and overcharged. The conflict became very doubtful in many places until such time as the Numidians (who were in the wings) wheeling about by little and little, shewed themselves behind the backs of the Romans: this fearful fight troubled them greatly, and the fear was increased by reason of the Consul his hurt: the extreame danger wherof, was put by and avoided by the rescue of his son (then a very stripling as yet, and scarce had any hair upon his face) this youth is he, who had the honor of happy ending this war, surnamed afterwards (upon the noble victory and memorable conquest over Annibal and the Carthaginians) Africanus. But the Archers were they that fled fastest away, even those whom the Numidians set upon first: The rest that were horsemen, keeping thick and close together, recovered their Consul within their files into the midst of them: and protecting him not only with their weapons, but also with their bodies, brought him back safe unto the camp: retiring all the way neither disorderly, nor like fearful men over hastily. The honor of saving the Consul, Calius attributeth unto a bondslave of Liguria. But I verily would rather beleieve it of the son: which also the greater number of authors do affirm, but the common fame goeth of the said bondslave. This was the first battel with Annibal: wherein it easily appeared, that the Carthaginians were better in Cavalry, and therefore the open plain field such as were between the Po and the Alps, were not so good for the Romans to fight in. The night following therefore, Scipio commanded his souldiers secretly without any noise to truss up bag and baggage, and to dislodge: and removed from Ticinus, and made haste to Po: that whiles his boats were not yet unloosed one from the other, in which (as upon a bridge) he had brought over his army, he might without any trouble and pursuit of the enemy, conduct the same back again. And they came to Placentia before that Annibal knew they were departed from Ticinus: howbeit, he took some of them that made stay on the hither side of the bank, as they were too slow about disjoining and loosening the foresaid bridg of boats: upon which he could not pass over, by reason that when both ends were let loose, the planks and all, went down the water with the stream. Calius writeth, that Mago with his horses, and Spanish footmen, presently, swam over the river: and that Annibal himself led over his army at the upper foords of Po: for which purpose, he set the Elephants along on a row to break and beat off the violence and stream of the current. A thing surely that they were hardly able to do, who were skilful and by long experience knew the nature of the River very well. For it foundeth not like a truth, that horsemen with their armor and horses safe, could overcome so great a rage of the river, although we should grant that all the Spaniards gat over upon blown bladders or leather vessels, and besides, they had needed many days to fetch a compass for to find the foords of Po, over which, the army (laden with carriage) might be conveyed. But those authors carry more credit and authority with me, who write that scarcely in two days they found a place to make a bridge (of planks joined together) over the river, and that Mago and the Spanish light horsemen were sent that way over before.

Whiles Annibal on this side of the River, staid in giving audience to the embassages of the Gauls, he conducted over the regiments of footmen more heavily armed: in the mean while, Mago and the horsemen, after they had passed the river, marched one * days journey apace toward the enemies at Placentia. And Annibal (few days after) encamped himself strongly six miles from Placentia: and the morrow after in the sight of the enemies he put his men in array, and made them offer of battel. The night following there was a petty massacre committed in the Romans camp by the Gauls that came to aid: but greater was the garboil and tumult, then the harm indeed. For about 2000 footmen, and 200 horsemen, having slain the warders at the gates, fled away to Annibal: whom he spake courteously unto, and when he had drawn them on, in hope of great gifts and rewards, he dismissed every one into his own City and Country, to sollicite and perswade their countrimen to side with him. Scipio taking that massacre as a foretoken and overture to the Gauls revolt in general: and supposing, that now being once guilty and tainted with this offence, they would in a madness run all to take arms and rise. Although still he were sore of his late wound, yet the night following at the relief of the fourth watch, he marched stilly, and removed his camp neer the river Trebia, into the higher countries, and hills, that were more troublesome for men of arms. But he wrought not so closely and without the knowledge of the enemy, as he did at Ticinus. For Annibal having sent out, first, the Numidian light horse, and then all his Cavalry: without question had disordered and endamaged the reereward, but that the Numidians for greediness of prey and booty, diverted aside, and turned into the tents, abandoned and forsaken of the Romans. Where, whiles they spent time in ransacking and rifling every corner of the camp (and when all was done, could find no pillage worth the stay) the enemy escaped their hands. And when as they had espied that the Romans were newly got over Trebia, and pitched out a plot for a camp, they intercepted a few of them that lingered about the river, and slew them. Scipio not able now to abide any longer the grief and pain of his wound, by reason of the shaking and shogging of his body as he travelled, and thinking it good to expect the coming of the other Consul his Colleague, (whom he heard already to be sent for out of Sicily) chose out a place neer the river which seemed most safe for to encamp in, and it he fortified. Annibal also lay not far off in camp: who as he was proud upon the late battel of horsemen, so was he perplexed for want of victuals, which scarcity increased upon him every day more and more.

as he travelled through the enemies country, finding in no place provision aforehand. Whereupon, he went to Clastidium, a town wherein the Romans had bellowed and laid up great store of grain: where, as he prepared with violence to force the town, there appeared some hope of treason, by corrupting of P. Brundisius, the captain of the garrison there, and that with no great sum of money; for in consideration only of 400. peeces of gold given unto him, Clastidium was betrayed unto Annibal: the very storehouse and garner of corn that the Carthaginians had, all the while they were in leaguer neer Trebia. Upon those prisoners that were taken when the garrison and fort was betrayed, he exercised no cruelty, because that in the beginning of his affairs, he would win himself a name and opinion of clemency.

Whiles the war by land continued thus at Trebia, there had been some warlike exploits achieved both by sea and land about Sicily, and the Islands that lie against Italy neer unto it. both by Sempronius the Consul, and also before his coming. Twenty gallies with five ranks of Oars, and a thousand armed men, were sent from the Carthaginians to invade and waste the coasts of Sicily. Nine of them arrived at * Lipara: eight fell with the Island of * Vulcan, and three were driven by tempest into the Straights of Sicily. Against them being delcrypted within kenning, there were twelve ships let out from * Messana, by Hiero King of the Saraceni, who hapned at that time to be in Messana, attending the Roman Consul his coming; and without any resistance made he boarded those three ships, and brought them away into the Haven of Messana. By those that were taken prisoners, it was known, that besides the twenty ships afore said, sent against Italy (of which Fleet they were) 35 gallies of five course of Oars, made sail for Sicily, to solicit and persuade the old allies there to revolt. Item, that the especial point and design that they shot at, was to seize upon * Lilybaeum: but they thought verily that by the same gust or tempest wherein they were scattered, that other Fleet also was cast upon the Island Aegades. And according to this Intelligence, the King from Messana writeth to Emilius the Roman Pretor or Governor of Sicily, advising him to keep a strong garrison in Lilybaeum: whereupon the Lieutenants and Colonels about the Pretor, were sent from him with all speed to all the Cities about, to give order, that their people might be in readines, to keep good ward, and above all, to hold Lilybaeum sure. And for preparation of war, there went forth a proclamation, that the sailors and mariners should bring into the ships ten days provision of victuals and meat ready dressed, to the end that upon the signal given at an hours warning, without all delay, they should a shipboard. Also that all that dwell along the coast, should from their sentinels, watch-towers, and beacons, espy when the enemies fleet approached. Now (albeit the Carthaginians of purpose stayed the course of their ships, that they might come just before day to Lilybaeum) they were discovered, both for that the Moon shone all night, and also because they came under sail which they had hoisted up. So soon therefore as the signal was given out of the Sentinels and watch-towers, & alarm cried in the town, the mariners were soon embarked: the souldiers also were bellowed, some to man and guard the wals, and guard the gates, others to lie in the ships. But the Carthaginians perceiving, they were to deal with them that were provided for them, (as being advertised of their coming) forbore to enter the haven until day, and imployed the time in striking sails, in untackling their ships, and preparing them for a battel. When it was broad day light, they retired into the deep, to have lea room enough to fight, and that the enemies ships might have free egress out of the haven. The Romans for their part refused not battel, comforting themselves with the remembrance of the valiant exploits performed in that very place, and trusting also upon the number and valour of their souldiers. They were not so soon lanced into the open sea, but the Romans were desirous to grapple, and to come close to hand fight: but contrariwise, the Carthaginians held off aloof, willing to proceed by cunning and policy more then by strength and meer force; and to make trial rather of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, then either of the prowels of men, or goodness of armor: for as their Fleet was sufficiently furnished, and to the full, with a multitude of mariners, so was it ill provided of souldiers: and wheresoever they grappled together and came to hand-fight, they had not an equal number of men armed to hold play with the enemies: which being once perceived, the Romans gathered heart, and redoubled their courage, by reason of their number; the other side again were discouraged and out of heart, for their default of souldiers. Inasmuch as seven Carthaginian gallies were soon invested round and boarded, the rest fled. Of souldiers and mariners together, 1700. were in them taken; amongst whom, there were three great Gentlemen of Carthage. The Roman fleet still entire and whole, save one vessel only that was bonged and pierced (yet able to be brought back) returned into the haven.

Presently after this battel, and before that they of Messana had knowledge thereof, T. Sempronius the Consul arrived at Messana; and as he entered within the sound, King Hiero met him, with a fleet well furnished and richly decked and coming forth of his royal ship into the Admiral of the Consuls, he welcomed him, and rejoiced for the safe return of his men and ships, and prayed God, that his voyage into Sicily might prove happy and fortunate. Then shewed he unto him the present estate, and the affairs of the Island; opened the designments of the Carthaginians; and promised withal, that with as good a mind and sound heart as in the former war against the Carthaginians, when he was a young man, he had aided the people of Rome: so now in his old age he would assist them: and for proof hereof, he would of his own free cost furnish both the Consuls legions, and also the mariners with corn and rayment. Among other matters he informed him how Lilybaeum, and other Cities on the sea coast were in great danger, by reason of

* Lipara, one of the Islands Aeolia.

* Vulcano, another of the same Islands. * Messana.

* Marsallaa City in Sicily, and a Cape there, called the Eye of Sicily.

A some among them that desired a change and alteration. Whereupon the Consul thought good to make no delay, but to set sail with all speed to Lilybaeum, whom the King and his royal fleet accompanied: and as they were sailing, tidings came of the foresaid battel before Lilybaeum, and how the enemies ships were either scattered and put to flight, or boarded and taken.

The Consul having bid King Hiero adieu, with his fleet set sail from Lilybaeum, leaving behind him the Pretor to defend the coast of Sicily, and crossed the sea himself to the Island  Melita*, which was held by the Carthaginians. At whose coming, Amilcar the son of Gisco, Captain of the garrison there, rendered himself, and 3000. soldiers within a very few, together with the Town and the Island. From whence, within few days he returned to Lilybaeum: where the prisoners

B (excepting certain noble persons of high parentage) were by the Consul and the Pretor both sold openly in port-sale. When the Consul thought Sicily on that coast sure enough, he set sail from thence towards the Islands of Vulcan, for that the bruit went that a fleet of Carthaginians there lay at road: but there were no enemies to be found about those Islands: for it chanced they were already passed over to waste along the river and coast of Italy; and having foraged the territory of  Vibo*, they put the City also in great fear. As the Consul returned back again to Sicily, tidings came that the enemy had made rodes into the country of  Vibona*: and he received letters also from the Senat, concerning the coming of Annibal into Italy; and therefore that he should with all speed possible aid and succour his Colleague. The Consul being at once troubled with many cares, presently embarked his army, and by the Adriatick sea, sent them away to  Ariminum*. To Sent,

C Pomponius his Lieutenant, he gave the charge of 25 Gallies for the defence of the territory of Vibo, and the sea-coast of Italy. With M. Emilius the Pretor he left a fleet augmented to the number of fifty sail: which done, and all things set in order in Sicily, himself with ten ships coasted along Italy, and arrived at  Ariminum*, from whence he put himself in his journey, and marched with one army to the river Trebia, where he joined with his fellow Consul. Now were both Consuls, and the whole puissance and force of the Romans opposed against Annibal, to wit appeared plainly, that either with that power the Empire of Rome might be defended, or else all their hope was gone. Howbeit one of the Consuls being weakened and discouraged with the defeat of his horsemen in one battel, and dismayed besides with the hurt he had received in his body, desired to have the fight deferred: but the other coming fresh and lusty, and thereby more hardy, would

It fell out so at that time, that the Gauls inhabited all the Country between the two rivers Rhoda and Po: who whiles these two most puissant nations were at strife and warred, held off as neutrals, and favoured neither side, making full account of the good will and grace of that party which should have the better. The Romans because they would now make no stir, and have no more irons in the fire, took the matter well enough: but Annibal was very much therewith offended, giving out very often, that he was sent for by the Gauls for their deliverance and liberty. Upon this indignation and displeasure, and for that also he would feed his men with booties, he commanded 2000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen, most of them Numidians, and some Gauls among, to overrun and spoil all the country forward even to the banks of Po. The Gauls standing in need of help, and having until that time kept themselves in doubtful terms, were forced to turn from those that offered them wrong, and to encline and cleave unto the Romans: that should revenge their injuries and protect them. Whereupon they sent Embassadors to the Consuls, requesting the Romans help for their land; which by reason of their exceeding fidelity, and too much loyalty of the inhabitants toward them, was now endangered. Cornelius liked neither the cause, nor yet the time to deal in such affairs: he had the nation besides in suspicion and jealousy, as well for many treacherous parts, as also (in case he would or could forget all or her lewd pranks of theirs) for the same disloyalty and falsehood of the Romans. Sempronius contrariwise thought in the strict bond to keep their allies in faith and allegiance, to defend those that came first to band and side with him. But notwithstanding his Colleague cast doubts and held off, yet he sent his own

F Cavalry, and a thousand well neer of footmen darters amongst them, to guard the country of Umbria beyond Trebia: who coming suddenly upon the enemies, and charging them at unawares, as they came scattered asunder, and out of order, yea, and most of them laden with spoil, mightily affrighted them, and made a foul slaughter, and pursued them in flight, as far as to their standing camp, and corps de guard. From whence (nevertheless) they were beaten back by the multitude that issued forth: but by new succours from their own companies, they renewed the fight again. The fight afterward was doubtful and variable: and although they made a saving bargain on both parts, yet the common voice gave the honor of victory (such as it was) to the Romans rather than the enemies. But no man made a greater matter of it, and reckoned it more to the full, than the Consul himself. He joyed, he made his boast, that he had got the better, with the help of the same forces,

G yes, which under the conduct of the other Consul, came by the worse. And now (saith he) the soldiers are comforted and refreshed well enough; and none there is but my brother Consul that would have the battel deferred: who no doubt is more hearted than bodily hurt: and for the remembrance and smart of a little green wound, quaketh to hear of the field, & of all things cannot a way with edg-tools. But we must not thus sit still here and wax aged for the pleasure of one cradle and sickly person. For what reason is it, that we should drive off longer, and spend more time in vain? What other Consul expect we to make up the third? or what army besides should we look for? The Carthaginians lie encamped in Italy, and well neer within the view and sight

“of the City of Rome; and it is neither Sicily nor Sardinia taken from them by conquest, nor Spain on this side Iberus, which they shoot at, to win again: but that the Romans should be thrust out of their native soil and country wherein they were born, that is their drift and designment. Oh how deeply (quoth he) would our Fathers sigh, how heartily would they groan, they who were wont to manage war about the walls of Carthage, if they should see us their off-spring and children, two Consuls with Consular and roial armies in the midst of Italy, frightened thus and panting for fear within our camp? And that Annibal hath subdued and brought under his subjection all the country between the Alps and Apenninum? These and such like speeches uttered he to his Colleague, as he sat by his beds side, where he lay sick: thus spake he, as in an open audience, in the Coss. pavilion and all that quarter, to the souldiers. The time also of the Election of magistrates at Rome, being so neer at hand, set him forward for fear, lest the war should be deferred unto the new Coss. and the opportunity withal, of winning all the honor to himself whiles his Colleague continued sick, pricked him on. Whereupon, for all the contradiction of Cornelius, which he nothing weighed and regarded, commandment he gave to his souldiers to be ready, to give battel anon unto the enemy. Annibal as one that knew and saw well enough what was best and safest for his enemy, could hardly imagin or conceive any hope to himself, that the Consuls would enterprises any thing rashly, or without advisement: but when he understood by hear-say, that which afterwards by good proof and experience he found true, namely, that the one of them by nature was hot, hasty, proud, and furious: and supposing, that he was the prouder and more furious for the late good hand he had of his forragers: made no doubt and distrust of the happy success and issue of a battel, whensoever it should come. Marry, careful he was, that no good time and opportunity presented unto him, should be overslipped: but to try the hazzard and fortune of the field, whiles the enemies souldiers were raw and untrained, and the better and wiser man of the two Generals, was unmeet for service, by reason of his wound as yet uncured: and the courage of the Gauls lusty and forward: for well he wist, that a mighty number of them would the more unwillingly follow, the further they were drawn from their own home. Annibal, I say, hoping that by these and such like occasions, a battel would be soon offered: desirous also himself to bid battel, if the enemy staid long: and being advertised besides by the Gauls, his espials (whom he employed to hearken out and learn what he desired to know, and thought them more sure, because they served in both camps) that the Romans were ready for the field: then began he (crafty Carthaginian as he was) to seek out a convenient place for an ambush. Now there was in the mid way between, a river running within the borders, having very high banks of either side, and therefore lying close hidden, and all about overspread with moory weeds, with briars, brambles, and brush-wood, as for the most part, such forlet places are overgrown withal. Which when Annibal in person had ridden about, and well viewed, perceiuing that it would afford lurking holes handfom enough even for horsemen there to be hidden, This shall be the place (quoth he to his brother Mago) which you shall keep. Chuse therefore out of all the horse and foot a hundred lusty tall fellows of each: and see you repair with them to me at the first watch, for now is it time to take repast, and to refresh your bodies. And with that he sent out to the camp the Criers, to call the souldiers to supper. And long it was not, but Mago was come with his chosen men, I see (quoth Annibal) ye are goodly men of person, and sufficient. And that ye may be as able in number, as hardy in courage, elect ye also out of the Cornets of horse and squadrons of foot, nine a piece such as your selves to sort withal. Mago shall shew you the ground where ye must lie in ambush: you shall find the enemy as blind as beetles, altogether unacquainted with these seats and cunning devices.

Thus Annibal having committed unto Mago a thousand horsemen and as many footmen himself betimes in the morning, willed the Numidian Cavalry, when they were passed over the river Trebia, to ride braving before the gates of the enemies, and by daring and shooting into their guards, to provoke and draw them forth to fight: with this direction moreover, when the skirmish was begun, to fall off, and seem to retire by little and little, and so to train them on this side the river. This charge had the Numidians. But the other Captains, as well of foot as horse, were commanded to let their Companies all to their breakfast: which done, to arm themselves, and with their horses ready saddled, to attend the signal of battel. Sempronius upon the alarm and hurlyburly of the Numidians, as being forward and desirous of fight, first brought forth all his horsemen, and bare himself bold and confident in that service; after that six thousand footmen: and at last, all his whole forces: and led them to a place which before he had designed and appointed in his mind. It fell out to be in Winter, about the midst of December, and a snowy day it was in those parts lying between the Alps and Apenninum. Now by reason of the rivers and moors so neer, both horse and men were exceeding cold: also for that they were hastily on a sudden, called forth fasting, and unprovided of all means against the cold, they had never a whiff of heat left in them: and the neerer they came to the air and vapour of the river, the sharper cold, pinched and pierced them through. But when as once they followed upon the Numidians that gave back, and were entered into the water (which by reason of the rain that fell by night was risen breast-high) they were not so soon gotten out again of the river, but all their bodies begun to chill, and be stiff again for cold, that scarcely they could hold their weapons: and withal, as the day went further on, for very hunger they fainted. But Annibal his souldiers, who in the mean time had made fires before their tents, and had oyl sent them to every company, for to supple and soften their joints and

A and his, and taken their repast, and sat at leisure when they heard say, that the enemies were passed the river, with hearts courageous and bodies fresh and lusty, take them to the weapons, and come forth to fight in ordinance of battel. The Baleares, and light armed men, to the number almost of 8000, he ranged before the standards in the front: after them he placed the footmen, better appointed and armed to the proof, even the very strength and manhood of all his forces: about the wings he set 10000 horsemen, and behind those wings, he divided and appointed his Elephants both on the one side and the other.

The Consul Sempronius seeing his horsemen following the chase on the spur, and out of order; and how at unawares they were charged again by the Numidians, who upon a sudden turned and made head upon them, sounded the retreat: and when they were rallied about him, he compassed his footmen with them. The Romans were in number 18000, of Allies and Latines, 20000, besides the aids of the * Cenomani: which Nation of the Gauls only, continued faithful and true to the Romans. With these forces came they into the field, and began the battel. The first charge of the skirmish was given by the Islanders of Baleares, upon whom, when the legions made head with greater violence, their light armed men were quickly brought into the wings: which was a cause that the Roman horsemen presently were discharged and distressed. For whereas of themselves they were but 4000 horse, and hardly able to withstand the shock of ten thousand horsemen of the other, the Romans also were wearied, but most of the Carthaginians fresh and untainted: over and besides, they were overwhelmed with a clond (as it were) of darts, flung and shot by the Baleare Islanders: Moreover the Elephants which appeared aloft from the hindmost ends of the wings frighted the horses especially, and not only with the strange sight, but also with as uncouth a scent and savor, made them flie every way. The battel of the Infantry was equal in courage of heart, rather then in strength of body: which the Carthaginians, (as having a little afore taken repast) brought fresh with them into the field: but contrariwise the Romans were fasting and weary, and for cold even stark and benumbed. Howbeit their stomachs would have served to have held out and withstood to the end, if they might have fought with footmen only. But both the Baleares, having disordered the horsemen, flanked them with their shot, and also the Elephants by this time were entred into the middle battailon of footmen: and withal, Mago and the Numidian light horse (so soon as this battailon was unawares gone past their ambushment and lurking holes) start up and arose from behind, and put them in exceeding trouble and fright: Yet for all these inconveniencies and disadvantages (so many on every side) the main battel a good while stood immovable and stirred not, but kept the array, and especially (beyond the expectation of all men) against the Elephants. For certain footmen placed for the purpose, by flinging of darts forced them to turn head: and when they were once turned fromwards, they followed hard upon them, pricking and galling them under the tails, in which place by reason of the tender skin they are soon wounded. Whom when Annibal saw thus feared and ready to turn upon their own part, from the main battel to the flanks and outsidies, he commanded them to be driven unto the left wing upon the Gauls that came to aid, and presently enforced them to run away. The Romans seeing their auxiliary Gauls put to flight, were driven into a new fear. Whereupon fighting now as it were in a ring and round on both sides, there were among them to the number also of 10000, who seeing no way else to escape, brake through the middle battailon of the Africans, which was strengthened with the aid of the Gauls, and that with a great slaughter of their enemies: and seeing they neither could return into their camp (the river being between) nor for the rain well discern how to succour their fellows, they took the way straight to Placentia. After this, the rest brake forth in all parts. They that took the river either perished in the streams and whirl-pools: or such as made stay to enter, were by the enemy overtaken and slain. But as many as here and there fled scattering through the fields, following the footing and tracks of the battailon that retired back, came to Placentia. Some for fear of the enemy, adventured boldly to take the river, and being once over, recovered the camp. The rain and snow together, and the intolerable cold killed many, as well men as beasts and in manner all the Elephants. The Carthaginians followed the enemies in chase as far as Trebia, and there gave over: and returned into the camp so clumse and frozen, as scarcely they felt the joy of their victory, by reason whereof the night following, whereas the guard of the Roman camp, and the remnant of that great company of souldiers passed Trebia with float-boats and flat barges, the Carthaginians either perceived them not indeed for the noise the tempestuous rain made, or for weariness and sore wounds were not able to stir, and therefore made semblance, as though they knew not of it. And so whiles the Carthaginians were at rest, the army was by Scipio the Consul brought (in a still march) to Placentia: and from thence having crossed the Po, came to Cremona, because one Colony alone should not be charged with the wintering of two armies at one time.

G Upon this defeat and overthrow, there arrived such fearful tidings at Rome, that they believed verily and looked for no other but that the enemy would come with banner displayed straight to the very City: and that there was no hope nor help left behind to defend their gates and walls from assault and violence. For seeing that the one Consul was vanquished at Ticinus, and the other also, who was called unto him out of Sicily; since both Consuls, and two consular armies were thus defeated, what other Captains, what Legions remained now to be sent for, to aid? As they were in this agony and fear, Sempronius the Consul came home: who with very great danger had passed through the enemies Cavalry, which was spread here and there all about, to fetch in booties; and

and more by venturous hardiness then good advice and hope, either to miss them unespied, or to resist if he had happen'd upon them, he got away. And after he had held the assembly for election of the Consuls (the only thing above all other for that present most desired) he returned into his standing camp to winter in. Now there were created Consuls; Cn. Servilius, and Cn. Flaminius the second time.

Howbeit the Romans were not in quiet within their wintering camp, for the Numidian host-men ranged about, and made excursions into every quarter, and (those who troubled and impeached them, more then they) the Celtiberians and Portugals. Whereby all convoy of victuals from every part was stopped, but only that which came by the Po, in Keels and such like vessels. Neer to Placentia there was a merchants town, both fortified strongly, and also well furnished with a good garrison: upon hope to force that castle or town, Annibal went with his horse and foot, lightly armed; and supposing that to carry the matter covertly, would avail much to the effecting of his purposed enterprise, he came upon them in the night; howbeit he was not so close and secret, but he was descried by the watch: who suddenly set up such an alarm, that it was heard as far as Placentia. Whereby, the Consul somewhat before day was there with his Cavalry, having commanded the Infantry to march on aiter, ranged in a square battailon. In the mean while the horsemen skirmished, wherein Annibal was hurt, and departed out of the skirmish, by which means the enemies were frightened, and the Castle, and hold manfully defended. After few days that he had taken his ease, before he was well cured of his wound, he went forward to assault Vicumvie. That was a town also of merchandize (or mart town) and had been fortified by the Romans in the Gauls war. Whereupon, the people bordering there about, on every side, fled thither to make repair, and much frequented the same: and even then for fear of rodes and excursions many of the Peasants and rural people retired themselves thither for refuge. This multitude (such as they were) upon the report of the valiant holding and defence of the fort by Placentia, were encouraged, and took arms, and went forth to encounter Annibal. And in the mid-way they chanced to affront him and skirmish, in no battel array, but as they marched disorderly: whereas they were on the one side, none but a rude and confused fort, and on the other side, both a Captain that might trust his souldiers, and souldiers also that might reckon upon their Captain, there were to the number of 35000, discomfited and put to flight, even by a few of their enemies. The morrow after, they yeilded themselves, and received a garrison within the walls, and so soon as upon commandment to give up their armor, they had obeyed and so done; presently a signal was given unto the conquerors to sack and spoil the town, as if it had been forced by assault: where there was not forgotten and omitted any calamity whatsoever, that might afford in such a case, memorable matter & sufficient argument for writers to record. So pitiful examples were practised upon the poor silly wretches, of all looseness and lust, cruelty, and inhuman pride and outrage. And these were the expeditions and enterprises of Annibal achieved for this winter time.

After this the souldiers took repose, but no longer then the intollerable cold lasted: For immediately upon the very first and doubtful tokens of spring; he departed from his wintering hold, and led his army into Tuscany, purposing to adjoin unto him (either by force or love) that nation also, as well as the Gauls and Ligurians. But as he passed over Apenninum, there arose so terrible a storm and tempest, and surprised him, that it surmounted well-near the foul trouble and encumbrance endured in the Alps. For the wind and rain together did beat and drive upon their very faces. At the first, for that either they were to lay away their armor, or else in striving and labouring to march on against the weather, and by the whirl-puffs of wind turned round about, and ready to be born down, they stood still: but when as now the violence and fury of the storm, stopped their breaths, suffered them not to take their wind at will, they were fain to turn their backs, and sit them down on the ground for a time. Then see, the skie thundered amain, and made an horrible noise, and amid those terrible cracks redoubled, it lightened thick. Whereupon, they lost their hearing and seeing, and for fear, all of them became astonished. At length it poured down, and thereby the wind and storm increased more forceably upon them. Whereupon they were driven N to this necessity, even to pitch their camp, even in that very place where they were so suddenly caught and overtaken by tempest. But that was to them the beginning of a new toil and travel: for neither could they spread and display ought, nor pitch any thing surely: neither would that which was pight down, continue and abide the wind, which rent and tare, and broke every thing, and hurried it clean away. And within a while, the water that fell, and by reason of the wind was raised aloft, being congealed once upon the cold tops of the hills, turned into a kind of hail and snow together, and came upon them with such a force, that leaving all things else, the men were forced to lie along, groveling upon their faces, rather stifled and smothered, then covered with their hillings. Hereupon ensued a frost, so violent and outrageous, that of that miserable and pitiful heap of men and beasts, that lay there along, there was not one for a good while could raise and lift up himself when he would, by reason, that for stark cold their snows were benumbed, that they could hardly bend and bow their joints. Afterwards, at length, when with bestirring and chafing their limbs, they gat some heat, and came again to themselves, and that here and there in some places they began to make fires; every one that had no means so to do, ran and fled to the succor and help of others. Thus for two days they remained there pinned up as if they had been besieged. Many a man and beast, and seven Elephants also of them that remained after the battel at Trebia, were starved and perished.

A By occasion hereof, Annibal departed from Apenninus, back again toward Piacentia: and when he had marched ten miles on his way, he sat him down and encamped. The morrow after he led against the enemy 12000 foot, and 5000 horse. Sempronius the Consul also, being now returned from Rome, refused not battel: and the same day, the enemies were distant but three miles asunder. The morrow after they fought on each side most fiercely and courageously, and with variable event and fortune. At the first-on set, the Romans had the better hand, so far forth, as that not only in fight they overcame their enemies, but also after they had discomfited them, and put them back, they chased them into their camp, and anon assailed the same. Annibal having ordained some few to defend the rampart and the gates, retired the rest thick and close together into the midst of the camp, and commanded them to give ear, and be inventive to the signal, when he would have them issue forth. Now was it the * ninth hour of the day, when the Roman Consul having roiled and wearied his souldiers to no purpose, and seeing no hope to win the camp, sounded the retreat. Which so soon as Annibal heard, and saw the fight withal to slack and was cold, and the enemy retired back from the camp, presently rallied forth himself with the whole strength of his Infantry, for he had sent out his horsemen both on the right hand and the left after the enemies. There had not been lightly a more fierce and cruel battel stricken, and more memorable, for the fatal mischief of both parts, if the day would have given them time to have fought longer. But the night parted the fray, which was hotly begun with exceeding stomach and courage. Whereupon, the confronting and charging one of another, was more eager, then the slaughter bloody between them: and as the fight in manner was equal, so they parted with loss alike. For of each side there died above six hundred footmen, and half as many horsemen. But the loss on the Romans side was greater than in proportion of the number, because certain of the degree and calling of Knights, and five Colonels, and three Captains of the Allies, were slain.

* Three of the clock after noon.

After this journey, Annibal went into the country of the Ligurians, and Sempronius to Lucia. To welcome Annibal at his first coming into Liguria, there were delivered unto him two Roman Questors or Treasurers, Cn. Fulvius, and L. Lucretius, who were intercepted by the Ligurians, & taken in a train of ambush, with two Colonels, and five others besides, whose fathers by calling were as good as Senators fellows: and this was done, because he should assure himself the better, that the peace and amity contracted with them, would be faithfully kept and observed.

D While these things thus passed in Italy, Cn. Scipio who was sent into Spain with a fleet and army for sea and land: having set sail from the mouth of Rhodanus, and compassed the mountains Pyrenai, arrived at a place called Emporia: where he disembarked and landed his forces, and reduced unto the Roman Empire all the country, beginning at the Lacetans, and so from thence all the sea coast as far as to the river Iberus, partly by renewing their ancient leagues, and partly by devising means to contract new. Whereupon, there arose a great name of him for his clemency: whereby he prevailed not only with the States by the sea side, but also amongst the inlanders and mountaineers, even to the nations that were more fierce & savage: with whom he not only made peace, but also wrought them so, that they took arms in his quarrel: and there were levied from amongst them, certain strong cohorts and bands for to aid and succour him. Hanno, whom Annibal had left for defence of that province, was not ignorant hereof: and therefore, before all was gone, and the country alienated, he thought good to meet with this mischief: and having pitched his camp in sight of the enemies, set his men in ordinance of battel. The Roman Captain likewise resolved not to defer the fight: knowing that so, he might be forced to encounter both with Hanno and Asdrubal, and rather yet he desired to deal with them one after the other single, than at once with both. But this battel was not so much dangerous. Six thousand enemies were left behind slain, and two thousand taken prisoners, together with those that were left for the guard of the camp. For both the camp was forced and won, and also the General himself with certain guards was taken prisoner. Moreover Stiffum, a town neer unto the camp, was won by assault: howbeit, the spoil and pillage of the town were matters of small worth and value: namely, the household stuff, and such pelf and trimpery of barbarous people, and certain poor base slaves. It was the camp that enticed the souldiers: by reason that not only the army which was now vanquished, but that also which with Annibal served in Italy, and left behind them about Pyrenus, all good things to speak of, that they set store by, because they would go lightly, and not be encumbered with carriages. Before any certain report of this overthrow came to Asdrubal, he had passed over Iberus with 8000 footmen, and 1000 horsemen, as purposing to make head against the Romans at their first coming: but when he heard how the field was lost, and the camp withal, he turned his journey to the sea. And not far from * Tarracon, he found the souldiers of the Amado,

* Tarragona.

F the mariners besides, wandering and stragling over the fields (for usual it is, that happy success should breed careless negligence) whereupon he sent out his horsemen every way, and with great slaughter and flight he chased them to their ships: and not adventuring to make any longer stay thereabout, for fear to be surprised of Scipio, he retired back to the other side of Iberus. Scipio also upon the first report of these new enemies, having rallied his forces together in great haste, after he had slightly chastised a few Captains, and left behind him a small garrison at Tarracon, returned with his fleet to Emporia. He had no sooner departed from thence, but Asdrubal was there in his place: and having induced and incited the State of the Ilergetes (who had given hostages to Scipio) for to revolt and rebel, even with their own youth waited the territories of all those that continued faithful confederates to the Romans. Afterwards, when Scipio was roiled roused once out of the place where he wintered, the enemy retired again, and quit all the country on that side Iberus. Then Scipio having in hostile manner invaded the countries, abandoned and left by him that was the author and cause of their rebellion, and by that means the nation likewise of the Ilergetes, after he had driven them all within Arbanagia, which is their capital town, he laid siege unto it round about, and within few days brought the whole seignory of the Ilergetes under his obedience: and besides a greater number of hostages then before (which they were constrained to deliver) he condemned them in a good round sum of money. From thence he went forward against the Ausetanes, near to Iberus, being associates also to the Carthaginians: and having beleaguered their City, he fore-layed and intercepted the Lacerans as they came by night to succour their neighbors, not far from the town, even as they were at the point to enter in. There were slain of them 12000, and the rest being well-near all disarmed, fled every way scattering here and there over the fields home to their houses. All the help and defence that they had who were within, was only the foul and cold winter weather, evermore naught and hurtful to assailants that lie forth. The siege lasted thirty days, during which time, seldom fell the snow less then four foot deep, and so covered the pentiles and mantlets of the Romans, that when the enemies flung fireundry times thereupon, that alone saved the same, & nothing else. In the end, upon the departure of their Prince Amurcius, who was fled to Asdrubal, they yielded, upon condition to pay twenty talents of silver, & so Scipio returned to Tarracon, there to winter.

But that year, at Rome and about the City, were many strange and prodigious signs seen, or at leastwise (a thing usual when mens minds are once touched with religion, and given to make scruple) many were reported, and soon beleaved. Among which, this was one: that a babe of condition free born, and but half year old, cried with a loud voice in the herb market Io Triumpe. Also in the beasts market, an Ox of himself undriven, climbed up to the third loft or story of an house, and from thence being frightened with the stir and noise of the dwellers by, cast himself down. Moreover, there was seen in the welkin or element, the resemblance of a navy of ships: and the Temple of Lady * Spes, standing in the herb market, was smitten with lightning. Likewise at Lanuvium the spear of Juno shook and brandished of it self: and a Raven flew into Juno's Church, and lighted upon the very Shrine or Altar of Juno. In the territory of * Amitemum, in many places were seen men, as it were, in white garments, but only afar off: for as folk went neerer and neerer, they appeared not, and could not be met withal. In Picenum it rained stones: and at Cere the lots were found diminished: and in Gaul, a Wolfe drew forth a watchman his sword out of his scabbard, and carried it away. For other prodigious tokens, order was given to the Decemvirs to peruse the books of Sibylla. But for the raining of stones in Picenum, there was ordain a Novendial feast for nine days: and for the expiation of the other prodigies, the whole City in manner was occupied in their devotions. And now above all other things the City was solemnly purged, and greater beasts killed in sacrifice in the honor of those gods, for whom they were ordained, and a present of gold weighing * 40. pound, was carried unto Juno at Lanuvium.

* The goddess Hope.

* 1440 l. ster.

And the dames and matrons of Rome erected a molten image of brass for Juno in Aventinum: and at Cere where the lots were diminished, was appointed a Lectistern, and a procession or supplication to Fortune in Algidum. At Rome also there was a Lectistern solemnized to Juvens [the goddess of youth] and a solemn procession at the church of Hercules. Moreover, express commandment was given to all the people, to make procession and supplication at every Altar and Shrine of their gods. And to god Genius, they sacrificed five greater beasts. And C. Attilius Serranus the Pretor, was commanded to pronounce a solemn vow, in case the Common-weal continued in the same good estate, ten years, and decayed not. These portentous prodigies thus expiated, and vows made according to Sibylls books, eased mens hearts mightily of their religious fear. Then one of the elect Consuls, to wit, Flaminius, to whom were allotted those Legions which wintered at Placentia, sent an Edict with Letters to the Consul, that the Army should be in camp at Ariminum, upon the * Ides of March. His purpose was, to enter into his Consulship in the Province, remembering the old contentions and debates which he had with the Nobles, first when he was a Tribune of the Commons, and afterwards when he was Consul, as well about the Consulship (of which, they would have deprived him) as also, about the triumph, which they denied him. Hated he was besides of the Senat, for the new Act or Law, which Q. Claudius (a Tribune of the Commons) had made, so prejudicial to the Senat: and only C. Flaminius of all the Nobles, supported it and set it forward: namely, That no Senator, or father of a Senator should have a Ship at Sea, bearing above * 300. Amphores: for that was thought sufficient to transport their commodities and fruits to Rome, rising out of their Lands and livings. And as for all other gain by traffick, it was not befitting a Nobleman and Senator. This matter having been debated with great contention, caused the proposer of this law (Flaminius) to incur much evil will and displeasure with the Nobility, but it procured him the affection and love of the Commons, and in process of time a second Consulship. Supposing therefore, that with iterating the Auspices, and putting him to take the presages anew by the flight of birds, and by finding other delays, upon occasion of the Latine holy days, and one business or other belonging to the Consuls charge, they would detain and keep him back still in the City, he set a countenance, as though he would take a journey like a private person, and so departed secretly into the Province. Which thing when it was once blazed abroad, made the Nobles who were afore maliciously bent against him, to be angry anew: and they gave out, that it was not the Senat only, that C. Flaminius warred against against, but the immortal Gods also. For he, who before time had been made Col. without regard of taking Auspices, and having the approbation of the birds, when he was reclaimed and called both by God and man out of the field, obeyed not; and now, having a heavy conscience, discharged with offences past, hath fled from the Capitol and the solemn nuncupation and making of vows, for that he would not upon the ordinary day of entering his Magistracy, visit the Temple of Jup. Opt. Max. nor (because he was odious to the Senate) and they likewise hated of him alone) see them, and ask their advice and counsellors nor proclaim the Latin Holy-dayes, and celebrate to Jup. Latialis the solemn yearly sacrifice upon the Alban hill: nor yet, after he had entred into the Capitol by the lucky sight and token of birds, pronounce his vows there, and depart from thence in his rich coat-armour toward the Province. They said moreover, that he was slip and holmsecretly away like a dudgeon that followeth the camp, without the ensignes and ornaments of authority, without Sergeants and Officers, as if he had been banished, and so left his country, minding belike to enter his government more for the honor and dignity of Arminum than of Rome, and to put upon him his purple robe of estate, embroidered with scarlet rather in an hostlerry and common Inne, than in his own house. They all every one opined and judged that he should be recalled and brought back again peremptorily, yet and he forced personally at home to perform all duties belonging to God and man, before that he went forth to the Province and to the army. About this embassage (for they thought meet to send Embassadors) went Q. Terentius, and M. Antistius: but they prevailed no more than in his former Consulship the letters missive had done, which were sent from the Senat. A few dayes after he entred his office, and as he was sacrificing, the Calf or young Bullock being already sticke, got away from the hands of the sacrificers, and spotted many of the standers by with blood. But they that stood far off, not knowing what the matter was of that stir, fled away, and ran to and fro: which of most men was judged a foretoken and prelage of some great affright and trouble. After this, when he had received the two legions of Sempronius, the Consul of the year before, and other two, of C. Asinius the Pretor, he began to conduct his army into Tuscany by the way of Apenninum.

ANnibal came into Hetruria, after he had lost one of his eyes by occasion of continual watching in the marshes, through which he marched four dayes and three nights, without taking his repose or sleep. C. Flaminius the Consul a rash and inconsiderate man, went forth contrary to the warrent and approbation of the Auspices, and caused the field-ensignes to be digged out of the ground, when others sa they could not be plucked up: and being wounded on Horseback, fell with his head forward from his horse. His fortune was to be surprised in an ambush by Annibal, which he had laid for him near the Lake called Thralymenus: where he and his army were defeated, and fell upon the edge of the sword. Sit those said Romans, who brake through and made an escape, notwithstanding the faithful promise that Maharbal had made unto them, were by the fallhood of Annibal put in prison. When upon the news of this overthrow, there was great mourning and sorrow at Rome, there forewent two mothers to die for their joy, that beyond their hope and expectation, they recovered their sons, and saw them alive, whom they supposed to have been slain in this field. In regard of this foresaid defeat, there was vowed a sacred spring, according to the books of Sibylla. After this, when Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator sent against Annibal, would not come to a set battell with him, for fear he should have a discomfite: the soldiers labaly terrified and daunted with aduerso overthrow, against an enemy lusty and proud of so many victories, and by making head, and opposing himself only against Annibal, impeached his attempts and enterprises. M. Minucius the General of his Horse, a man of a proud spirit and brayn sick humours, with charging the Dictator, and accusing him and the people for a fearful and cowardly person, prevailed so much by his virtue of their power and authority, he was joined in equal commission and command with the Dictator. By means whereof, the army and the forces were divided indifferently between them, and Minucius gave the enemy battell in a place of great disadvantage, whereupon his Legions were distressed with great hazard: but F. Maximus came in time to his rescue with his part of the army, and saved him out of the present danger. By occasion of which good turn, he was overcome, and his stomach came down in so much, as he was content to join in camp with him, and saluted him by the name of Father, commanding all his own soldiers to do the same to their fellow soldiers. After F. Maximus, Annibal after he had in field and overrun Campania, chanced between the Town Capua, and the mountain Calicula to be inclosed and compassed about by Fabius: but by a defect of food, the Romans of this stricke were overborne, and setting them on fire, put to flight and chased away the part of the Romans, which he kept the straighter of Calicula, and by that means gat through the passage of that Forrest. The same Annibal, at what time as he made harock and burned all the territory about for bare to touch the Land of Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator, to the end, that he might bring him into a suspicion of treason to the State. After this, when Emilius Paulus, and Terentius Varro were Consuls and Generals of the army, there was a battle fought with Annibal, to their exceeding losse and utter overthrow, near unto a village called Cannæ. At which field there were slain of Romans, 45000. together with Paulus the Consul, and fourscore Senators, besides thirty other notable personages that had been Consuls or Prætors, or at leastwise, Aediles of State. After this defeat, when the noble young Gentlemen of the City (for very despair of the State) were in counsell to abandon Italy, P. Cornelius Scipio (a Colonel, who afterwards was surnamed Africanus) held his naked sword over their heads, as they sat in consultation, and swore a great oath, that he would repulse him for a mortal enemy, that would not swear after him: and hereby effected thus much at their hands, that by vertue of an oath, they obliged themselves not to depart out of Italy, and forsake their native country. This book containeth besides, the fights and lamentation made within the City, and the affairs and exploits achieved in Spain, with more happy success. Opimia and Feronia, two professed vestal Virgins, were convicted of incest, and condemned. By reason of small number of souldiers and servicable men for the wars, there were 8000 slaves put in arms. The Captives taken prisoner in the wars, when they might have been redeemed, were not ransomed for all that. A solemn warning there was for Varro his wicked home, with great thanksgiving, because he had not dispaired of the Common-weal.

The two and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

NOW approached the spring, when Annibal removed out of his wintering holds, after he had assayed before to pass over the Apennine, but in vain, by reason of the intolerable cold; where also he layed in great fear and danger of his own person. By which time, the Gauls, who having risen up in arms on his side, for hope of spoil and pillage, seeing now in stead of harrying and carrying away of booties out of other mens Lands, that their own country was become the place of the war troubled and molested as well with the one army as the other which abode there all winter turned their hatred and malice from the Romans back again upon Annibal: In such sort, as after he had been sundry times foiled by the secret trains of their Princes, and in danger to be murdered, he escaped only by the deceitfulness and fallshood practised among their own selves. For with what inconstancy and levity they had conspired together, with the same they betrayed one another, and detected the conspiracy unto him. By means whereof, as also by changing one while his apparel, another while the bonnet and attire of his head, by error also and mistaking, he avoided the peril, and saved himself. But so it was, that even this fear in which he stood, caused him to remove the sooner out of his wintering harbour.

* 19 day of March.

About the same time Cn. Servilius entred into his Consulship at Rome, on the * Ides of March, where, after he had propounded to the Senat concerning the affairs of the Common-weal, the hatred and malice which the LL. had conceived against C. Flaminius, was renewed afresh. For they said, that they created two Consuls, and had but one. For that lawful government and authority which Flaminius should have had, that auspice of Magistracy which was meet and due, he ought to have carried with him from the City, from the publick and private habitations, after he had celebrated the Latin holy-dayes, and offered sacrifice upon the mountain Alta, and made his solemn vows accordingly, within the Capitol. But since for default herein, he departed from the City a private person, the Auspices of government could not follow and accompany him: and being gone without them, he might not lawfully take the same anew in forreign soil. Now there were sundry strange prodigious tokens besides, reported from many places at once, which much entreated their fear: namely, that in Sicily certain souldiers javelins were on fire: and in Sardinia, a Horsemans walking staff, as he went the round, and visited the watch upon the wall, burned in his hand: That upon the Strand and Sea shore, there were seen many light fires, so as all the coasts shone again withall: That two shields sweat blood: That there were some souldiers smitten dead with lightning: That the circle and body of the sun appeared in sight less in compass and eclipsed: Also, that there fell from the skye burning stones, at Prencesse: And at Ar there were seen in the Element, Palm or Date Trees: and the sun fighting with the moon: Moreover, at Capua two moons arose and shewed in the day time: that at Cere, the waters ran mingled with blood: That the very fountain of Hercules yeilded and cast up water bespotted with blood: That as folk reaped in Latium fields, certain bloody ears of corn light into their baskets: At Faleris the heaven seemed to cleave in sunder and open, and to shew as it were a great chink; and out of the place where it gaped, there shone a great light: That the lots of their own selves diminished, and one fell out of the pitcher, with this inscription, Mars brandisheth and shaketh his spear. And about the same time at Rome the Statue of Mars sweated in the high way Appia, near to the images of the wolves: and at Capua the welkin seemed to be on fire, and the form of a moon to fall down in a rain or shower. After this, men gave belief also to prodigies of small importance: namely, that some mens goats, in stead of hair bare wools: that a hen turned into a cock, and a cock proved to be a hen. These things as folk reported, were declared abroad, and the authors brought into the Senat: where the Consul propounded before the LL. and required their advice, as touching matters of Religion. Whereupon, there passed a decree that these strange tokens, some should be purged and expiated with greater sacrifices, other with young sucklings:

A and that for three dayes, there should be supplications at all the Shrines and Altars of the Gods. As for other matters, after that the Decemvirs had looked into their books, such provision was to be made, as the Gods in their veries should foretel to stand with their pleasure and contentment. So, by the advaysements and directions of the Decemvirs it was decreed as followeth: First, and foremost, that to Jupiter there should be made of gold a thunderbolt or form of lightning weighing 50 pounds, and another of silver, presented unto Juno and Minerva. Item to Juno Regina there should be sacrifice offered in the mount Aventine, and to Juno Hospita in Lanuvium, of greater beasts: Item, that the dames of Rome, making a contribution (every one to their ability) of a sum of money, should offer an Oblation unto Juno Regina and bring it into Aventine, and there solemnise a Lectistern: Item, that the very Libertin or enfranchised women also, should according to their power, lay their money together and make a present for the goddess Feronia. These things accomplished, the Decemvirs sacrificed in the market place of Ardea, and for that purpose killed greater beasts. Last of all, by direction out of the books of Sylla, now in the month December, they celebrated a sacrifice at Rome in the Temple of Saturn: and commandment was given that a Lectistern should be solemnized (which bed and table the Senators themselves spread and set out with all the furniture) and a publick feast besides, in any hand: and throughout the City both by day and night were proclaimed the solemn Saturalia: and order directed, that the people should hold and observe that day, as holy and festival, forever.

While the Consul was busied at Rome in pacifying the Gods, and levying souldiers, Annibal (who was departed from his wintering fort, because the rumor ran that Flamininus the Consul was come as far as Arretium) albeit he saw another way more ready and commodious (though it were somewhat farther about) yet chose that which was the neerer through the marshes, where as the River Arno at the same time had overflowed his banks more than usually. As for the Spaniards, Africans, and all his old bearen souldiers (the very flower and strength of his army) he commanded to march foremost together with all their baggage and carriages among them; to this end, that if they were forced any where to stay, they should not fail and want necessities about them: the Gauls he appointed to follow next: and because he was desirous that those kind of people, should be in the middle ward, and the Horsemen likewise to go after them hindmost in the reregard, he charged Mago with the light Horsemen of the Numidians, to guard the army and keep them close together in their march, but especially to have an eye to the Gauls, and keep them in, for fear lest they for tediousness of travail, and weariness of long way (as they are a Nation tender enough and not able to abide any hardships) should either sink away, or else stand still. They of the vanguard what way soever the guides led them and went afore, passed through thick and thin, waded through great Rivers and deep quicksands: and albeit they were mired and in a manner overwhelmed and swallowed up of bogs and muddy quagmires, yet they followed still their colours. But the Gauls, if their feet chanced, to slip, could not hold themselves, and when they were down, they were not able to arise out of the dirty sloughs and holes: neither could any of them comfort his corps with congage, nor help his heart with hope of better. Some of them hardly haled their heavy hams, and drew with much adoe their lazie legs and lagging limbs after them: others, whose hearts were done for tedious toil and travail, when they were once down, lay dying amongst the jades and other beasts, which also were conched along every where. But that which hurt and undid them most, was their want of sleep, for they had watched four dayes and three nights continually without a wink. Now when as the water had to covered and overspread every place, that they could find no drie ground, to lay their wearied bodies on, they were faine to pile their packs one upon another in the water, and to cast themselves aloft upon them. All the way as they went, they might see the beasts and Horses lie every where on heaps overthrowen and dead: which served them a while, instead of Couches for want of other means, who sought but only for some thing or other, that appeared above water to repose themselves upon, for to take a nap. As for Annibal himself, (who had already an infirmity in his eyes, which came first by the distemperature of the spring season, now hot and then cold) he was mounted upon an Elephant, the only Elephant that was left alive: this beast bare him a good way above the water: but by reason that he had overwatched himself, and the moist nights besides together with the damp and mist of the foggy fens stuffed his head and filled him full of rheums, and because neither time nor place served for any cure and to take Physick, he lost one of his eyes quire.

Thus after many a man lost, many a Horse piteously perished, when he was got out at length of these foul fens and miry marshes, in the first dry ground that he came unto, he pitched his camp: and was certified by his espials and vancourtiers whom he had sent out before, that the Roman army lay about the walls of Arretium. Then with great diligence and careful enquiry he endeavoured, to found the intent and the designe of the Consul: to know the coasts and site of the country: to hearken what wayes he travailed; to learn what forces he had: to be advertised how he was stored and provided of victuals: and to understand all other things expedient for his purpose in such a case, and necessary to be known. The country was most fertile and fruitful, as any one in all Italy, to wit, the goodly champaign fields of Tuscany, lying between Felsina, and Arretium; plentiful in corn, abundant in cattel, and richly stored with all good things. The Consul was stout and proud, by reason of the former Consulship that he had borne: little account he made of the Majesty of Laws, and authority of Senators, and as small regard and reverence he had of the Gods themselves: which rashness, as it cost him nought, but was ingrafted in him by nature, so fortune had nourished and maintained the same with prosperous success in his affairs at home, and wars abroad; so as it appeared evidently, that since he respected neither God nor man, and deigned not to take their counsel and advice, he would go rashly to work, and do all in haste, hand over hand, without discretion. And to the end he might be more forward to plunge himself headlong into these his infirmities and imperfections, Annibal devised to anger him, and to move his patience. Leaving the enemy therefore on his left hand, he put himself into the way to Fesula for to waite and spoil the country of Tuscan; and shewed to the Consul a far off, what foul work and havock he possibly could make; with fire and sword. Then Flaminius, who of himself would not have rested and sate still, in case Annibal had been quiet, seeing once the goods of his allies and friends, harried and driven away even before his eyes, and thinking it tended greatly to his shame and dishonor, that a Carthaginian should march thus at his pleasure, through the mids of Italy, and without any empeaching and controulement, to pass on forward, even to besiege and assault the walls of Rome; when all others about him sitting in counsaile, gave advice for profit and safety, rather than for shew and bravery; namely, to pause a while, and expect the coming of his Colleague, that they might with joynt armies, with one heart, and with common accord of counsel, conduct and manage the war: and in the mean time, with the Cavalry, with Auxiliary or aid-souldiers lightly armed, repress the enemy, and stay him from spoiling so licentiously at his pleasure; in a great chafe and choler he rose up, and departed out of the Councel, and presently sounded the march, and gave the signal of battail: and withal, "Nay we were best (quoth he) to remain and sit here still before the walls of Arretium: for this," he like, is our native countrey, and here is our place of habitation: as for Annibal, let him escape forth of our hands, and waite all Italy; let him spoil afore him, and over-run all with fire and sword, until he be as far as Rome walls: and let not us, in any case once stir from hence, before that the Senators send for C. Flaminius from Arretium, as sometimes they called Cannib from Vei. With these and such like reproachful and taunting words, he commanded in all haste the standards and ensigns to be plucked up, and called for his Horse. He was not so soon mounted on his back, but the Horse fell presently, cast the Rider over and over with his head forward, and there lay Flaminius the Consul under foot. As they all, that attended about him, were affrighted and troubled in mind, at this unlucky presage and fore-token, in the very beginning of his enterprise: word moreover was brought unto him, that one of the port-ensigns was not able to pull up his ensign, do what he could, and putting his whole strength unto it. The Consul turning to the messenger, What? hast thou any letters besides (quoth he) from the Senat, to prohibit me for giving battail? go thy wayes, and bid them dig up the ensign, with help of spade and mattock, if their hands be so benumbed for fear, that they can not pluck it up: and with that began the army to march. The principal Leaders and Captains, besides that they agreed not, but gained said this course, were much dismayed and terrified with this twofold prodigious sign: but the common souldiers rejoyced and took great pleasure, to see this forwardness and animosity of their General: having an eye rather to the end of their hope, than to the cause which they had to hope for. Now Annibal wasted in all manner of hostility that he could devise, the territories between the Town Cortona, and the lake Thrasymenus, and all to whet the edge of the Consuls stomach, to chafe his hot blood, and to provoke him for to be revenged, for the harms and wrongs done to his good friends and allies. And come already they were to certain places, naturally made as if were for an ambush, whereas the lake Thrasymenus lieth hard at the foot of the Hills of Cortona: for there is between, but a very straight and narrow passage, as if there had been left so much space of ground, only for that purpose, and nothing else. For if a man go but a little further, the plain lieth more open, and groweth larger, and from thence the hills begin to arise aloft. Annibal in the open ground pitched his camp, for himself with his Africans only and the Spaniards to lodge in, and made abode. The Balearians, and the other light armed souldiers, he led about behind the Mountains: the Horsemen he placed at the very gullet of the streight passage, where the little hills handsomely covered and hid them close: to the end that so soon as the Romans were entred in, when he had put forth his horsemen against the gullet of the streight, all might be enclosed within the lake and the Mountains. Flaminius being come to the lake the day before at the Sun setting; the morrow after, before it was full day light, without discovering and clearing the coasts by any scouts and espials sent out before, passed through the streights. After that his army began to be spread and displayed more at large, as the plain opened wider, he espied and perceived those enemies only which he had before his face: for the ambushes lay close hidden, both behind his back, and over his head. Annibal having once got the enemy (as he would) enclosed thus within the lake and the Mountains, and environed with his forces, gave the signal to them all for to charge: who came down every man the neereft way he could: and so much the more were the Romans affrighted and troubled with this sudden occurrent, by reason that the mist which arose out of the lake, was settled thicker in the plain, than upon the hills: whereby the Companies and Squadrons of their enemies coming out of many Vallies, were seen well enough one of another, and therefore more joyntly gave the charge all at once together. The Romans hearing the cry and shout which arose from all parts, before they could well discern and see, perceived themselves compassed all about and surprised, and were assailed both affront, and on their flanks, ere they could put themselves in battail-ray, as they ought, make their

A their armour and weapons ready, and draw their swords. When all the rest were thus amazed, and at their wits end, the Consul alone, for all this imminent danger, shewed himself nothing daunted or afraid; but set in order the ranks and files which were shuffled and blended together, according as time and place would give him leave; and marshalled his souldiers; (who turned every way as they heard the sundry and divers noises) and in the best manner he could devise, he comforted and encouraged them; willing them to stand to it, and fight like men; for that there was now no means else to escape. "All the vows and invocations upon the Gods for their help," would not serve, but only it was mere force and mere manhood must do the deed: and they were "to make way by dint of sword, through the midst of their enemies battailons: and the less men" feared, the less danger commonly beided them. Howbeit, by reason of the noise and hurlyburly, neither counsel nor command could be heard: and so far off were the souldiers from knowing their own Ensigns, their ranks and places, that scarcely their heart would serve them to take arms, and so buckle them, as they should, fitly for fight: in such sort, as some of them were surprisid and born down laden rather with their harness, then covered and defended therewith. And in so great a mist and darkness, more use they had of ears than eyes; for at the groans of their wounded fellows, at the blows and strokes upon the bodies and armour resounding again, at the confused shouts and shrieks of hardy and fearful men one with another, they turned their faces, and cast their eyes every way. Some as they would have fled, light into the pless of those that were fighting, and there were set fast: some again as they returned for to fight, were born backward by companies that ran away. Afterwards, when they had assayed in vain every way to get forth, C and saw well, that on both sides and flanks the mountains and the lake; that afront and behind, the enemies battailons hemmed them in, then they knew evidently there was no hope of life but in their right hand and force of arms. Then every man became a Captain, and encouraged himself to fight manfully: so as the battail began afresh, not in order by the Principes, Hastati, and Triarii, nor according to the accustomed manner, whereby the vanguard should fight before the main battail, and the standards; and behind them the rereguard; and that the souldier should keep his own legion, his own cohort, band, and company: but at a venture, even as it hapned, so they went to it and buckled, pell-mell: and as every mans heart served him, so he marshalled himself to fight, either before or behind. Their courage and animosity was so ardent, their spirits and minds so intentive to the battel, that being as there was, a terrible earthquake at the very instant, D which overthrew and turned upside down, a great part of many Cities in Italy, turned aside the courses of great Rivers out of their channels, and drove their streams against the current, forced the Sea into fresh Rivers, yea, and overturned Mountains with mighty falls, and laid them flat; yet there was not a man who fought in that battail, that once heard or perceived it. The conflict lasted almost three hours: Sharp it was in every place, but about the Consul most cruel: and look in what part soever he saw his men distressed and in hazard, there courageously he aided them. By reason that the flower and bravest gallants followed him, and was himself for his own person goodly beseen in his rich armour, he both assailed the enemy most furiously, and also defended his own citizens as valiantly: so long, until a certain Insubrian, a man of arms (Ducarius was his name) one that knew his visage well enough, This is (quoth he) to his country-men, the Consul that defeated our army, put to the sword our Legions, wasted our territories, and he that destroyed and sacked our City. Now will I offer him as a sacrifice out of hand to the ghosts and spirits of those our fellow citizens, who by his means have been pitcously slain: and therewith setting spurs to his Horse, he rode through the thickest troop and presse of his enemies: and when he had first slain his Esquier outright (who opposed his body between, and set himself against him, seeing him coming so furiously) he ran the Consul quice through the body with his lance. And when he would rather than his life have disarmed and rised him, the Triarii kept with their targuets over his corps, and so kept him off. Hereupon from hence first many began to flie: but anon, neither deep lake nor high mountain, could impeach and stop their fearful flight: like blind men they ran and sought means to make escapes, were the lane never so narrow, were the hills never so steep and craggy, horse and man, man and armour, fell headlong one upon another. A number of them seeing no way else to escape, entered into the Lake by the first edges and shallow brims thereof, waded so far, and went up so high, that they left their heads and shoulders only above the water. Some there were, who unadvisedly (such was their fear) sought to save themselves by swimming. Which being an endless piece of work, and beyond all hope, their wind and breath failing them, they were either stifled and swallowed up of the gulfe, or after that with too much hast, they had over-laboured and coiled on themselves, they did what they could to swim back again, and with much ado to recover the Land: and there, by the enemies Horsemen who had taken the water, were they killed every where, and cut in pieces. Six thousand or thereabout, of the vanguard, who lustily brake through the mist, mangle the heads of their enemies, unwitting of all that was done behind, escaped safe out of the gulfe, and having seized the top of a little hill, there they stood, and might hear only the outcries of men, the rattling and rustling sound of their armor, but how the battel went or sped, neither could they know, nor yet discern for the thickness of the dark mist. But now, when they were come to some odds, and one side went down and had the worst, by which time the heat of the sun had broken, and dispatched the mist, and the bright day appeared: then through the clear light, the hills and dales shewed evidently, the havoc and overthrow that was made, and how the Roman army was foully discomfited and defeated. For fear therefore, that the enemy (having despised and seen them a far off) should send out against them the Cavalry, up they went with their Ensigns in all haste, and got them away with all speed possibly they could. The morrow after, when over and besides all other calamities, they were in danger of extreame famine; and that Maharbal (who with all his power of Horie pursued them by night, and overtook them) had given his faithful word and promise, that if they delivered up their armour, he would suffer them to depart in their single garments, they yielded themselves. Which promise Annibal saw performed as truly, as all Carthaginians use to do, and false Carthaginians as he was, he chapt them all into prison, and hung irons upon them. This is that noble and famous battel fought at the Lake Thrasymenus, and of those few overthrowes that the Romans had, the most memorable of all others. 15000 Romans were there slain in fight: 10000 were scattered: and flying through sundry parts of Tuscany, gat to Rome. 1500 of the enemies lost their lives in the field. But many more of both sides afterwards died of their wounds. Others there be that report much murder and slaughter on both sides. For mine own part (besides that, I love not to write vain untruths, nor any thing without good warrant, and yet the humour of writers for the most part is too much given that way) I have followed for mine Author Fabius especially, who lived about the time of this war. Annibal having enlarged without ranfome as many of his prisoners as were Latins, and put the Romans in streight ward, culled out from among the heaps of his enemies that lay one upon another, the dead bodies of his own men, and commanded they should be buried: and having with great care and diligence made search also, for the dead corps of Flaminius to inter it, he could never find it.

At the first news in Rome of this overthrow, the people ran together in exceeding fear and trouble into the common place of Assemblies. The Wives and Dames of the City, went up and down to and fro in the streets, and enquired of whomsoever they met, what suddain calamity this was, whereof the bruit went; and what was become of the army? And when as the multitude assembled thick (as it were) to a publick audience, turning to the Comitium and the Senat-House, and called upon the Magistrates: at length somewhat before the sun-set, Marcus Pomponius the Pretor came forth and said, A great battel hath been fought, and we have lost the field. And albeit they heard of him no more than this of certainty, yet they filled one anothers ears with rumors, and caried home with them these news, to wit, that the Consul was killed, and a great part of his army with him slain: that there were but a few left alive, and those either fled and scattered up and down in Tuscany, or else taken prisoners by the enemy. And looke how many casualties & misfortunes follow the overthrow of an army, into so many cares and perplexities were the spirits and minds of all those plunged, who had any kinsfolk that served under Flaminius the Col. all the whiles they were ignorant what was the fortune of their friends. And no man knew for certain, what he was to hope for, or to fear. The morrow and certain dayes following, there flocked at the gates a sort of people, and those were women more than men, waiting to see their friends themselves, or those that could tell tidings of them: and ever as they met with any, they would flock about them, and be very inquisitive: neither could they be plucked away from them of their acquaintance and knowledge, before they had questioned every particular circumstance, from point to point in order. There might a man have seen an alphabet of faces, in those that departed from the messengers, according as the tidings was joyfull or wofull: there might a man have seen a number coming about them to accompany them as they returned to their houses, either rejoicing for their good hap, or comforting them for their misfortune and calamity. The women especially, as well in joy, as also in sorrow, were in their extremities. One above the rest (as it is reported) standing as she was upon the suddain sight of her son alive & safe, fell down dead at his very feet. Another, who had received an untrue report of her sons death, as she sat mourning at home within her house in great sorrow of heart, so soon as ever she saw him coming into the house, for exceeding joy yielded her last breath, and died. And for certain dayes the Pretors kept the Senat together in Council, from the sun rising to the setting, consulting under whose conduct, and with what forces they might be able to withstand the puissance of these victorious Carthaginians. But before they were thoroughly resolved of any determinate purpose and course to be taken, suddainly there arrived other news of a second loss, namely, that good horsemen under the leading of C. Centurius the Propretor, four from C. Servilius the Consul, and his Collegues, were enclosed by Annibal in Lucania. For further they had taken their way, upon the news they heard of the battel at Thrasymenus. The brute and rumor hereof hammered diversly in mens heads. Some, whose minds were possessed already with grief of a greater calamity, thought the loss of that Cavalry but small, in comparison of the former defeat: Others esteemed this which happened, not according to the importance of the thing it self, but likewise it falleth out in the natural body of man, that if it be chafe and weak every occasion, be it never so small and light, it is more offensive unto it and more felt, than a greater cause and object in a sound and strong constitution: even so, when any cross or adversity happeneth unto the polittick body of a City or C^{ty}, if it be diseased (as it were) and feeble, we are not to measure & weigh the same by the greatness of the accident, but according to the feeble and decayed estate thereof, able to endure and abide in no manner, that may surcharge and grieve it, whatsoever. And therefore, the City of Rome took her self to be the sovereign salue and approved remedy, which she had long desired, and yet not applied and used of late, namely, to the nomination of a Dictator. And because the Consul himself was absent, by whom alone it was thought he might

A might be named; and by reason that Italy was so overspread and forlaid with the Punick forces, there might no courier be well dispatched; nor letters safely sent unto him; and for that the people had not authority of themselves to create a Dictator, they therefore elected a Pro-dictator (a thing that was never seen and practised before that day) namely, Q. Fabius Maximus, and for his General of the Cavalry, M. Minucius Rufus. These had commission from the Senat, to fortify the walls and Towers of the City, to plant and bestow guards thereon, where they thought meet, and to cut up and break down the bridges upon the great rivers: shewing hereby, that since they were not able to keep and defend Italy, they were now to fight for house and home, and to guard the very City.

Annibal in this mean time was come directly by the way of Umbria, as far as to Spoleum. And after he had grievously wasted and spoiled the territory, he assaid to give assault to that City: but from thence he had the repulse with the loss of many of his men. And guessing by the strength of that one Colony (where he spied but badly in the attempt of it) how great and difficult the enterprise might be of assailing the City of Rome: he turned another way into the * Picene country, not only abounding in plenty of all kind of corn and grain, but also affording rich spoil and pillage: which the hungry and needy souldiers foraged and caried away as greedily, beyond all measure. And therefore certain dayes he kept a standing camp, and refreshed his souldiers, toiled as well with winter journeyes and boggy wayes, as also in the late battel, which was more joyous and fortunate in the loose and passing, than light and easy in the conflict and fighting. After he had rested and refreshed his souldiers sufficiently, who took more pleasure in booties and prizes, than in eate and repose, he dislodged, and journeyed forward: wasting and spoiling first the * Pretutian and Adrian territories, and then the Maritians, Marrutins and * Pelignians: and all about Arpi and Luceria, being a region next adjoyning unto * Apulia.

Cn. Servilius, the other Consul, having had some light skirmishes with the Gauls, and won from them one mean Town of small importance, after he was advertised once of the death of his Colleague and the defeat of the army, fearing even then what danger might betide the walls of his native country, lest peradventure he should be absent in the hazard of the main chance, put himself in his journey toward the City of Rome. Q. Fabius Maximus, the Pro-dictator afore said the same day that he entered his office, assembled the Senat, and began first with matters of religion, and concerning the Gods: and after he had laid open unto the LL. of the Senat, that the Consul Flaminius had faulted more in the neglect and contempt of Divine ceremonies, and the Auspices, than other wise in his shew and for want of skill in sears of war: and that the Gods themselves were to be consulted about the passing and expiation of sins and offences, and what might appeare their wrath: gained and obtained this one point, That the Dei Penales were commanded to repair unto the books of Sibylla (a thing not usually decreed: but when strange signs and prodigious wonders are reported) who having perused the books of definitions, made relation and informed the Senators, first, That the vow made unto Mars, for the good success of that war, was not performed with due complements, and therefore ought to be accomplished anew, and in more ample manner: also, that the great Games and Plaes should be vowed unto Jupiter, with Temples likewise to Venus Erycina, and to * Mons. Moreover, that a solemn supplication and a Ledstern should be celebrated, and a sacred Spring vowed, if the Gods granted them an happy end of war, and

E the Common-wealth to remain in the same state, wherein it stood before the war began. The Senat gave order, that forasmuch as Fabius was to be employed in the wars, M. Aemilius the Pretor, should have in charge to see all the promises performed with all good speed, according to the will and mind of the Colledge of the Bishops or Prelats. These Ordinances of the Senat being considered, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus the Arch-prelate, with the advice of the whole Colledge of the Prelates, thought good and gave advice, that first above all other things the opinion and pleasure of the people (as touching the sacred Spring) should be known, for that without the voyce and consent of the people it could not be vowed: And in this form of words was the bill propounded unto the people, Please it you, that this place may pass, and the thing done with your assent in this manner: if the state of the people of Rome and the Quirites for five years next ensuing, continue safely prospered in close wars, as I desire it should, then shall the people of Rome, and Quirites perform an oblation and gift unto and promise, namely, in the war between the people of Rome and the

Carthaginians, and in the war with the Gauls in this side the Alps: so wit, that the increase which the Spring shall yield and afford by the seed and fruit, grain and live, and all things that shall be prophane, be sacrificed unto Jupiter, according to the law that the Senat and people shall so ordain. Item, that in which shall sacrifice, no price shall be sold, and in what manner he will: and in what sort so ever he shall sacrifice, that is may stand for good and profitable. If haply die, that should be sacrificed, let it be covered privately, and no man shall if any will take or move it, till the same shall be let it not be exposed or shewen: and if any person conceal away the same or hide it one of the way, let it not be impared for us: but let it be given to him from whom it shall be so taken or hidden. If one chance by

G igne and sacrifice upon an altar, & if shall die, let it be accounted good and lawful, whether by night or day, what time so ever, if it shall sacrifice, let it be taken and hold good. If before the Senat and people shall ordain, before sacrifice, shall be done, or shall sacrifice, let the people be assailed and discharged freely therefrom. And for the same purpose, were the great games (before vowed) performed with the expense of thirty in a day, and the third part of an Ase besides the sacrifice of 300 Oxen to Jupiter, & of white Oxen and other sacrifices, and many other things. After these vows pronounced and made accordingly, the supplication was proclaimed & in procession there went with their wives & children, children, not only the multitude of the City, but also of the country, so many as had their private estate, any way depending upon the publick. The Lectistern likewise was prepared and trimmed, and continued for three dayes: and the Decemviri deputed for holy ceremonies had the ordering thereof. The sacred beds were openly to be seen: one for Jupiter and Juno, another for Neptune and Minerva: a third for Mars and Venus: a fourth for Apollo and Diana: a fifth for Vulcan and Vesta: and a sixth for Mercury and Ceres. Then were the Temples vowed: unto Venus Erycinā, Q. Fabius Max. the Dictator, vowed one Temple. For so it was delivered from out of the books of destinies, that he should vow it, who had the sovereign rule in the City, and unto * Mens, Attilius the Pretor vowed another. Thus when Church matters touching Religion were finished the Dictator propounded concerning war and the State: namely, with what Legions and how many the Senat thought good to withstand the victorious enemy. And a decree passed, that he should receive the army at the hands of Cn. Servilius the Cos. and enrol besides of the citizens and allies, as many horsemen & footmen as he thought convenient: and that he should do and order all things at his own discretion, for the good of the Common-weal. Fabius said, That he would adjoin unto the army of Servilius, two Legions more: which being levied by the General of the horsemen, he proclaimed that they should meet together upon a certain day at Tybur: and when he had published a proclamation, That whosoever inhabited within any Towns or Castles untenced, should depart into places of safety: and that all should remove out of the villages of that country, through which Annibal was to go (but first to set on fire their houses, and spoil their corn, that he might find nothing there when he came) he went himself forward by the high way or causey Flaminia, to meet with the Consul and the army. And when he discovered them marching about Orriculum by the river Tiberis, and saw the Consul with his horsemen coming forward to him, he sent a Sergeant, to give warning to the Consul, for to come without his Lictors to the Dictator, who obeyed his commandment. And as their meeting together, represented an exceeding great shew of the Dictatorship unto citizens and allies both, who by reason of discontinuance so long time, had wellnere forgotten that government: behold, there came letters from the City importing news, that certain ships of burden transporting victuals from Hestia into Spain for the army there, were by the navy of the Carthaginians boorded and taken about the sound or haven of Cosia. Whereupon immediately the Consul was commanded to go to Hestia, to take up all shipping at Rome or at Hestia, to furnish them with saylers, and man them with souldiers, and so to pursue the Armado of the enemies, and to keep the coasts of Italy. A mighty number of men was levied at Rome. The Libertines also, who had children, and were of lawfull age to serve, swore allegiance unto him, to be his true souldiers. Out of this army of citizens, as many as were under 35. years of age, were shipped: the rest were left behind to guard the City. The Dictator having received the Consuls army at the hands of Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant, went through the Sabins Country, and arrived at Tybur, whither he had commanded the new souldiers to repair at a day. From thence by cross wayes he returned into the high way or causey Latina, even to Preneste: from whence (having searched diligently by his espials, all the wayes) he led forward toward the enemy, purposing in no place to hazard the fortune of battail, but upon necessity. The very first day that he encamped not far from Anpi, within the sight of his enemies, there was no ho with Annibal, but without further delay, he came forth into the field in battail array, bad him battail, and offered fight. But seeing his enemies quiet, and no stirring in the camp, he fell to taunting and reviling them: saying, That now at length yet the martial hearts of the Romans were daunted and ramed: and seeing they refused fight, they confessed plainly, and granted themselves inferior unto him in valor, prowels, and glory: which said, he retired into his camp. Howbeit, chafing and fretting secretly in his mind for anger that he had to deal hereafter with a Captain, far unlike to Flaminius and Sempronius: and that the Romans now at last, being schooled and taught by their own harms, and to their great cost, had fought out and got a Captain, far unlike to Annibal: Wreith-wayes he began to fear the wisdom of the Dictator, and not his force: but having had as yet no tryal of his constant resolution, he fell to disquiet his mind, and to tempt him with often removing his own tents, and wasting the fields of his allies even under his nose: one while he seemed to march away apace out of all fight, another while he would of a suddain stay, and lie close in some by-place and corner, out of the way, to spie when he could take him in some plain and even ground. But Fabius led his army, and marched above on the higher grounds, a pretty distance off from the enemy, so as neither he would let him go clean and abandon him, nor yet encounter with him. He kept his souldiers for the most part within the camp, save only when necessity otherwise constrained. For purveyance of forage and fowel, they went neither few in number, nor straggling asunder. The wards of Horsemen and those that were lightly armed, standing alwayes in order of battail, and ready prepared and furnished for suddain impressions and tumults, yielded both security to his own souldiers, and also danger to his enemies, as they ranged all abroad and foraged the Country. In this manner never was the main chance put to the venture all at once of fortune: and the small tryals of light scuffling and skirmishes (begun in safety and security, by reason of the recourse of refuge so neer) injured and heartned the souldiers, frightened with former foils, and made them at length to distrust lest either their own valour, or fortune. But Annibal was not more discontented and displeased, nor more ready to cross and thwart these so wholesome policies and counsels of his, as his own General of horsemen, who wanted nothing else but sovereign command, to overturn headlong the Common-weal: a man in all his designs,

A ments violent and hasty, and of tongue intemperate. And first secretly among some few, but afterwards openly in the hearing of all men, he termed Fabius, in stead of a stayed and sober man, slow and dull: in stead of wary and heedful, timorous and fearful: attributing unto vertues the names of vices of neer semblance: and having a singular dexterity to debase his betters and superiours, exalted himself thereby: a cunning cast, of all others the worst, and yet hath mightily prevailed and sped too well in many that have used it. Annibal from Arpi passeth into Sannium, wasteth the country of Beneventum, winneth the City Telefia, and still provoketh (of set purpose) the Roman Captain, if haply he could incense him by to many indignities and losses of his allies, and so draw him to fight on even hand.

B Amongst a great number of Italian confederats and allies, whom Annibal had taken prisoners at Thrasymenus and dismissed, there were three Campanian horsemen, whom Annibal even then had tolled on, and allured with gifts and fair promises to win unto him the hearts of their country-men. These brought word unto him, that in case he would lead and bring his army into Campania, he should soon be Lord of Capua. And albeit the thing in it self seemed greater than the quality of the persons, that counselled him thereto: and therefore stood in hammering, one while in good hope and assurance, another while in fear and distrust: yet they perswaded him at last to remove out of Sannium into Campania. After he had admonished them very often, to see that they made their word and promises good by deed, and commanded them withal to return unto him with some of their principal Citizens and Country-men; he sent them away.

C Himself gave commandment to his guide, to conduct him into the territory of Casinum: being advised by those that were skillful and acquainted with the coasts of those parts, that if he could gain beforehand that safe and forest, he might exclude the Romans from coming to rescue and succour their confederats. But the ambiguity of the name, and the Carthaginian language far differing from the Latine, caused the guide to mistake Casilinum for Casinum: and so missing of his intended journey, he came down, through the Alifane, Calatine, and Calene Counties, into the plain champion region of Stella. Where seeing all the coasts environed round about with Mountains and Rivers, he called the guide unto him, and demanded where he was: and when he answered, that he should that day lodge in Casilinum, then and not before, the error was found; and he knew that he was far out of his way: for that Casinum was distant in another

D Country far off. And after he had beaten the guide with rods, and hanged him up by the head, for an example to terrifie all others, he fortified himself within camp, and sent out Maharbal with the Horsemen into the Falern Country, to fetch in booties. So they wasted and spoiled as far as the waters of Sinuessæ. Much harm did these Numidians, but the flight and fright of the people was far greater. And yet notwithstanding that great fear, when all was on a light fire as it were, and nothing but war, the Roman allies continued still firm in their faithful allegiance: and the reason was, because they were ruled under a just and moderate government, and neither refused, nor thought much to be subject unto their betters, the only bond of loyal fidelity. But so soon as he had pitched his camp by the River Vulturnus, and that the most goodly and pleasant

E Fabius led his power over the ridge of the Mountain Massicus, the sedition was like to have broken out again, and certain Captains of the mutiny began to be enkindled afresh. For there had been great quietness, and all was still for some few dayes: because seeing the army march faster than their usual manner was, they supposed verily, that they made more speed and hastened, to save Campania from being spoiled and wasted. But when they were come to the foremost edge and point of the Mountain Massicus, and that the enemies were within sight, burning the dwelling Houses of the Coloners and inhabitants of Sinuessæ, and likewise of the Falern Country, and all this while not one word of battail; And are we come hither indeed, quoth Minutius, "to behold only and to see, and feed our eyes with looking on our allies, consumed and wasted with fire and sword? and if we bask at nothing else, can we for shame abide to see the Calamity

And are we "so far degenerat (with sorrow of heart I speak it) from our progenitors and fathers, that along "which coast they thought it dishonorable unto their empire, for the Carthaginian Armadoes "and ships to flote, sail, and ride, we should see the same now pestered full of enemies, the Nu- "midians and Moors? We, who ere while taking soul scorn and great disdain to see Saguntum "besieged, called not only upon men, but also upon the faith of alliances and the Gods to wit- "ness, stand still gazing upon Annibal marching against the walls of a Roman Colony, and ready to assault it. The smoke of the villages and the fields now on fire, is ready to put out our "eyes, and to choke us up our ears resound and ring again with the piteous cries of our allies that "weep and lament, and cal ofner unto us than unto the Gods for help. And we here lead our army "as if they were a flock of sheep, over the shadowy forests, and hills out of the way, hid among "the clouds and thick woods to keep them from the heat of Sun. " Dictator

"Dictator in this our distress and hard estate) goeth about to recover Italy from Annibal, Rome "had been French at this day: which I fear me, if we go thus coldly to work, our ancestors have "saved and reserved so often, for Annibal and the Carthaginians. But he, a brave man, and a "Roman indeed, that very day when word was brought to Vulturnum, that he was chosen Dictator by "the suffrages of the people, and approbation of the Senators, although Janiculum was high e"nough, where he might have set him down and beheld the enemy at ease, defended into the "plain and even ground, and the same day in the very mids and heart of the City, where now
 "Gaulbury or Buffa Gallica standeth, and the morrow after, between Rome and Gaber, slew the "Legions of the Gauls. And what should I say of that, which hapned many years after, when at "the streights of Caudium we were put under the yoke by the Samnites our enemies? Whether I "pray you, did L. Papyrius Cursor seek out the mountains of Samnium, or rather lie hard upon
 "Luceria and besiege it, provoking and challenging the victorious enemy, and thereby shook off
 "the yoke from the Romans neck, and laid it upon the proud Samnites? And what other thing "else of late dayes but expedition, gave the victory to Consul Lutullus? Who the morrow after "that he discovered the enemy, set upon his fleet heavily fraught with victuals: and overcharged
 "as it was with her own munition, furniture and provision, sunk, and destroyed the same. It is
 "meer folly to believe and think by sitting still, by bare prayers and vows, to vanquish and subdue
 "the enemy. Our forces must be put into arms, and brought down into the plain that man to man "may cope and buckle together. By adventuring boldly, by action and execution, hath the Roman "Empire grown to this height: and not by these conceits and devices, which fearful cowards "term the wary policies of war. As Minutius spake these words in preaching wile, a number of "Roman Colonels and Horsemen came flocking about him. Yea, and these lusty and rash speeches "of his, came even unto the ears of the footmen's Sons, if it had been in the voyces and election of "the souldiers, out of all question they seemed willing to prefer Minutius before their General Fa-blius. But Fabius again, regarding alwayes with good eye his own men, no less than his enemies, "carrying a resolute mind, invincible ever before of any other, albeit he was well ware, that not "only within his own camp, but also now at Rome, he heard ill for his temporizing and slow pro"ceedings: yet drew he out the rest of the summer, and held on still the same course and purpose, he "never altered his former manner: until that Annibal being clean disappointed of long desired bat-
 "tall bethought himself anon, and looked about for some places of winter abode, considering, That "the country where now he was, rather yeelded plenty for the present, than store for long conti"nuance: as standing upon Hortyards and Vineyards, and all things planted rather for fruits of plea"sure and delight, than for necessity and profit. Intelligence hereof being given to Fabius, by his es-
 "pials, for that he knew well enough, that Annibal was to return through the same streights, by "which he had entered the Falern country, he holdeth and keepeth the hill Calicula, with suffi"cient garrisons and likewise Castellum, a City divided by the river Vulturnum, and parteth the Falern "and Campanie countries asunder. Himself bringeth back his power through the same hills, having "sent out to discover and espie 400 Horsemen of confederates, under the conduct of L. Hostilius Mancinus, who being one of the ruer of those lusty youths, that oftentimes heard the General of "the Horsemen giving out abroad brave words and stout speeches, at first went forward in manner "of an espial, to discover and espie the enemy from a place of safety and security: and when as he "law the Numidians ranging all about the villages, and slew some of them also whom he took at a
 "vantage, straight-ways his mind wholly possessed and set upon fight, and so forgot the charge and "direction of the Dictator, who had commanded him to go forward as warily and as closely as he "possibly could, and to retire himself again before he came within sight of the enemies. The Numi-
 "dians charging and recharging him afront one while, and flying from him another while drew him "almost unto their very camp when as both horse and man were out wearied. From whence Carnio, who then had the conduct and command of the Cavalry, set out against him lustily upon the "spur and before they came within dart-shot put the enemies to flight, and followed them conti"nually in chase almost five miles. Mancinus seeing neither the enemy to give over pursue, nor any "hope to escape away, exhorted his men, and turned head upon them, overmatched as he was every "way: where he himself and his choicest Horsemen were beset round and slain: the other taking "themselves again to flie for life, first came to Cales, and after through by-lanes and difficult wayes,
 "to the Dictator. That day, as hap was, Minutius had joynd himself to Fabius having been afore "sent to keep with a strong guard, the forrest or pale, which above Tarracina, groweth into a nar"row guller, and reacheth to the sea: for fear lest if the advenue of the way Appia, were without "defence, Annibal might enter and invade the country of Rome. When the Dictator and the Gene"ral of Horsemen had joynd their forces together, they encamped upon the very high way, that "Annibal was to passe with his army. Now were the enemies two miles off. The morrow after,
 "the Carthaginians took up with their army all the way between the one camp and the other.
 "When as the Romans were quartered even under their very trench and rampier, in a place no "doubt of great advantage, yet for all that approached Annibal with his light Horsemen: and to "provoke his enemies, fought by starts and fits, charging upon them, and retiring back again with "great nimbleness. The Romans kept still their standing, embattailed as they were. The fight "was cold and lingering to the mind and liking of the Dictator, rather than of Annibal: and where
 "there were of the Romans part 200 slain, there dyed 800 of the enemies. Then seemed Annibal
 "after, to be enclo'd and shut up as it were and besieged within Castellum, seeing that Capua,

* Castellum.

A Samnium, and many rich and mighty Nations confederate with the Romans, were on their backs to furnish them with store of victuals. And Annibal contrary-wise was like to take up his wintering place, within the crags and rocks of Fornil, amid the sands of Limerum, and the mossy standing pools. Well wilt Annibal now that he was laid unto hardly, by the same cunning sleights, that he had used himself. And therefore when as he could not cleave away by Castellum, and seeing that he must needs to the Mountains, and pass over the top of Callicula: for fear lest that the Romans should set upon his army enclosed in the vallies between the Mountains, he devised a stratagem, by way of a ridiculous illusion, to beguile the eye-sight of his enemies, and to frustrate and deceive them of their expectations: by means whereof, he purposed in the beginning of the night, B closely and by stealth to gain the Mountains. The manner of his crafty device was this. He caused to be gathered out of all the villages thereby many fire-brands: then took he certain baving or small fagots of brush-wood, dry sticks, and such like trash, and eyed them fast to the horns of the Oxen, whereof he had tame and wild, a great number that he drove before him amongst other prizes gotten out of the country: so as he might make wel-neer two thousand head. To Asdrubal he gave in charge, that so soon as it grew to be dark night, he should drive those Oxen with their horns set a fire toward the Mountains, and especially if he possible could, to the very streights and gullet which the enemy kept. It began no sooner to be dark, but Annibal with great silence dislodged and removed his camp, and the Oxen aforesaid were driven a good way before the ensigns and the army. When they were come to the foot of the Mountains, and to the C streight passages, immediately the signal or watch-word was given to fire the Oxen horns, and to chase them up against the Hill. The beasts, what with fear to see a light fire blazing over their heads, and what with pain to feel the heat now come to the quick flesh and the roots of their horns, fell running up and down, as if they had been mad. By this their gadding thus all at once every way, all the coppises and springs thereabout were set on a light fire, and seemed as if the whole woods and hills had burnt withal: the shaking of their heads also to and fro without stay, made the blaze greater, and gave shew and semblance of men running from one place to another. They who were appointed and set to keep the passages of the streights, so soon as they saw certain fires upon the tops of the Hills, and over their heads, supposing themselves to be entrapped and enclosed with fire on every side, abandoned their hold, and kept their standing no longer: D and whereas the flame shone most out, thinking that to be the safest way, they sped them thither, even to the top and ridge of the Mountains. Then and there, they light upon certain of the Oxen wandring astray from their company, and at first seeing them a far off, but not well discerning them, they imagined that they spit fire, and breathed their blazing flames out of their mouths: and wondering at the strange sight, stood still amazed and astonished. But when as afterwards they discovered the device, and found it out to be a fabril and deceitful invention, proceeding from mans brain, they mistrusted withal some secret trains and ambush, and with an exceeding noise fled away as fast as ever they could, and stumbled upon the van-guard of their enemies, that were lightly armed. But they were afraid as well of the one side as the other, to begin any skirmish in the night season, and stayed until day light. In the mean while, Annibal E having conducted his whole army through the streights, and killed some of his enemies in the very pass, encamped himself in the territory of Alifan. Fabius delayed this tumult well enough, but doubting some privy ambush, and abhorring utterly all night battails, kept his men within the strength of their rampiers. At the break of day there began a skirmish on the side of the hills in which the Romans as being far more in number, had environed on every side the light-armed soldiers of the enemies, and soon defeated them, but that a band of Spaniards, sent back of purpose from Annibal, came to rescue them: who being better acquainted with the Mountains, and more light and nimble in running among the craggs and cliffs, by reason of well of the agility of body, as the fashion of their light harness: easily in that kind of skirmish, avoided and shifted from their enemy, heavily armed at all pieces, and used to fight upon the F plain, and to stand firmly and keep their ground. Whereupon in the end they parted asunder one from the other, but nothing near on even hand: for the Spaniards in a manner all, went cleer away unhurt, the Romans lost some of their men: and so on both parts they returned to their camps. Fabius likewise removed, and having passed over the streights of the forest, encamped in an high ground, and strongly situate even over Alifan. Then Annibal making as though he would march through Samnium toward Rome, returned back, wasting and spoiling the country as far as to the Peligni. And Fabius hovered still upon the Hill tops between the Army of his enemies and the City of Rome: leading his host so, as neither he departed far, nor yet encountered and affronted his enemy. Then Annibal turned his way, and departed from the Peligni, and retired himself into Apulia, until he was come as far as Gorion, a City G abandoned and forlorn of the inhabitants, by reason that a part of their wall was fallen down, decayed and rained. The Dictator fortified his camp in the territory of Larinum. Now was he sent for home from thence to Rome, by occasion of certain solemn sacrifices: whereupon, he conferred and dealt with the General of the Cavalry, not only by way of absolute commandment, but also with advice and persuasions, yes, and as one would say, by prayer and intreaty, "That he would trust more upon confederate counsel, than doubtful fortune, and be directed and guided rather by him, than follow the steps of Sempronius and Flaminius, and not think there was nothing done and effected, and make no reckning of this, That the enemy had been been dallied withal, and trifled out, moched and debauched almost all the summer long. Why even "Puff-bloated" (quoth they many times do more good to the sick body of the patient, by giving rest "and repose, than by stirring and disquieting the humors therein. And so small matter is it, that "we are vanquished and overcome no more; as an officers hand, often used to victory. And "after continual foils and overthrowes, to have industry and a time of resting. Scipio in this "while admonished the General of Horse ashoreward (but all in vain) he took his way for Spain.

 "In the beginning of this summer, wherein these exploits were performed, Asdrubal, also in "Spain born by Sea and Land: Asdrubal so that numbers of ships which he had received ready rig"ged and well appointed of his brother, joynted other men. To Hamilcar he gave the charge of a fleet
 "offorty sail: and so, loosing from Carthage, while his ships kept near to Land, he conducted his "army along the River upon the strand; ready to give battail to the enemy, howsoever he should "hap to encounter him either by Land or Sea. Ca. Scipio after he had intelligence that the enemy "was removed out of his wintering harbour, at the last had likewise the same intention and pur"pose, but afterwards doubting to encounter by Land, upon the exceeding great report that went
 "of new aids, he embarked his best and most choise soldiers, and with a fleet of 35 sail, look-"ward to meet the enemy. And the second day after that he had loosed from Tarraco, he came "to the rode distant ten miles from the mouth of the River Thorus. From whence, two Sennaces
 "of the Massilians were sent out afore, and brought word, that the Carthaginian Armada rode in "the mouth of the River, and that the boats were pitched upon the banks. And therefore so the "end that he might surprize them at unawares, and unlooking for them, with all the fleet, he came "once, that he could possibly, be weighed anchor, and let sail toward the enemy. In Spain there "are many Towers standing upon high grounds, which serve the inhabitants of the country in good
 "stead, both as watch Towers to discover, and also as beacons to withstand Theevs and Rovers.
 "From whence the enemies ships were descryed first, and a signal given to Asdrubal: in such sort,
 "as the tumult and trouble arose upon the Land, and in the camp; before any was seen on the Sea "and amongst the ships: for as yet neither noise of oars, nor any ordinary stir, else of warren, "was heard; nor yet the signals and promatories between suffered the fleet to be seen. But then,
 "albeit suddenly, certain Horsemen sent from Asdrubal one after another, commanded the sol"diers (who either wandred along the strand, or late quiet within their pavilions, looking for "nothing lesse than fight that day) presently in all haste to go aboard, and to arme for that the Ro"man fleet was not far from the haven. This commandment the Horsemen that were sent, gave "every where. And within a while Asdrubal came in person with the whole army. All was "on a hurry, and full of sundry alarms; while both mothers and soldiers, made haste to be shipped, "rather like men that fled from Land, than went to fight. Scarcely were they all embarked, when "some of them loosed from the shoar, and plucked up Anchors; others on the Anchor Cable, "for that nothing should stay them: and all that they did, was with such haste, that while the "soldiers were occupied in making themselves ready to fight, the mariners were hindered in "their business: and while the mariners made speed, the soldiers were kept from taking their "armour, and fitting themselves therewith. By which time Scipio was not only approached near,
 "but also had marshalled and ordered his ships ready to fight. So as the Carthaginians were trou"bled as well with the busy busly and tumult of their own people, as with the assault and bat-"tel of their enemies. And having (to say a truth) made an assay and proffer of fight, rather than "began any indeed, they turned away their fleet, and fled. And seeing, when they were once put "to flight (by reason they were parted asunder all abroad, and lay open to so many of their ene"mies, following them upon the poop all at once) that they were ready and easy to be bouged and "pierced, they rowed on all hands to the shore. Some were faine to wade to Land, others leapt on
 "drye ground; one fort armed, another fort unarmed; and so escaped to their companies, emburied "along the strand. Howbeit, in the very first encounter and onset, two Carthaginian ships "were taken, and four sunk. The Romans, albeit they saw the enemies, masters of the land, and "might behold them stand in battail array all along the River side upon the banks, yet made they no "stay, but chased the fearful fleet of their enemies: and so as many ships, as either had not cradled, "splintered, and broken their stems, with dashing upon the shore, or were not run a ground, and
 "sunk full by their keels in the shelves, those they drew up, and warped into the deep; with "ropes fastned to their poops; and so of thirty they took five and twenty. And yet, the taking of "these vessels was not the best and goodliest work of their victory: but this passed all, that with one "light skirmish they became L.L. of all the Sea along those coasts. And therefore arriving with "their whole navy before Honofa, they landed their men, won the City by forcible assault, took
 "it, and from thence went forward toward Carthage. And after they had toraged and waited all "the territory about, at the last, they fired the very houses that joynted to the walls and gates of the "City. From thence the Armada laden now and charged with rich pillage, sailed as far as Drugum.
 "Where they found great store of Spain [to make Cables] provided and laid up there by As- "drubal to serve the navy: and when they had taken thereof as much as they needed, they made a "light fire of all the rest. Neither coasted the Roman fleet along the continent and main only and "scoured those parts which lay out into the Sea, but passed also unto the Isle of Ebusus: where they "assailed fortly for two dayes space, the head City of the Island, with much ado, and small "effect. And when they perceived, that they spent time in vain, and were past all hope to win
 "it, they fell to rob and spoil the country: and after they had rifled and burned certain villages,

A and got a greater booty & pillage than they had out of the main, they retired themselves to their ships: and thither came Embassadors from the Islands Baleares unto Scipio, craving peace. From thence he came back with the fleet, and returned into the hither part of the Province, whither resorted unto him the Embassadors of all the Nations that inhabit about Iberus, yea, and of many also, from the farthest part of all Spain. But of States, that absolutely came under the obedience of the people of Rome, doing fealty and homage unto them, and giving hostages for assurance of their allegiance, there were above 120. Scipio therefore, taking himself strong enough in land forces, went on as far as to the chase of Cassula. And Asdrubal retired himself into Lusitania, near the Ocean sea. Hereupon the rest of the summer was like to be quiet: and quiet had it been, for

B any thing that the Carthaginians did to the contrary. But, (over and besides the naturall disposition of all Spaniards, unconstant, busie, and evermore desirous of novelties and alterations, Mardonius a Nobleman, who before time had been the Lord and Prince of the Ilergetes, seeing the Romans retired back from the Forrest, toward the sea-coast, stirred up the the people of his country, and invaded the peaceable Territories of the Romans associates, for to spoil and waste the same. Against whom there were sent from Scipio three thousand Romans, besides certain auxiliary souldiers also, lightly armed; who in a light skirmish discomfited his forces, (as being a power gathered in haste, and disordered) slew many, took some prisoners, and disarmed the greater part of them. Nevertheless, the rumour of this alarm caused Asdrubal, as he departed to the Ocean, to cross the river Iberus back again, for the rescue and defence of his friends and Allies. The Carthaginians were encamped in the territory of the Ilercaonians, and the Romans near the new Armada, when sudden news diverted the war another way. The Princes of the Celtiberians, who had sent the Embassadors of their country, and hostages unto the Romans, upon a messenger dispatched unto them from Scipio, arose up in arms, and entered the Province of the Carthaginians with a strong and puissant army, won three towns by assault, and afterwards, in two battels which they fought with Asdrubal right valiantly slew 15000 enemies, and took 4000 prisoners, and many military ensignes they bare away.

C Whiles Spain stood in these terms, P. Scipio came as L. Deputy into that Province, continuing still his government after his Consulship expired; and was sent from the Senat with thirty ships of war, eight thousand souldiers, and great store of victuals. This great fleet, in regard of many hulks and ships of burden which accompanied it, was kenned and discovered afar off, to the great joy both of Romans, and also of their friends and associates, and arrived within the port and haven of Tarracon. Where the souldiers were disembarked, and Scipio joyned with his brother: and from that time forward they agreed together, and with one accord managed the war. And whiles the Carthaginians were amused with the Celtiberian war they made no stay, but passed over Iberus, & seeing no enemy they marched on toward Saguntum; for that the bruit went, that the hostages of all Spain, delivered unto the custody of Annibal, were kept there in hold within the Castle, but with a small guard about them. That was the only pledge which staid all the Cities of Spain, whose minds were well affected and enclined to entertain league and society with the Romans, but they feared lest if they should revolt, it would cost the lives of their children. This bond which held Spain in awe, one man eased them of, by means of a device and practise more witty and subtil than honest and loyal. There was at Saguntum, one Acedux a Nobleman of Spain, trusty and faithful aforetime unto the Carthaginians: but then (as the nature is for the most part of these Barbarians) as fortune altered her countenance, so changed he his allegiance. And supposing, that if he should lie unto the enemies, without performing some notable treason, and delivering into their hands one thing or other of great importance, he should be counted no better than a vile, base, and infamous creature, he cast about how he might wind himself into these new Allies, and win them by some good service, unto their best and greatest behoof. And considering all the means that Fortune might bring within his compass to effect, he employed himself especially at the length, to set free and deliver those hostages; thinking that the only way to win and procure unto the Romans the amity of all the Princes and great men of Spain. But knowing assuredly, that without warrant from Bostar the Constable of the Castle, the keepers of those hostages would do nothing, he setteth in hand and cunningly goeth to work with Bostar himself. Now lay Bostar in Camp without the City by the water side, to impeach the Romans for entering the haven. Thither came Acedux to him, withdrew him apart into a secret place, and declared unto him as a man ignorant, in what state things stood. Namely,

E "That it was fear and nothing else, that kept the Spaniards unto that day in obedience, because the Romans were so far off: but now the Romans were encamped on this side Iberus, as a sure fortress and place of refuge unto them, if they minded any innovation and change of State: and therefore seeing they could not long be kept by fear, they were to be obliged and bound unto Annibal by some favour and good turn. When Bostar marvelled and demanded, what sudden demerit this might be, and of so great consequence, Acedux (quoth he) send back the hostages into their own Cities. An acceptable present that will be, both particularly to their parents, who are of greatest calling and reputation in their own countries, and also generally to all the Cities and Nations. Every man (you know) is desirous to be trusted: and for the most part, credit given frankly unto one, bindeth him surely to be most faithfull. The ministry and charge of conducting the hostages home to their own houses, I will require to have mine own self, that I may father a plot and device of my own, with mine own proper service

"service and employment: and the thing which of it self in nature is acceptable, I will in what I H "can grace and commend the same, and make it more meritorious. Having thus perswaded the man, being not altogether so wily as other Carthaginians naturally are, he went by night secretly as far as the Corps de guard of the enemies, and after he had met and talked with some Spaniards that were auxiliary souldiers in the Camp, and by them was brought before Scipio, he declared unto him his whole intent and designment, and the cause of his coming. And after they had given and received faithful promise mutually between them, and agreed of time and place for the delivery of the hostages unto Scipio, he returned again to Saguntum. The day following, he spent with Bostar, in receiving Commission from him, for the execution of this matter. And thus being dismissed and having his dispatch, he purposed to go in the night, to the end that he might (for I sooth) avoid the watch and wards of the enemies, the Romans: and at the hour appointed he raised those who had the guard and custody of the children, and put himself on his way; and (simple man he) as if he had been altogether ignorant of that which hapned, brought them within the compass of an Ambushment, forelaid beforehand by his own wily and crafty device: and so were they brought into the Roman Camp. All other points besides, concerning the rendring of the hostages, according to the agreement and appointment with Bostar, were performed in the same order, as they should have passed, in case all had been done in the name of the Carthaginians, and to their behoof. But the Romans won much more thank, and gained greater favour thereby, than the Carthaginians could have attained in the like curtesie. For the Carthaginians (whom, in their prosperous success the Spaniards had found by experience to be rigorous unto them, and proud) might have been supposed if they had done it now, to have been mollified and made more benign and gracious through adverse fortune and fear: but Scipio the Roman General, at his first coming, and unknown before time, began with a notable example and testimony of clemency and liberality. And Acedix besides, reputed a wise and prudent man seemed not without great reason to have made exchange of his Allies and Friends. Whereupon they all desired with one accord to revolt, and presently they had taken arms indeed and rebelled, but for the approach of winter which forced as well Romans as Carthaginians to betake themselves to their winter harbors.

These were the occurrents that fell out also in Spain, in the second summer of the Punick war: while in Italy the wile and wary delaies, the industrious temporizing of Fabius in the manner of his warfare gave the Romans some respite and intermission of their souls and overthrows. Which as it wrought in Annibal no small trouble of mind and perplexity, to see that the Romans at the last had chosen for their General a man who managed war by discourse and guidance of sound reason & not by adventure or fickle fortune; so it was despised of his own Citizens, as well those that were armed abroad, as gowned at home; & namely, when during the absence of the Dictator, there hapned to be a field fought through the rashness of the General of the Cavalry, with more joyfull success (to speak truly) than happy and fortunate. Two other things there were besides, that caused the Dictator to be worse thought of, and in great disgrace and obloquy. The one through the deceitful and wily policy of Annibal: who being enformed by certain fugitive Traitors (that fled from Rome unto him) which were the lands and possessions of the Dictator: gave expresse commandment, when he had destroyed the country about, and made all even with the ground, to forbear all kind of hostility there only, and to touch nothing of his, either by fire or sword: to the end it might be thought there had been some packing between him and Annibal; and that this was the hire and consideration agreed upon between them two. The other arose from an action of his own: namely, about the exchange and coursing of certain prisoners or captives: which peradventure at the first appearance might have seemed doubtful and suspicious (because therein he staid not for to have the Commission and approbation of the Senat) but in the end and up-shot it turned, no doubt, to his singular praise and commendation. In that entercchange abovesaid, it was capitulate between both Generals, of Romans and Carthaginians, (like as it had been afore in the first Punick war) That whether side received more Captives than they gave again, should yield for every one souldier two pound and a halfe of silver. When it fell out therefore that the Roman Dictator Fabius had received more prisoners by 247 than Annibal, and the payment of the silver for them due; after much debate in the Senat house, (because he had not direction therein from the LL.) was delaied, and no order taken therefore: he sent his son to Rome of purpose, to make sale of his lands, which had not been endamaged by Annibal: and so to his own cost, and out of his private purse discharged a publike debt.

Annibal now lay in leaguer before the walls of Gerion, a City which he had won and set on fire, and reserved a few houses standing, to serve him instead of barns and garners for his grain.
 From thence he sent out two third parts of his forces to purvey corn: and remained himself in guard with one third part, ready in arms, (but lightly appointed and without any bag and baggage) in a meet and convenient place; both for defence of the Camp, and also for discovery of all the coasts about that no assault were made upon the purveyors. The Roman Army lay then in the Territory of Lavinum, and the Captain General was Mimnius. Commander of the horsemen, because the Dictator (as is abovesaid) was gone to the City of Rome. But whereas they had usually encamped before, upon some high hill and strong place of security: now they began to draw down into the vale and the plain ground, and to devise crafty means and stratagems beyond the natural reach of the Commander himself: namely, how they might assail

A either the purveyors as they stragled about in the country, or set upon the Camp of their enemies, left with a small power and guard to defend it. Annibal was not ignorant, that together with the General, the whole manner and conduct of their warfare was changed: and that the enemy would fight rather more rashly and hastily, than wisely and warily. And himself (who would have thought it, considering the enemy was approached nearer) sent out a third part only of his soldiers to provide corn and forrage, and kept the other twain with him in the Camp: he removed also his tents nearer to the Romans, almost two miles off from Gerion; to a little hill within the sight of the enemies, to the end they might know he was minded and ready to rescue and defend the purveyors, if haply they should be charged upon. Then espied Annibal at another hill nearer, and standing even over the very Camp of the Romans. For the gaining whereof, (seeing that if he should have gone by day time openly, he had been no doubt prevented by the enemies, who would have seized it first, by reason it was nearer unto them) he sent certain Numidians by night, who surprised it and kept it. But the Romans making little or no account of their small number, drave them the morrow after from thence, and thither removed their own tents: so as then, there was but a little distance between one Camp and the other, and the same, in a manner wholly taken up and replenished with Romans: and withall, at the same time, the horsemen of the Romans with certain footmen lightly armed were sent out at a postern gate of the Camp, (which opened not upon the Carthaginians) against the forragers, whom they discomfited, put to flight, and slew a great number of them. Neither durst Annibal issue forth to skirmish: for, having so few about him, he was hardly able to defend his Camp, in case it had been assaulted. So he was driven now to use the policy and shifts of Fabius, (for part of his forces were away) and managed his war, sitting still as it were, and keeping the enemy at a bay and at staves end; and so retired with his soldiers to the former Camp, under the walls of Gerion. Some write, that there was a field pitched, and a set battle fought with banners displayed, wherein Annibal at the first encounter was discomfited and chased to his Camp: but from thence they issued forth who were within and so the fear turned upon the Romans, who on a sudden were put to the worst: but by the coming of Numerius Decimus (a Samnite) with succour, the fight was reinforced and renewed. This man, not only nobly descended, but also of great power and wealth, as well in Boianum his native Country, where he was born, as throughout all Samnium (by order and commandment from the Dictator) came with a power of 8000 foot and 200 horse, toward the Camp: and being espied by Annibal on the backside, gave both parties good hope of fresh and new aid. But when the voice went, that Fabius at the same time was coming also from Rome, Annibal for fear of being entrapped within some Ambush, retired back with his own men, and the Romans made pursuit after him: and with the help of Numerius the Samnite, won in one day by force two fortresses. So there were 6000 enemies slain and 5000 Romans. And yet as equal in a manner as the loss was of both parts, the rumour ran to Rome of a brave victory, with letters also in post from the General of horsemen, full of folly and vanity. Much arguing there was and debate about these matters both in Senate, and before the people sundry times. And when all the City besides was joyous, and the Dictator (alone) gave no credit either to the bruit that was blazed, or the letters: saying withall, That if all were true, yet he feared more the fawning than frowning of fortune: then M. Metellus a Tribune of the Commons stepped forth and said, "That this above all was not to be suffered: that the Dictator, not only while he lay in Camp, opposed himself against all goodnels, and stained all valorous services; but also being absent from thence, crossed and disgraced that which was well done and worthily achieved: and that he, of purpose, drew the war in length and prolonged the time to the end he might continue the longer in government, and be the man alone to command all both in the City and abroad in the Army: for one of the Consuls was slain in battle, the other under a pretence & colour of pursuing the Carthaginian fleet was sent out of the way, far enough off from Italy: as for the two Prætors, they were employed both in Sicily and Sardinia: and yet neither of those two Provinces had any need of a L. Deputy there. And M. Metellus General of the horsemen, was kept prisoner as it were, and might neither see enemy, nor do any martial exploit. And hereupon it is (quoth he) that not only Samnium (whereof the possession was surrendered unto the Carthaginians, as if it were a territory lying beyond Iberus) but the Campane, Calene, and Falern territories were utterly overrun and wasted, whiles the Dictator abode still at Capitulum, and with the legions of the people of Rome defended his own lands & possessions only. And when the Army and General of the Cavalry were desirous of battle, they were kept back enclosed in a manner within the compass of the Camp & their weapons taken from them, as if they had been captive enemies. & at length when the Dictator was once departed from them, they issued forth of the Camp like men delivered from siege, & so discomfited & put to flight their enemies. In consideration of all these things (he said) if the Commons of Rome were of that courage, as sometimes they had been, he would boldly have put up a bill, for to deprive C. Fabius of his government. But now for this time, he would propound a more indifferent & reasonable law, by virtue whereof the Commander of horsemen may be made equal with the Dictator in authority and power. Yet so, as that Q. Fabius might not be sent unto the Army before that he had substituted & ordained another Col. in the room of Flaminius. The Dictator forbore altogether to come into any of these assemblies of the people, as a man in action and pleading nothing popular, and who framed not himself to the humor of the common people: Neither was he in the Senate house heard with patience, at what time as he either magnified and extolled the valour of the enemy; or rehearsed & reckoned up the losses and loots received for two years space, through the rashness and unskilfulness of the Commanders: and said withall, that the General of the horsemen was to answer and give account for fighting against his edict and express commandment. Moreover, (quoth he) if I were in place of sovereign rule and government, & to do all according as I thought good, I would effect and bring to pass, within few daies, that men should know, that a good warrior was to make small reckning of fortune but wisdom, wit, and counsel were to guide and direct all. And for mine own part, I deem it a great honor & glory to have preserved an army in a time of trouble and danger from shame and ignominy, than to have slain many thousands of enemies. After he had made these and such like speeches & reasons in vain, and created for Col. M. Attilius Regulus: for that he would not be present to debate the question concerning the right and authority of his own government, he departed by night season toward the army; even the very day before that the fore said law should be propounded. The morning came, and the commons were assembled to an audience: wherein men seemed rather secretly in their hearts to malice the Dictator, & to affect and favour the General of the horsemen, than durst come forth and be seen to perswade and set forward that which pleased them all in common. And notwithstanding the bill was exceedingly well liked of, yet there wanted one to give some credit and authority thereunto. At length, one stepped forth to let it on foot, namely, C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Praetor, a man not only of obscure degree by calling, but also of vile & base parentage descended. His father was (as they say) a Butcher, who kept shop and sold meat himself, and trained up his son as his apprentice in the same mechanical and servile occupation. This Varro being a young man, and well left by his father (who was grown rich, and gained greatly by his trade) gave his mind and conceived some hope to live more gentlemanlike: and took a great liking to the common place, and pleading at the bar: exercising himself in entertaining causes of base persons, against the estate and name of honest Citizens and of good reputation: by means whereof he grew to be known among the people, and afterwards was advanced to place of worship and honour. And having been Treasurer of the City, and born both Adileships, as well that of the Chair, as the other of the Commons: and at length gone through one Praetorship, he aspired now higher, in hope to be Consul: and full craftily waited his time, and fought to wind himself within the favor of the people, by means of the ill opinion and hard conceits they had of the Dictator: & thus he alone went away with all the affectionate love of the Commons. All men that were either at Rome, or in the Army, both good and bad, in general (excepting the Dictator himself) received and admitted that bill, as made to his disgrace and shameful reproach. But he with the very same gravity and constancy of heart, endured these injurious counsels & dealing of the people raging against him, wherewith he had born his adversaries flandering & charging him before the multitude: and having received in the way as he journeyed, letters importing the decree of the Senat. for dividing his authority equally with the General of the horsemen, and being assured that notwithstanding his commission were parted and communicated with another, yet his skill and sufficiency of conduct and command, remained still with himself, with a mind invincible as well against Citizens as enemies, he returned to the army. But Minutius, who before that time was hardly to be endured, both for his fortunate success, and also for the favour of the common sort: now verily beyond all measure and bounds of modesty, vaunted and gloried, in that had conquered & got the mastery over Fabius as well as over Annibal. That Fabius (I say) who in time of distress and calamity, was the only warrior and Captain that could be found out to match Annibal: that the superior Magistrate was by the consent & approbation of the people, (a thing never to be found in any record of Chronicles) made but even equal with the inferior: to wit, the Dictator with the General of horsemen: and in that City, wherein the Commanders of the Cavalry were wont to quake and tremble at the rods and axes of the Dictator. So conspicuous and evident in the eyes of the world, was his felicity and prowess above all others. And therefore minded was he to follow his own fortune, and to take his time: in case the Dictator still continued lingering in sloth and idleness, condemned in the judgment both of God and man. Whereupon, the very first day that he & Fabius were met together, he said that they were above all things to determine & set down in what sort they might order this their equal authority of government. He for his part thought it best, that each other day (or if longer time between were supposed better) they should one after the other alternatively have the full and whole command of all for the time in their several turns: that if any occasion of fighting a battle were presented, they might be able to contravail the enemy, not only in counsel, but also in power and strength. Q. Fabius liked not of this: supposing that whatsoever lay in the hands and disposition of his rash colleague, must needs be subject unto the arbitrement of Fortune. Saying moreover unto him, That he was indeed to impart unto him government and rule, but not wholly to depart therefrom, and shut himself out. And therefore he would never willingly fall, but (to his power) manage by counsel and discretion one part or other: neither would he divide with him either time or daies, but the forces and armies: that Minutius might have one moiety, and himself another: since he might not preserve all by his own counsel & policy, yet he would endeavour (so far as he could) to save somewhat. And so much he prevailed, that they parted the Legions between them, as the manner of the Consuls was. The first and fourth fell to Minutius, the second and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided the horsemen number for number, and the auxiliary souldiers of Allies and Latines. The General of the horsemen would needs likewise that they should be encamped asunder.

- A. Annibal conceived hereupon a two-fold joy, (for he was not ignorant of all that was done among the enemies, partly by intelligence given him from thence by fugitives, and partly by means of his own scouts and spies) for he made this reckoning, both that he should deal well enough with the lavish rashness of Minutius, and handle him in his kind; and also that the prudent policy of Fabius was abridged and diminished by the one half. Now there was a little hill between the Camp of Minutius and the Carthaginians: and no doubt there was, but that he who could gain it aforehand should have the vantage of the enemy, in regard of the ground. That hill Annibal was not so desirous to get without skirmish, (& yet it had been a matter of good importance) as willing thereby to give some occasion of fighting and scuffling with Minutius, by whom he wist very well to be alwaies forwarde enough to encounter him and make resistance. The plain all between, seemed at the first fight nothing commodious nor good for men that would lay an ambushment, because it was neither over-grown with any woods, nor yet in any part roughly over-spread and covered, so much as with briars and brambles. But in very deed the ground was naturally made for to cover and hide an Ambuscado: and the rather, because in so naked and bare a valley, none would have imagined and suspected any deceitful trains, and forelaying of wait. And yet there were in divers nooks and corners thereof certain hollow rocks and caves, and some of them of sufficient capacity to receive 200 armed men. In these lurking holes there were bestowed 5000 of horsemen and footmen one with another, some in one place, some in another, according as they might commodiously lie there closely hidden. And yet, lest that the stirring of any one that might chance to go forth unadvisedly, or the glittering of armour, should bewray the trains in so open a valley, Annibal by sending out at the break of day some few for to seize the aforesaid hill, withdrew the eyes of his enemies another way. These at the first view were despised of the Romans for their small number, and every man was desirous to be doing with them, and their fingers itched for to set the enemies back, and drive them from thence. The General himself Minutius, as fool-hardy and forward as he that was most, sounded the alarm, and commanded to go to the winning of the place, braving and threatening of the enemies full vainly. First, he sent forth his light armed men to skirmish, but afterwards, the Cornets of horsemen, set close and jointly together in array: and at the last, seeing the enemies seconded with new succours and supplies, he advanced forward himself with his Legions in order of battel.
- D. And Annibal, wheresoever he perceived his men to be distressed, made out continual fresh aides one after another, both of horse and foot, ever as the fight encreased and grew hotter: so as now he had his full army in field, and they maintained battel on both sides with all their power and main forces. First, the light armed Romans, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground, desirous to get up against the hill, (possessed aforehand of the enemy) were put back, and beaten down again: insomuch, as in their retire, they put the horsemen in fear that followed hard upon them, and fled for refuge to the Ensigns of the Infantry. The main battell of the Legionary footmen, among all the rest that were affrighted, only remained without fear, undaunted; and seemed in a plain, set, and downright field without ambush, likely enough to have held their own, and in no respect to have been over-matched; so courageous they were, and had taken such heart upon their late victory, some few daies before. But the enemies starting suddenly out of their Ambuscadoes, so troubled, disordered, and terrified them, flanking them on both sides and charging withall behind, that neither their heart served any of them to fight, nor their hope remained to fly and escape away. Then Fabius hearing the first cry, and knowing thereby, that they were in great fear, and seeing besides a far off their battell disordered and in disarray, "I thought even as much (quoth he) and no sooner than I feared, it is fallen out: Fortune I see well, hath over-raught fool-hardiness, and taken it tardy. The man, forsooth, that must needs be made e-quall with Fabius in government, seeth by this time; that Annibal is his good Master, & his better by ods in prowess and fortune: but we shall find out some other time to chide and to be angry. Come on now, forth with your standards and ensigns, let us wrest from our enemies hands the victory, and wring from our Citizens mouths confession of their error and trespass. Now when some of them were slain, and others looked about which way to make escape and flee: Fabius with his forces shewed himself, as sent down from heaven to rescue them. And before he came to lance one javelin, or began to joyn battell and fight one stroke, he not only staid his fellows from running away, but also his enemies from further heat of fight. As many of the Romans as were disbanded and scattered asunder all abroad, repaired again speedily from all parts; and rallied themselves to the entire battell: the rest who by whole troops had turned their backs, made head again upon the enemy: and one while giving ground and retiring by little and little, another while standing in a ring and round together stedfast, kept this order by turns: so as now, both they that were discomfited, and those that were unfoiled became reduced into one body of a battell, and advanced their ensigns against the enemy. By which time Annibal sounded the retreat, and openly confessed and said, that as he had vanquished Minutius, so he was foiled and overcome of Fabius. Thus when the more part of the day was spent with variable fortune, and all retired again to their Camps, Minutius called together his souldiers, and spake unto them after this manner: "I have oftentimes heard it spoken (my good souldiers) that he is the best man, and most sufficient, who knoweth himself what is best to do: next to him is he esteemed, that will be ruled and directed by sage advice & counsel: but he that neither hath the skill to advise another, nor the grace to be advised by another, is simply of the worst nature, & good for nothing.

"Since that we therefore are not so happy as to attain unto the highest degree of wit, and perfection of nature, let us content our selves with the second place, and keep a mean between: and whiles we learn to rule, let us settle our selves and resolve to obey him that is wiser than our selves. Let us joyn in Camp with Fabius, and when we have presented our selves and our ensigns before his pavilion and tribunal, see that when I salute him by the name of Father (as is befitting his excellent majesty, and the benefit by us of him received) that ye also call those souldiers your Patrons, whose valiant hands and trusty arms ere while protected you: that this day may give us yet, if nothing else, the honour and name of thankful persons. Having thus said, he gave commandment to pack up bag and baggage, and to dislodge: and as they marched in good array toward the Camp of the Dictator, they struck both him and also all about him into a wonder and admiration. And having pitched their ensigns before the Tribunal: then Minutius the General of the horse went forth before the rest: and after he had greeted Fabius himself as his Father, and the whole Army likewise saluted those about Fabius, by the name of Patrons: "To my parents (quoth he) O Dictator, unto whom I have made you equall in name only (as much as my tongue will give me leave) I am bound and beholden for my own life only and no more: but to you I am indebted for saving both my life, and all these here. The Act therefore and ordinance of the Commons which hath been a clog and burden to me rather than an honour, here of my self I renounce, revoke, and abolish: and (that which I pray God may prove to the good both of you and me, of mine army and yours, as well that which is preserved, as that which is the preserver) lo I submit and surrender again my self under your command and government, together with these ensigns and legions thereto belonging: beseeching you to pardon me, and to entertain me in the room of the General of the Cavalry, and thole here with me, everyman in his former place. Then interchangeably they gave their hands one to another: and the souldiers (after the assembly dismissed) were courteously invited, and friendly entertained, as well by them that were unknown unto them, as of their acquaintance, and so the day, dolorous, heavy, and almost dismal and accursed, turned to be joyful and festival.

So soon as tidings came to Rome of these occurrents, and the same confirmed as well by the letters of the Generals themselves, as also by the common voice of souldiers from both Armies, every man, the best he could, praised and extolled Maximus up to the sky: whose honour and reputation was as great in the opinion of Annibal and the Carthaginians, for then and never before, they found, that they had to deal and war in Italy, and with Romans. As for the two years space before, they set so light both by Roman Captains and souldiers, that they could be hardly perwaded, that they warred with that Nation, whereof there went so great a fame, and of whom their forefathers had reported such wonders and terrible things. They say also, that Annibal as he returned out of the field, gave out these words, "That the cloud which sated on the hill tops, hovered so long in the wind, that it proved a tempestuous storm in the end.

While these things were doing in Italy, Cn. Servilius Geminus the Consul, having sailed about the coasts of Sardinia and Corfica with his fleet, and received hostages both of the one Isle and the other, passed over into Affrick: and before that he landed in the continent, and firm land, he wasted the Island * Meninx, and having received * ten talents of silver of the inhabitants thereabout, for fear lest their Territory also should be consumed with fire, and spoiled as well as the rest: he came to Affrick, and there set his forces ashore. From thence he led his souldiers and mariners likewise, one with another disbanded and out of order, as if they were to rob and spoil some desert Islands, unpeopled and void of Inhabitants. Whereupon they fell unadvisedly into an ambush, and being unskilfull of the country, and therewith but few and scattered, they were soon enclosed among many, and with much slaughter and shameful flight were driven and beaten back to their ships. The fleet thus having lost a thousand men, and one Treasures of the Army among them, called Sempronius Blasus, loosed in great haste from the shore (which now was overspread by enemies) and held their course for Sicily, and at * Lilybaeum was set over and delivered to T. Oracilius the Praetor, for to be brought back again to Rome, by P. Sura his Lieutenant. Cn. Servilius himself journeyed through Sicily by land, and crossed the narrow seas into Italy: for both he and his Colleague M. Atilius were sent for by the letters of Fabius, to receive the Army at his hands, now that his six-months-sovereign government was well near expired. All the Annals in a manner do record, that Fabius was the man, who during his Dictatorship, fought and waged war with Annibal. Caelius writeth also, that he was created Dictator by the people. But both Caelius and the rest, either knew not, or else forgot, that the Consul Servilius, who then was far from Rome, and in the Province of France, had the lawful right and authority only to nominate a Dictator: and because the City so affrighted, by reason of that notable overthrow could not stay so long, they were driven to this shift, That there should be created by the people a Pro-Dictator or Dictator his Deputy. But the noble acts and glorious renown of that General, together with the title of his Image, which might recommend his house more honourable to posterity, gained easily this point, and caused the Pro-Dictator to be reputed Dictator, and so called.

The Consuls, M. Atilius Regulus, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, having received the army (as is before said) fortified in good time the places for wintering harbour (for it was then the Autumn season) conducted and managed the wars together in great concord, and followed the same polirick course that Fabius had done before them. For as Annibal made rodes at any time to purvey corn, they would meet him just at every turn, in sundry places, and either cut off the tail of his

A men, or intercept and catch them as they went scattering, but never hazard all in one set field: the only thing that the enemy shot at, by all the means he could devise. And so near driven was Annibal, and to those terms of want and scarcity, that but for very shame (left by his dislodging and departure he might be thought to flee) he would have retired back into Gallia, as being out of all hope to maintain and sustain his Army with victuals in those parts, in case the new Consuls who next succeeded, should hold on still the same policy and manner of warfare. Winter now approached, and all the war that was continued and settled about Gerion: at what time there arrived at Rome Embassadors from Naples, who brought with them, and presented into the Council-House, forty masse boles of beaten gold: and withall delivered this speech, and said,

B "That they knew full well, how the Treasure of the people of Rome was wasted and consumed by long wars, And forasmuch as the said wars were maintained, as well for the defence of the Cities and Lands of allies, as for Rome, the very head, mother City, and principall Citadel (as it were) of all Italy, and for the soveraign dominion and Empire thereof: the Neapolitans thought it meet and reason, that what store of gold their ancestors had left unto them, were it for to adorn and deck themselves, or to relieve them in time of need and necessity, with it they were to aid and help the people of Rome in their adversity. And if they could have bethought themselves of any other means besides, wherein they might stand and befriend them they would as willingly and frankly have made presentment thereof: saying, moreover, that the Senators of Rome should do them an high pleasure, if they would make account of all that the men of Naples had, as their own; and judge them worthy, at whose hands they would vouchsafe to accept a present, much greater, and more precious in regard of the mind and affection of the givers than the substance and value of the thing. The Embassadors were highly thanked, as well for their liberality and munificence, as for the care they had of them: and that boll was only received which weighed least.

About the same time, a Carthaginian spy, who for two years space had walked unknown and unsuspected, was detected and apprehended now at Rome: and after his hands were cut off, was suffered to depart. Five and twenty slaves were crucified for a conspiracy contrived in Campus Martius. The informer was made free, and had 20000 pound of brasse bullion given him for a reward. There were also sent Embassadors to Philip King of the Macedonians, to demand again Demetrius Pharius, who having been vanquished in plain field, was fled unto him. Others likewise were dispatched to the Ligurians, as well to expostulate with them and complain, that they had succoured Annibal with men, money, and other munition: as also to hearken and learn (seeing they were so near) what the Boians and insubrians did or went about. Besides, a third Embassage was addressed as far as to Illyricum, unto King Pinus, to enquire and call for the Tribute, whereof the term was expired and past: and if he were minded to take a longer day, than to receive hostages and pledges of him for security. See how carefull the Romans were, and what a provident eye they had, notwithstanding the great war which lay heavily upon their necks and shoulders, to their other affairs: insomuch as no one thing in the world, how distant and remote soever, was by them neglected. But as concerning religion, and Church matters, they made some scruple of conscience, that the Temple of Concord (which L. Manlius, L. Deputy in Gallia, had vowed two years before in time of a sedition and mutiny of souldiers) was not as yet set out to workmen for to be built or edified accordingly. And therefore two Duumvirs were for that purpose created by Æmylius the Prætor, or L. Governour of the City, namely, Cn. Pupius, and Casus Quintius Flaminius: who gave order, that the Temple should be built upon the Capitoll hill. The same Prætor, by vertue of a decree of the Senate, sent his letters unto the Consuls, importing thus much, That if they thought good, one of them should repair to Rome for the creation of new Consuls: and that himself would summon the Parliament against that day which it should please them to appoint. The Consuls wrote back again according to the premises, That they might not depart far from the enemy without damage of State: advising them to hold an assembly for the Election aforesaid, by authority of an interregent, rather than that one of the Consuls should be called away from the wars. But the LL. of the Senate thought it better to have a Dictator chosen by one of the Consuls, for the holding of that high Court of Parliament. So L. Veturius Philo, was nominated Dictator, and he chose for Generall of the Horsemen M. Pomponius Mætho. But these men being not duly and lawfully created, were commanded at the fortnights end to give over their places, and then the matter grew to an Interregent. The Consuls had their Commission, for government and conduct of the Army, continued and confirmed for one year longer. The Senators named for Interregents, first Cn. Claudius Cento, the son of Appius; and after him, P. Cornelius Asina. During whose Interreign, the Parliament was holden, with much contention and debate between the Nobles and the Commons. The Vulgar people endeavoured to advance unto the Consulship C. Terentius Varro, a man of their own coat and condition, one crept into good liking and favour with the common sort by opposing himself and contesting against great personages, and by other popular practises and courtes that he used to win grace among the people; as namely, by abasing the greatness of Fabius, and the Majesty of the Dictatorship: for nothing was there else in him, to commend him to the world, but a malicious mind to bring others into disgrace. The Nobles withstood the Commons all they could, to prevent this mischief: That men should not take a custome to be their equals, by means of inveighing and making head against them. Bibius Herennius a Tribune of the Commons, mons, and kinsman to C. Terentius, blamed and accused much not only the Senate, but also the Augurs, in that they forbad the Dictator to finish and go through with the election: and so by drawing them into hatred, sought to purchase favour and credit unto Terentius his Candidate, who stood to be Consul. "First, quoth he) whereas the Noblemen for many years together, sought occasions of war, and trained Annibal into Italy, the same persons craftily have made a long war of it, when it might have been brought to a final end before now. Also, when it was well seen that they might have fought a battel with the compleat power of four legions all together, seeing that M. Minutius in the absence of Fabius had a lucky day: two legions only and no more, were offered and exposed as it were to the enemy to be hewn in peeces: and then afterwards, they were rescued and saved from massacre, and the very edge of the sword: to the end that Fabius might be called Father and Patron: even he, who to say a truth, first impeached the Romans for vanquishing the enemies, before that he saved them from being vanquished. Moreover, the Consuls that succeeded, following the same course and artificiall fetches that Fabius praesided before them, drew out the war still on length, when they had good means of victory, and might have fully finished it. A complot (no doubt) contrived and concluded among all the Nobles. And never will they see to make an end of war, before there be a Consul chosen, a meer Commoner indeed, to wit, a man never seen afore, and of the first head. For those who are of Commoners now made noble, are all alike and of the same profession; they draw all in one line, and have learned one lesson; and ever since that they have left to be contemned of the Nobility, are faine to despise and disdain the Commonalty. For who seeth not, that in seeking to have an Interreign, their only purpose and reach was, that the Election might be full and wholly in the power and ordering of the Nobles? That was the thing which the Consuls aimed at, in staying behind in Camp with the Army: & afterwards when there was a Dictator created against their wills for to hold the great assembly for the Election, their drift was, and they wrought for, and brought it about in the end, that the Augurs should give it out and pronounce, that there was an error committed in creation of the Dictator. And therefore, saith he, the Commons cannot of all things away with these Interreigns: and verily, one of the Consulships (at least) appertain of right to the Commons of Rome: and no doubt, the people in their free election would more willingly make choice of one to be Consul, and confer the dignity upon him, that loved rather to win the victory at once, than to continue commander in the Army a long time. When the Commons were once enkindled and set on fire with these speeches and remonstrances, albeit three of the Patritii were competitors, namely, Pub. Cornelius Merenda, L. Manlius Volsus, and M. Emilius Lepidus, and two new Noblemen, who were already familiar and acquainted with the Commons, to wit, C. Attilius Serranus, and Q. Elius Papius, of whom the one had been High Priest, and the other Augur: yet at length was C. Terentius only created Consul, to the end that the election should be in his power, that he might choose unto him a Colleague at his pleasure. Then the Patritians having a sufficient tryall, that their Candidates and Competitors were of small force and not able to prevail, urged and put forward L. Emilius Papius, who sometimes had been Consul with M. Lalius, in the condemnation as well of himself as of his companion, escaped the peril of being burnt, and was well singed and scorched, as it were in the fire: a man of all others most mischievously bent against the Commons: him they urged, I say, to stand for a Consulship notwithstanding he refused a long while, and alledged many reasons against it. And so the next Comitiall or Parliament day, by occasion that all the concurrents and competitors aforesaid that stood with Varro, gave place and left off their suit, he was chosen to match with the Consul elect, for to thwart and cross him, rather than to be assistant unto him in the government. This done, they proceeded to the election of Pretors, wherein M. Pomponius Matho, and P. Furius Philus were created. Unto Pomponius fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City of Rome: and unto P. Furius Philus, between the Citizens of Rome and forreiners. Two other Pretors besides were chosen, M. Claudius Marcellus, to be sent L. Deputy into Sicily, and L. Posthumius Albinus into Gallia. All were created in their absence, and excepting Terentius the Consul only, there was no Magistracy conferred upon any, who had not aforetime borne and exercised the same: for divers valorous and hardy men were passed over and left out, because in such a time of trouble, it was not thought good to prefer any man to a government, wherein he was raw and unexperienced. The Armies also were augmented; but to what proportion they arose, either in Cavalry, or Infantry, I dare not set down any thing for certainty; so greatly do authors vary both in the number and quality of the forces. Some say, there was a new supply of 10000 souldiers enrolled. Others affirm, that to the five legions there were were adjoynd four new besides, to the end they might employ nine legions in the wars. Also, that the legions were increased in number both of foot and horle: to wit, with the addition of one thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen in every Legion: [for sometime before, a Legion contained 4000 foot, and 300 horse, called Quadrata legio: whereas at first Romulus ordained it to be 3000 of the one, and 300 of the other] so as a Legion consisted now of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse: and that the associates should double the number of horsemen, and find even proportion of footmen with the Romans.

Some Historians have written, that at what time as the battell of Cannæ was fought, the Romans were in Camp 87200 strong. But in this they all agree, that the Romans warred with greater preparation, and more force and fury than in years past, because the Dictator had put them

A In good hope, that the enemy might be vanquished and subdued at once. But before that these new Legions advanced under their ensigns and banners out of the City, the Decemvirs were commanded to go and peruse the books of Sibylla; by reason that men were commonly put in fear, and terrified with news of strange sights and prodigious tokens. For the rumour went, that both at Rome, in the Aventine, and also at Ardea, it rained stones much about one time; and that in the Sabine Country (which no doubt portended a great massacre and slaughter) there issued out of a certain fountain, waters hot, with much blood: and men were more terrified therewith, because it did so many times together. Besides, in the street called Fornicata toward Campus Martius, divers persons were blasted and smitten to death with lightning from heaven. These prodigious signs were expiate and purged with due remedies out of the foresaid books. Embassadors also from the City of Pestum, brought unto Rome a present of massie boles of beaten gold. Thanked they were like as the Neapolitans before them, but the gold was not received.

At the same time there arrived at Osia from K. Hiero a fleet of ships, ready rigged, and furnished with store of victuals. The Syracusan Embassadors were brought into the Senate house, where they declared, That K. Hiero in soon as he heard of the death of C. Flaminius the Consul, and the defeat of the Army, took it so heavily, that no proper calamity of his own, or loss incident unto his kingdom, could have troubled him more, and touched him nearer: and therefore albeit he knew full well, that the grandeur and courage of the people of Rome, was ordinarily more admirable in their adversity, than in prosperity and welfare, yet he had sent all those things, where-

C with good friends and faithfull Allies are wont to furnish their associates in time of war: praying the LL. of the Senate in any case not to refuse the same, but to take all in good worth. And first & foremost for good luck sake and fortunate presage, they have brought with them the Image of Victory in gold, weighing 320 pound; requesting that it would please them to accept the same, to have and so hold it, as their own for ever. Moreover, they had transported with them 300000 Modios of wheat, and 200000 of barley, to the end they should be at no fault for victuals, and were ready moreover to bring in more, according as they should need, and to what place they would appoint. As for footmen heavily armed and horsemen, he knew well the people of Rome would use none but naturall Romans, or at leastwise Latines. But forasmuch as he had seen and observed in the Roman Camp, forsooth aids consisting of light armed souldiers, therefore he had

D sent 1000 Archers and Slingers, a meet and competent power to match with the Baleares and Morians; and other nations that use shot, and to teach their enemies afar off. Over and besides these gifts and reall presents they counselled and advised them, that the Lord Deputy of Sicily should pass with his fleet into Affrick, to find the enemy work, and give him his hands full of war at home: and also to afford him less respite, and worse opportunity, to send aid and succour to Amibul. The Senate returned this answer again unto the King: That King Hiero had done the part of a right good man, and a singular friend and ally: who ever since that he was entered into amity with the people of Rome, hath held on the same course still, in keeping his faithfull allegiance, and never failed, but at all times, and in all places succoured and advanced the State and Empire of Rome, with all bounty and princely munificence: which the people of

E Rome took most thankfully, as in right they ought. As for gold, some other Cities likewise had brought and offered unto them, but accepting only in good worth their kindness received it not. But the Image of Victory, and the happy presage and foretoken thereof they gladly accepted: and for that blessed Saint, they appointed and dedicated even the Capitol, and Temple of Jap. Op. Max. to be the seat and shrine thereof: that being consecrated in that Castle and highest fortress of the City of Rome, it might be propice and gracious, and remain firm and fast to the people of Rome. As for the slingers and archers, together with the corn they were delivered to the Cos. Five and twenty galleys, with five ranks of oars to a side, were joined to the Navy which was under the conduct of T. Otacilius the Pro-prætor in Sicily: who had commission, if he thought it good and expedient for the commonweal, to pass over into Affrick. The Consuls having finished

F the musters and levied souldiers, staid a few daies, untill their allies were come with aid from the Latines. Then were the Souldiers particularly (a thing never done before) by their Colonels, put to their corporal oath, and sworn to make their repair at the Consuls commandment, and without their leave not to depart: for untill that day there passed nothing but a sacramentall parole & simple promise in general. For whensoever the horsemen resorted to their Decuries, and footmen to their Centuries: both they of the Cavalry in their Decuries, and also of the Infantry in their Centuries, swart (after a sort) voluntarily among themselves, That they would not abandon their ensigns by way of flight, or upon any fear, nor go out of their ranks, unless it were to fetch either some offensive armour, or to smite an enemy, or to save the life of a Citizen. Which having been sometime a voluntary covenant & accord between themselves, was now by the martial Tribunes

G or Colonels reduced to a formal and solemn oath, and bound the souldiers to observe them same, of necessity. Yet before the ensigns set forward and marched out of Rome, the Consul Papirius dealt many hot words and brave orations in the assembly of the people, intimating & porporting thus much in effect: That the Nobles had called for war in Italy, where it was like to remain long enough, and to stick close to the ribs of the commonweal, if she were served with many such Generall as Papirius was. As for my self (quoth he) I shall (I trow) vanquish the enemy, the first day that I set eye upon him, yea, and finish the war at once for ever. But his Colleague Pandus made but one only speech, even the day before they were to take their leave of the City, which was not so so well taken of the people for the present: as it is proved true in the end. wherein he gave them no hard words, nor girded at him otherwise than thus: "That he marvelled much, how any Captain, before he had experience either of his own army, or of his enemies, and knew the situation of the place and ground, and the nature of the country, sitting as yet within the City in his gown, could perfectly tell what he was to do in the field, and in arms: and be able also to foretell and let down the very day, wherein he was to encounter and joyn in ranged battel with the enemy. For his own part, he would not cast thus aforehand, nor plot his designs and counsels before due time & season, which present occurrences are wont much more to minister unto men, than men to fit them to the occurrences that shall happen. This would he with all his heart, That the enterprises taken in hand warily and with discretion, might prove as lucky and fortunate. As for inconsiderat rashness, besides that it implieth folly, hath ever to that day sped but ill. Thus it was well seen, that this man of himself inclined to prefer safe proceeding & advised counsel, before doubtful waies & fool-hardy courses: & to the end that he might persevere in that resolution more constantly, Q. Fabius Maximus at his departure (by report) bad him farewell in this or such like manner. "If either you, O L. Emilius, had a Colleague like unto your self, (which I could rather wish) or that your self were suitable to your Colleague, these my words to you were altogether needless and superfluous. For you twain, being two good Consuls, would even without my speech do all things faithfully to the good of the Commonweal: and contrariwise, if both of you were bad, ye neither would vouchsafe to give ear to my sayings, nor ponder in mind my counsels. But now, when I consider your companion what he is, and your self, to be a man of that quality & worth, you are he to whom alone I am addressed to direct my whole speech: to you, I say, whom me thinks I foresee already, like to be in vain and without effect, an honest man and a good Citizen. For if the Commonweal be hale and lame but of one side, as great sway and authority will bad projects & leud courses carry, as the good sage, and wholsom counsels. For you are far out of the way and much deceived, O L. Emilius, if you think to be less troubled with Annibal than with C. Terentius. And I wot not well, but I greatly fear, that you shall have a more dangerous adversary of the one, than a dangerous enemy of the other. For with Annibal you are to fight in the field, and in time of battel only: but with Terentius you shall have to do in every place, and at all hours. Against Annibal and his Legions you shall make head, and have the help of your own Cavalry and Infantry: but General Terentius will assail you even with your own soldiers. For he be from you in any illense the late remembrance of C. Flaminius, for I love no such humbly prefacing. Howbeit, he began his mad fits when he was once Consul, and never before: when he was in his Province with command, to join the Camp with his Army, and never else. But this Terentius, even before he stood for the Consulship, and all the while he was a suitor therefore, and now likewise, that he is Consul, before that he seeth camp or enemy in field, is horn-mad, and talketh like a man besides himself. What foul work then (think you) will he make, when he shall see himself with armed youths about him in the Camp, who now amongst peaceable Citizens in their gowns and long robes within the City, through so great storms and tempests, drinking and vaunting at every second word, of nothing but of light skirmish, and battel? What a roil, I say, will he keep there, where no sooner a word spoken, but a blow given: and when upon direct command presently ensueth execution? But in case this man (as he saith starkly he will) fall immediately to strike a battel, either I know not what belongeth to Art military, and have neither skill how to conduct this kind of warfare, nor any experience of the quality and nature of this enemy, or else there will be another place more noble and memorable by our defeat and overthrow, than was the Lake Thrasimeneus. But it is no time now to stand upon these terms, and to glorify my self in comparison of this one person who have loved (as it is well known) to exceed a ridge beyond all measure in despising glory & honour, rather than in desiring and coveting the same. But the truth is this & so it will be found in the end, that the only way to war against Annibal, is that which I took and alwaies used. Neither is it the issue and event alone (for that is master and teacher of fools) which sheweth & proveth this unto us, but even reason it self which hath, and will be still the same and immutable, as long as things in the world hold on as they do. We war, (you see) in Italy, at home, in our own ground and place of residence: all quarters round about us, full of our own Citizens or friendly Allies: who daily help us, and will be ready still to furnish us with armour, men, horse, and victuals. Sufficient proof and testimony of their faithfulness have they given us already in our hard distress and adversity. Space and process of time maketh us better stronger, wiser every day than other, and more constant and resolute. Contrariwise, Annibal is in a strange and forein land, in his enemies country, in the midst of all things that are cross and adverse unto him, far from his house and home, far from his native soil, having peace no where, neither by sea nor land. No Cities receive him and give him entertainment, no wals he hath, within which he can retire himself in safety. Nothing seeth he, where so ever he goeth, that he can say is his own. From day to day, from hand to mouth, he liveth of rapine and spoil. Scarce a third part hath he of those forces, which he transported over the river Tiber. Hunger and famine hath wasted more of them, than the edge of the sword: and for this small remainder that is left, he is hard and scant provided of food and sustenance. Make you any doubt then, but we shall vanquish him, whiles we sit still and take our ease, who day by day decayeth sensibly, and waxeth old and feeble, who neither hath store of victuals to maintain his army, nor supply of men to make up his broken bands, nor mass of money to entertain them.

How

A "How long was he fain to fight for Gerion, a poor little Castle in Apulia, as if it had been for the

 "Do you but only consider, how Cn. Servilius and Attilius, the last Consuls, plaied mock-holiday "with him, and deluded him. This is the only way of safety, O L. Paulus, which I fear me, our own "Citizens will make difficult and dangerous unto themselves, more than the enemies can. For "you shall have your own souldier, and your enemies both of one and the same mind. Varro
 "the Roman Consul, and Annibal the Carthaginian General will aim and reach at one and the "self-same thing. And you, being but one man must make account to resist two Captains: and re"sist them you shall well enough, if you will stand firm and hold your own against all bruits and B "speeches of the people; if neither the vain-glory of your fellow that shall be blazed, nor the in"famous rumours that shall be failly blown abroad to your disgrace, shall once stir you from your

 "a wise and sober enemy to fear you, than see foolish and brain-ick Citizens to praise you. Ad"venture all things holdly, Annibal will contemn you: enterprise nothing rashly, he shall dread
 "you. And yet my purpose is not, neither speak I this, that you should enter into no action at all:
 C "but my meaning and advice is, that in all your doings you be guided and directed by sage rea"son, not haled and carried away with blind fortune. Order the matter so, that all things lye "within your compass, and at your disposition. Stand ever armed and upon your guard. Have "your eye about you still, and keep good watch, that neither you lose any opportunity that shal

The Consul answered to these speeches, with no light soun cheer and glad some countenance, as confessing. That all he spake was rather true in substance, than easie in execution. "For (said "he) if the General of horsemen were so violent, and not to be endured of you, who were his D "Dictator and sovereign Commander; what course shall I take, what shift may I make, what "power and authority sufficient, am I like to have, to sway against my seditious, quarrellsome, and "heady Collegue? For mine own part, in my former Consulship, I hardly escaped a scouring, "and much ado I had to pass through the light fire of the flaming peoples doom and heavy "censure wherein I was well scorched and half-burnt. I wish all may be well in the end. Howbeit,
 "if any thing shall fall out other wise than well, I had rather hazard the pikes and darts of the ene"mies, and leave my life behind me, among them, than put my self to be tried again by the voices "and suffrages of angry and testy Citizens. Paulus had no sooner delivered this speech, but (as the report goeth) he went forth on his journey, and the chief LL. of the Senat accompanied him. The ther Commoner Consul was likewise attended of his favourites the Commons, more looked on & E gazed at for their multitude and number, than regarded for the worth & quality of their persons.

So soon as they were arrived at the Camp, and that the new army was intermingled with the old, they divided the whole army into two camps, & ordered the matter so, that the new which was the lesser should be nearer to Annibal; and in the old, the greater number and the whole strength and flower of the main forces should be quartered. Then they sent away to Rome M. Attilius, the Consul of the former year, who excused himself by reason of his old age, and desired to be gone. But they gave unto Cn. Servilius the charge and conduct of one Roman Legion, and besides of two thousand horsemen and footmen of their allies in the lesser Camp. Annibal, notwithstanding he well perceived that the power of his enemies was re-enforced by one half more than before, yet wondrous joyfull he was at the coming of these new Consuls. For not only F he had nothing left him of victuals, which from day to day he purveyed for, to serve his present need and no more; but also there was no more to be had, and nothing remained for to fill his hands with: by reason that after the territory was not safe to travel in, the corn from all parts was conveyed unto the strong walled Towns, and there laid up: so that (as afterwards it was known for certain) he had scarce corn enough for to serve ten daies: and the Spaniards, by occasion of the dearth and want, were at the point to revolt unto the Romans, if they might but espy a good and commodious time therefore. Over and besides, to the inbred rashness and over-hasty nature of the Consul, Fortune also ministred matter to confirm him therein. For in a certain tumultuary skitish (to stop and impeach the forragers and Plunderers of Annibal, and which began rather by chance, as the souldiers hapned to encounter one another, than G upon any confederate counsel aforehand, or by direction and commandment from the Generals) the Carthaginians had the foil, and went by the worst: for of them there were 1700 slain: but of Romans and Confederates, not passing 100. And when in the train of victory they horly followed the chace in disarray, the Consul Paulus, who that day had the absolute command (for they governed by turn each once in day) restrained and staid them. Varro thereat chased and pressed crying out aloud. That he had let the enemy escape out of his hands: and if he had not thus given over the pursuit, the war might have been ended at once. Annibal took this loss and damage nothing near the heart, but rather made full reckoning, that he had caught

(as it were) with a bait & fleshed the audaciousness of the fool-hasty Consul and of the new soldiers especially. For he knew as well all that was done amongst the enemies, as in his own Camp: namely, that the Generals were not suitable nor forcing one unto the other: and that of three parts of the army, two in a manner were but raw, fresh, and untrained soldiers. And therefore supposing he had now got place and time favourable unto him, to contrive and compass some stratagem, the night following he led forth his soldiers, carrying nothing about them but their armour; and abandoned the Camp full of all things, as well private goods and furniture, as public provision: and beyond the next hills, he bestowed secretly in ambush his footmen well appointed and in ordinance of battel on the left hand; and the horsemen on the right: and conveyed all his carriages into the midst between two flanks: to the end, that whiles the enemy was busied in rising and ransacking the tents, forlorn (as it were) and forsaken by the flight of the owners and masters, he might surprize him laden and encumbered with bag and baggage. He left behind him in the Camp many fires burning, to the end that the enemies should verily think and believe, that under a pretended shew of an army in Camp, his purpose was to hold and keep the Consuls amazed still where they were, whiles himself in the mean time might gain more ground and escape further away: like as he had plaid by Fabius the year before. When day-light was come, and the Consul saw, first that the standing guards were gone, and perceived (as they approached nearer) an unwonted silence, they marvelled much. But after they discovered certainly that the Camp was abandoned, and no person remaining behind: there was running of all hands who could run fastest to the pavilions of the Consul, with news that the enemies were fled, in such fear, as they left their tents standing entire, and had quit the Camp wholly: and to the end their flight should be more secret and not descried, they had left light fires burning in every place. Then began they all to cry and call upon the Consul, for to command the standards and ensignes to be brought abroad, and to lead forth in pursuit of the enemies: and without any stay to make spoil and havock of their Camp. And in truth, one of the Consul was no wiser than the common soldiers. But Paulus replied, and told them ever and anon, that they were to be circumspect and wary, and to look about them what they did, for fear of an ambush. Yet seeing in the end no remedy, and that otherwise he could neither stay the mutiny, nor rule the Captain thereof: he sent out M. Stalilius (the Provost marshal) with a troop of Lucan horsemen in especial, to discover the coasts and see all were clear: who having ridden hard to the gates, and given order to all the rest for to stay without the fortifications, himself with two horsemen besides entered within the rampire, and having looked and searched every corner advisedly, he retired and made relation. That past all peradventure there were knives abroad, and a piece of treachery was in hand: for why, there are fires made (quoth he) on that side only of the Camp, that looked toward the enemy: the pavilions stand open, and all things of price and value which they set more store by, are left at random even to their hands: and we have seen besides in divers places, silver plate and coin scattered along the way here and there, as it were a bait laid to train us to a booty. These circumstances reported, of purpose to withdraw their minds from covetous and greedy desire of pillage: set them on and kindled them the more. And the soldiers had no sooner cried aloud, that unless the signal were given, they would set forwards without Commanders: but they had a captain straight at hand to lead them the way: for immediately V. Varro sounded the march. Paulus who of himself made slow haste, and perceived besides that the birds in taking the Auspice, approved not this enterprise nor gave good tokens of happy speed, gave order straightwaies that his Colleague should be advertized of the unlucky Auspice, who was ready now to set out of the gate with his standard & that in any wise he should stay. Wherewith albeit Varro was not well content, yet the late misfortune of Flaminius, and the memorable overthrow at sea of Claudius [* Pulcher] Consul in the Punic war, wrought some scruple of conscience and fear in his heart. But it was even the fair grace of the gods (if a man may so say) and nothing else, which put by and deferred rather than impeached and inhibited the danger and destruction that hung over the Romans heads. For, as good hap was, it chanced at the very instant, when the Consul commanded the ensignes to be brought into the Camp, & the soldiers would not obey him, that two slaves (who served sometime two horsemen, the one a Formian, and the other a Sidicin, and who in the year when Servilius & Attilius were Consuls, among other forragers were taken prisoners by the Numidians) made an escape and fled that day to their old masters again. Who being brought before the Consul, advertized them constantly, that the whole army of Annibal lay close in ambush, ado on the farther side of the mountains. The coming of these bondslaves to right and jump as they did, caused the soldiers to obey their Consul. Whereas the one of them by his ambitious courting and seeking unto them at the first for a Consulship, and afterwards by his unseemly indulgence and pleasing of them, had lost all his majesty and reputation among them.

Annibal, when he saw that the Romans rather began to stir without advice, than still to run rashly on head to the full, and that his crafty device was disclosed and took no effect, returned again into his Camp. Where, he could not for want of corn make abode many daies: and besides, not only soldiers (who were not all one mans children, but a confused mixture of all Nations) began dayly to plot and enter into new designments, but also their Captain himself was of many minds. For whereas they began with muttering and grumbling, and afterwards with open mouth, to demand and call for their due wages, complaining first of the dearth of victuals, and in the end, of meer hunger and famine: and withall a rumour ran, that the mercenary soldiers,

A and the Spaniards especially, were minded and intended to give him the slip, and to turn to the enemy: Annibal likewise bethought himself otherwhiles as it was said, how he might flee into Gallia, but so, as he would leave his Infantry behind him at six and seven, and so be gone with his Cavalry alone. As men, I say, were thus plotting and devising in the camp, he resolved at length to dislodge from thence, and to remove into the hotter countries of Aphria, where the harvest was more timely: considering withal, that the farther he went from the enemies, his souldiers who were by nature light-headed and inconstant, would not so easily revolt and flee from him. So he took his way by night, and made fires likewise, and let a few tents standing in sight, that the Romans, fearing the like trains and ambush, as before, might keep in, and not stir abroad. But when B as the same Statilins the Lucan, having scoured all the coasts, both beyond the camp, and the other side of the hills, and brought word, that he had discovered the enemies afar off dimarching, then began they the morrow after to think and consult of making after him with hot pursuit. But albeit both Consuls continued, as ever before, the same men still, that is to say, diversly minded, and persisting in their several resolutions: but so, as all in a manner accorded with Varro, and none agreed unto Paulus, but only Servilius the Consul of the former year: yet according to the opinion and counsel of the major parts, they went both together (for what might hold that which fatal necessity driveth) to make Canna much renowned and famous for the notable overthrow and defeat of the Romans. Near this village Annibal had encamped under the wind Vulturnus, and had it on his back: which wind, when the fields are scorched and burnt with drought, is wont
 C to bring with it clouds (as it were) of dust. Which as it was good and commodious for the very camp it self, so it was like to serve in special stead, when they should range their battel in order, and fight, with the wind blowing on their back, against the enemy, whose eyes the dust was ready to put out, flying with the wind full in their faces so abundantly.

The Consuls having diligently searched the wayes and tried the passages ever before them, followed Annibal hard, and so soon as they were come to Canna, had him in sight: where they fortified two camps, of like distance almost asunder, as at Gerion; and divided their forces like as before. The river Aufidus ran close by both these camps, and yielded watering places according as either of them had occasion and need, but not without some scuffling and skirmish. But from the lesser camp, which lay on the farther side of Aufidus the Romans had more liberty to water: because upon the farther bank there was planted no sconce nor guard of the enemy. Annibal having D possessed himself of a good plot of ground to his mind, commodious and meet for the service of horsemen (in which kind of forces he was invincible) ordered his battailons in array, & by putting out certain Numidian light horse, made a bravado, and bade the Consuls battel. And even then it fell out, that both the Roman camps were disquieted and troubled anew, what with the mutiny of the souldiers, and what with the disagreement and jarring of the Consuls: whiles Paulus laid hard unto Varro, and set before his eyes the rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius: and Varro again hit him home, and twit him with the example of Fabius, which made so goodly a shew in the eyes of fearful, idle, and cowardly Captains: both of them fell to protesting and calling God and man to witness, the one giving out, that the fault was not in him that Annibal was E now Lord well-near of all Italy already, and why? because himself was kept short and tied fast enough by his Colleague, and the souldiers whose hot blood was up, and who were eager of fight, had their weapons even plucked out of their hands: Emylius on the other side complaining, that if ought should hap amiss unto the Legions thus betrayed, and offered wilfully and unconsiderately to the danger of doubtful battel, notwithstanding he were not blame-worthy but innocent altogether, yet should he be the first that smarted, and be partaker of the mischief and misfortune: and yet he would gladly see, whether they who were so ready and hasty of their tongue to speak, would be as nimble & active of their hands to fight, when the time came. Thus whiles they spend time in chopping of Logick, & quarrelling one with another, rather than in good & sober consultations, Annibal who had stood arranged a good part of the day ready to fight, minding to retire his F other forces into his camp, sent forth certain Numidians out of the battel to charge upon the Romans on the other side of the river, who from the lesser camp went for water. These being a disordered & confused multitude, were not fully landed on the bank, but with the shout only & tumult of the Numidians, they were discomfited and put to flight: whereupon the enemy rode farther, even to the standing Corps de guard, quartered before the rampart, and hard at the very gates of the Roman camp. This was such an indignity offered to the Romans, to see themselves now thus braved and bearded even in the very camp by the auxiliary souldiers, and the rascal sort of the enemies, that there was no other thing stayed the Romans from passing the river presently, and embattelling themselves, but only this, that it was Paulus his turn that day to have the sovereign command of all. And therefore the morrow after, when it came to Varro his course for to rule, G without any advice of his companion, he put forth the signal of battel, and with all his forces put in order of battel, went over the river. Paulus also followed after him, as one who might well enough mislike and disallow the purpose of his Colleague, but otherwise could neither will nor chuse, but second him, and take part in the execution. Being once over the river, they join also the forces which they had in the smaller camp, unto the other: and in this manner they ordered the battel. In the right point which was neerer to the river, was arranged the Roman Cavalry, and after them the footmen. The left point on the outside, was flanked with the horsemen of the allies: within stood their Infantry: but in the middle part were bestowed the Arthers

and loose shot, close to the main battel of the Roman Legions : and of all the rest of light armed auxiliary souldiers, consisted the van-guard. The Consuls led both the points, Terentius the left, Emilius the right, Cn. Servilius had the conduct of the main battel. Now Annibal by the break of day, having sent before the Balear slingers, and his other light armor, passed over the river, and marshalled them in battel array, ever as they came to land. The horse as well Gauls as Spaniards, he opposed in the left point, neer to the bank, even against the horsemen of the Romans: the right consisted of the Numidian light horse: and the main battel was strengthened and fortified with his Infantry: but in such manner as the Africans flanked both, in manner of wings: and between them were bestowed the Gauls and the Spaniards in the midtt. A man that had seen the Africans, would have taken most of them for Romans, so armed were they with Roman armor, gotten much of it at Trebia, but most of all at Thrasymenus. The Frenchmen and Spaniards had targets neer of one fashion, but their swords were unlike and far differing. Those of the Gauls were very long and not pointed. But the Spaniard, whose manner is rather to fight with the thrust and to foyn, then to slash and strike edglong, had handsome short curtillasses, and sharp at the point. And after this sort stood these two nations armed before the rest (terrible to behold, both for the bigness of their persons, and also for their habit and attire.) The Gauls all from the navel upward naked: the Spaniards with linnen waistcoats or jackets, glittering wondrous bright, bordered and embroidered with purple and scarlet. The compleat number of all, as well horse as footmen, that stood embattelled, amounted (as they report) unto forty thousand foot, and ten thousand men of arms. These Captains had the leading of the two points, to wit, Asdrubal commanded the left, Maharbal the right. Annibal himself in person with his brother Mago, conducted the middle battel. The Sun shone sidewise upon the flanks both of the one and also of the other army, very indifferent and commodious to both parts: were it that they were so placed and marshalled of set purpose, or chanced at adventure so to stand: the Romans with their faces full south, the Carthaginians into the north. But the wind which the inhabitants of that country call Vulturnus, arose and blew full upon the faces of the Romans, and raised such store of dust, and drave it so upon their eyes, that it took away their sight and prospect. The cry and shout began on both sides, and the Auxiliary souldiers put themselves forth first to skirmish, and charged one another with their light shot. Then the left point of the Gauls and Spanish men of arms encountered and ran full upon the right hand of the Romans Cavalry, nothing at all after the order of horse-service, for they were of necessity to affront one another straight forward, as having no room left about them to sling out and ride at large, being flanked on the one hand with the river, and enclosed on the other with the battaillon of footmen. Whereupon I say, they were forced to charge full butt from both parts, directly before them so long as their horses stood close and thrust together: but at length when they began to stir and wince, the riders, man to man, fell to take hold and claspe one another, and every man to pluck his enemy besides his horse, so as now they were driven much what to fight on foot. This conflict was rather sharp then long: and to be short, the Roman Cavalry was discomfited and put to flight. And anon, as the horse made an end of their fight, began the skirmish of the foot also. At the first the Gauls and Spaniards equal to their enemies both in force and courage maintained the conflict right hardily, and kept their order and arraias. At length the Romans cast about and devised on what side, and with what form of a close battaillon, to force back that pointed squadron of the enemies, ranged very thin, and by so much the weaker, and bearing out withal, from the rest of the battel. Now when they had once driven them to retreat, and give ground, the Romans pressed on still at one instant, and with the same violence pierced through them as they fled for fear headlong, until they were entred as far as to the very midtt of the vanguard and main battel: and finding none able to stand in their way and make resistance, they gained in the end the very rereward of the Africans: who having drawn in from both sides their skirts and wings, stood together strong, and firmly kept their ground. The Gauls and Spaniards continued still in the midtt, somewhat advanced without the rest of the battel. Now when this pointed squadron was driven in by the Romans, and made even and equal first with the front of the battel, and afterwards upon farther enforcement, gave way for them to pass in a lane through the midtt thereof: by that time the Africans charged upon their flanks: and while the Romans unwarily were engaged over far within them, they came about them on the skirts, and within a while having stretched out and spread their wings, enclosed the enemies round on their backs also. Hereupon the Romans who had performed one battel and conflict in vain, were forced to give over the Gauls and Spaniards, whom they had disarried and put to flight, and were to begin a fresh fight with the Africans: and that to their own great disadvantage: not only because they being enclosed and pent up in a straight room, were to deal with them that had compassed them all about and were at liberty: but also because they being wearied, were to maintain a new skirmish with those that were fresh in heart, and lusty. And now by this time, in the left point of the Romans battel, where the horsemen of their associates were marshalled to affront the Numidians they were faine to close fight: which at the first these Numidians began but coldly and faintly, after the deceitful manner of Carthaginians, unto whom they were fast and neer neighbours. For 500. of them or thereabout, having besides their usual javelins and darts which they commonly carry, short daggers or skeins hidden under their cuirass and harness, made semblance of riding away from their own companies, and siding to the Romans, with their bucklers at their backs, all of a sudden dismounted from their horses, and throwing their bucklers, targets,

And spears at their enemies' feet; were mov'd within the main battle; and from thence con-fled to the hindmost in the rereward, were commanded there to abide behind at their back. And until such time as the skirmish joyned on all sides, they continued quiet. But when they saw every mans eye and mind busied and occupied in the conflict, then they caught up those buckles that lay strowed and scattered among the dead bodies in the field, and played upon the battell of the Romans from behind; and what with wounding their backs, scouring their hind parts, they made for mirth and laughter among them; and more therein they raised a greater fear and tumult by far. Now when the Romans in one place were lighted and run away, and in another flung for life, armed only with the pain of all means to escape. Asdrubal who had the charge of that side, Beaught the Numidian horsemen, who fought but coldly with those that stood still to them; to be withdrawn from the middle of the battell, and sent them to pursue the enemies in the chase. And to the Africans over every now with execution and killing, rather then with any other fight, he joyned the Gauls and Spanish footmen to assist them. On the other side of the battell, Panfilus, albeit at the very first shock and encounter, he was sore wounded with a bullet from one of a sling, yet sometimes he made head against Annibal and kept his battall close and thick together, yea, and in divers places suited the conflict, and evermore the Roman horsemen guarded and protected him. But at the last they left their horses, because the Consul's strength failed him to rule his town, and so to him. Where upon there was one brought word unto Annibal; that the Consul had commanded his men of arms to light foot. Then (saith Annibal as the report goeth) Yea, mir-

Cry: But how much gladder would I be, if he delivered them into my hands bound hand and foot? And surely the foremen fought to after they wereighted, as if there had been no doubt but that he enemy had the victory. Howbeit, although they had the worse, yet they chose rather to die in the place, then to fly: and the victors ragged at the heart with them for thus staying the accomplishment of the victory, went down with them, and killed outright all those whom they could not make to give ground and yield. And yet a few such as were wearied with much toil and overcharged with many woundes they enforced to retreat. Among they were all disbandd and scattered: and as many as could, recovered their horses and fled away. On Lemmings Col.

 "protect you also. Come I say, and make not this battel more curfed and sorrowful by the death "of a Gentle. Without it I wot, we have taule enough already, and too much, of dolorous tears "and woeful lamentation. Whereunto the Consul made this answer: I give thee thanks, O L. Com"mellus gra-mency for thy kindness, and God bleis thee in this thy vertue and providen. But take "thou heed to thy self, lest by thy foolish pity of me, thou lose that little aide which thou hast to "escape out of the hands of the enemies. Save thy self, and go thy ways to the LL of the Senat,
 "and wille them all from me in general to forfike the City of Armen, and men it well with strong "guards, before the enemy follow the train of victory, and come againe in. But more particular ly, let Q. Felix understand, that L. Emilius, was mindful of his whole duty precepts; all the while he lived, and now also forgas them not at the hour of his death. And suffer thou me to yeeld unto nature, and let go my last breath, even here amongst the heaps of mine own slain. I die, that I may end my days, and die neither an accused and guilty person, nor in my God's faith. (Thi) stand up to accuse my Colleague, and to defend mine own innocency, and justifie my selfe, by the blaming of another. As the Consul uttered these words, first the multitude of his own citizens in the rout, and then the enemies in pursuit, ran oyer him; and not knowing who he was, overwhelmed him with javelins and darts good store. As for Levulus, his horse carried him away to a little hill. Then they fled all swim as fast as they could, 7000. recovered the lesser camp, and ten thousand the greater; and upon two thousand, put themselves into the village in seek of ¶ Came. But because it was an unparallel and fencible town, they were immediately environed by Caracalla and the horsemen, and in perished every one. The other Consul made no semblance, either he was offended or displeased with the companies that thus fled, went in of purpose, or as it chanced: and accompanied with fifty men of arms, or thereabouts, escaped to Kanisa. In this battle were slain of Romans (by report) 30000 footmen, and 2700 horsemen; and in a manner, (as) many besides of Allies, as of natural Citizens. Amongst whom there was one Consul, two Treasurers, L. Aulus, and Ennius Sabinus; 21 Colonels: some also who had been Consuls, Praetors, and Ediles. Of which number was C. Serranus, and C. Minutius Numeius, who the year before had been Commander of the Cavalry for some certain days. Besides 80 Senators, or such as were almost as noble fellows, and had borne those dignities, in regard whereof, they might be chosen Senators. ¶ These served as volunteering, and were enrolled among the Legions. There were taken prisoners at this field, as the general speech went, 20000 footmen, and 2000 men of Arms, besides aid and help to 7000

This is that noble battle, in former times overthrow to Cannae, and comparable to that defeat at the river Alia. For like as this was of less importance, then the other, in respect of that which ensued after the conflict, because the enemy flayed his hand, and purchased not his victory: so if we consider the loss of men and defeat of the army, it was the greater, and for the shameful flight more dishonorable. For the running away that was at Alia, as it betrayed the City, so it saved the Army: but at Cannae, when the one Consul fled, there were scarce 30. of his army that accompanied him, and with the other Consul, while he lay bleeding and dying, all his force to spoil of, hook their heads by his sides, and so they both died. Now then being a number in both camps, half disarmed, and wholly without their chief Commanders: the Captains of the greater Camp sent a messenger unto the other, willing them to come over to them, that they might march in one entire company together, and depart to in the night season, while their enemies were fast asleep, as partly wearied with long fight and partly charged with wine & good cheer after their joyful victory. This advice there were that misliked together and rejected. For why (say they) might we then change our enemies? as well as well as we may as soon join together. Because I will not be weary, besween are full of enemies, and they these rather to hazard the bodies of others, than their own either own persons into great danger. Others were not so much displeased for any dislike of the sion, as their hearts failed them to make a hard the enterprise thereof. Then said P. Sempronius and a Colonel. And will ye rather chuse (quoth he) to be taken captive by a more sons and our enemy? And to have your heads valued at a price? And that Chapmen coming to buy you in the market, should as ever use of you this question, Whether art thou a Roman Citizen, or a Latin Confederate? And so by thy disgrace, reach, and misery, another man shall get his head, and thy self none. Ye are not (I see well) like to Lucius Decius, who made his choice to die valiantly, than to live in shame and obloquy. But to many other to brave and hardy men, who die about him dead on the ground by heaps. But before day light, surprise thousand great troops of enemies before the passages, let us break through these, that in disorder and out of array, make so soon noise about gates. The point of sword and edge of courage, is able to pass through enemies, stand they never so thick and close together. We will make a pointed bar-raillon in wedgedown, and piece through their loose and thin squadrons, as easily as if nothing stood in our way. Go with me therefore as many of you, as are willing to save your lives and make Common-weal. The word was no sooner out of his mouth, but his sword was out of sheath, and with a pointed battailon took his way through the midst of the enemy, and when the Numidians flanked them, and shot hard at their right side that lay open to them, they shifted their targets to their right arm, and so escaped, to the number of 600, unto the bigger camp, and forthwith from thence, joining to the other greater company, they retired themselves safe to Cala Fiume.

These exploits were performed by men vanquished; more upon present fit of courage, as each man's natural instinct guided; or chance led him, than either any sage advice of their words, or command of either word or deed. Now when all the rest came about, immediately upon this noble victory, to congratulate and rejoice with him, yea, and to advise him, that after so great a battle performed, he should the rest of that day, and the whole night following, both refresh himself, and also give rest and repose to his wearied soldiers. Mitridates General of the Cavalry, was of mind that it was no giving occasion: Nay (quoth he) that you may know of what consequence this battle is, you shall break your fast and eat your dinner five days hence in the Capitol. Follow hardy with your horsemen, that they may see you and come, before they hear that you are coming. No faith, said he again, but cherish on Gods mine go afore, and spare not to carry news thereof. Your words are good, and it is a gay matter and plausible you speak of: but the way thereto is long, and more than I can presently conceive and comprehend. I give you thanks Mitridates, and commend your good mind and forwardness, but we had need to deliberate and pause further upon this point. Mitridates said, I see well, that God hath rendered one man with all gifts. Then said he way Mitridates to win a victory, but not the grace to use a victory. And surely, in this one day delay, as it was commonly believed, stood the safety and preservation of the City & Empire of Rome.
Thenceforward, as soon as ever the day began to appear, they minded only and intended the plundering of spoils, and to view that great butchery and slaughter: a painful and lamentable sight even to the very enemies to behold. So many thousand Romans lay there along in every place, horrid and so broken with mail, one with another, according as their hap was to meet together, and either to join in fight, or die in flight. Some were seen to arise up all bloody from out of the midst of the slaughtered bodies, such, as the bitter morning cold had nipped their wounds, and made them to start up by reason of their smart, and were by the enemy knocked down again and killed. Other some they found lying along all alive, but shorter by the thighs & hands, who offered their bare necks & throats to be cut, and said unto them to let forth the rest of their blood. Others were found with their heads covered within the earth, who as it appeared had made themselves holes to get into the ground for this purpose, to inter themselves whereinto they thrust their mouths & faces, & being buried with mud & dirt over them, were so filled & choaked. But above all the rest there was one that drew every mans eye upon him, & made them all to wonder. Mitridates said, with his nose and ears piteously tingled & chafe, but yet alive, lying under a Roman dead.
For when his hands so wounded as they were, would not serve him to handle a weapon, for very anger he set his hand to lay (so long as he had any breath within him) bidding his enemy with his teeth.
After they had spent a good part of the day in gathering spoils, Mitridates marched forward to assault the lesser camp, and first and foremost he turned aside the arm of the river that flanked them, and so excluded them from the water. But they all within being over wearied with long watching and bleeding of their wounds, yielded sooner than he looked for, and covenanted, Mitridates to deliver up their armor and horses. Mitridates to pay 300, Mitridates peace

A peeces of silver, for every Roman: 100. for every one of the Allies: and every bondman 100 a peece. Item, that after this ransom paid, they should depart in their single apparel: Thus they received their enemies into the camp, and were themselves put all in ward: but, Allies and Citizens by themselves, apart one from the other. While they trilled time there, there were about 4000. footmen, and 200 horsemen, even as many as either their strength or hearts would serve, who out of the greater camp fled to Canusium, some marching in order, others scattering abroad over the fields, which was not the worse way of the twain, and less safe. And when the camp was surrendered to the enemy, by those that were hurt and heartles, upon the same conditions that the other was. A rich booty was there gotten: and setting aside hories, and men, and silver, which they used much in trappings and caparions of their hories, (for souldiers, be yefire, occupied very little silver, either in their own apparel, or at their board) all the pillage was given to be rifled and ransacked amongst them. Then he gave commandment, that the dead bodies of his own men should be gathered together for to be buried. And as men say, they were to the number of eight thousand, all right valiant and hardy men. Some Authors report, that the Roman Consul also was fought up and interred. As for those, which escaped to Canusium, were by the Canosins entertained only within the walls, and lodged in their houses: but a noble Lady and a wealthy, named Busa, relieved them with some victual, a apparel, yea, and money also in their purses for their journey. In regard of which bountifull liberality of hers, after the war was finished, she was highly honored by the Senat of Rome.

C Now, there were amongst them four Colonels, namely, Fabius Max. of the first Legion, whose father had been Dictator the year before: and L. Publicius Bibulus, of the second Legion, together with P. Cornel. Scipio, and Appius Claudius Pulcher of the third Legion, who had been Aedile but lately afore: and by general consent of them all, P. Scipio, a very young man, and Ap. Claudius were chosen to bear the sovereign rule, and to have the absolute command and conduct of the army. But as they sat with some few others, in counsel together about the manning of their main affairs, behold P. Furin Philus, whose father had been a Consul, gave them to understand, that all their consultations were in vain, and that they did but foster and cherish a foolish hope of an overthrown state: for the Common-weal was in a desperate case, past all cure, and remediless. Also that certain noble young Gentlemen, of whom L. Cecilius Metellus was the principal, minded nothing else but to take sea, and were ready to embark, to abandon Italy, and to fly for succor to some King or other. This evil tidings as it was most grievous and heavy in it self: so falling out as it did, presently upon other misfortunes so suddenly and unlooked for, put them into their dumps, and wonderfully amazed and astonished them all. And when they that were present in place laid their heads together, and thought good to call others to counsel upon this point, Scipio a young man, even then predestined to be the fatal Captain of this war, answered: What do we here? (quoth he) it is no time now to sit consulting in so great extremity, but leaving all discourses, presently to proceed to action, and to do some exploit. As many therefore as are willing to save the Common-weal, take arms and go with me forthwith: for no where are our enemies (to say a truth) encamped against us more, then where such designments are plotting and contriving. Forth he went with a few following after him, unto the lodging of Metellus: and finding there the young Gentlemen afore said, close together in counsel thereabout: he drew his sword, and brandisht it naked over their heads, as they sat in consultation. "I swear before you all (quoth he) and I swear from my very heart, and no man urgeth me thereto, that I for my part will neither forsake the Common-weal, nor suffer any Citizen else of Rome to abandon her. And if I fail witting and willing, then confound me O Jup. Opt. Max. and bring a most shameful end upon my house, my family, and all that I have. Swear thou O L. Cecilius after me, as I have done, I advise thee: and ye all that are here present take the same oath: for whosoever shall refuse, know he assuredly, that upon him I have drawn this sword. Hereat they being no less terrified, then if they had seen the Conqueror himself Annibal in person, took the oath every one, and yielded themselves unto Scipio, for to be kept in ward to serve against Annibal.

At the same time, whiles these things were working at Canusium, there arrived at Venusia, upon four thousand foot and horsemen together, such as in their flight had been separated asunder all over the fields, and repaired unto the Consul there. The Venusins took order for them all, that they should be gently entertained, and carefully tended, and divided into several houses: and they bestowed upon the horsemen, a side cassock, a coat, and 25. Quadrigates a peece: and gave ten Quadrigates to every footman: and armor besides, to as many as wanted. And in all other courtesies of hospitality, both publick and privat, they strove and endeavoured that the people of Venusia should not in any kind of friendly offices, come behind one woman of Canusium. Howbeit in regard of the great multitude, the burden and charge lay more heavy upon dame Busa. G Scipio now their number was risen to be ten thousand. Then Appius and Scipio having intelligence that the other Consul was alive and well, dispatched a messenger presently, to advertise him how many footmen and horsemen there were in all with them: and to know his pleasure withal, whether he would command the army to be brought unto Venusia, or abide still at Canusium. But Parro (the Consul) of his own accord brought his forces to Canusium. So as by this time, they made a pretty good shew of a Consular army, and seemed sufficient to defend themselves, if not by force of arms in the field, yet at leastwise, with the strength of walls within the town. But the news came to Rome, that there was not so much as this small remnant left of Citizens and

Confederates together: but that the two Consuls and both the armies were put all to the sword, and hewn in pieces to the last man: Never was there known so great a rout and tumult within the walls of Rome (and the City still remaining in safety.) I will therefore even at first, sink under my load and saying nothing at all: and never will I go about to recount those things by discourse of words, which in reporting, I should make less then they were indeed. For there went not now, a flying rumor first of one foil, and then of another: to day of this loss, and to morrow of that: as the year before, when the Consul and his army were defeated at Thrasymenus, but manifold overthrowes together were multiplied and altogether at once, to wit, how both the Consuls were slain, and two Consular armies lost: no camp, not a pavilion of the Romans left standing: neither Leader nor Souldier remaining alive: and now Annibal was now become Lord of Apulia, of Samnium, and well neer of all Italy full and whole. And verily, there is not (I suppose) a nation under the scope of heaven besides, but would have been overwhelmed and crushed utterly under the huge heap and heavy weight of so great a ruin & overthrow. Should I compare therefore the defeat and foil that the Carthaginians received at the Island Egates, in a conflict at sea, wherewith they were so quelled, and their backs so broken, that at one clap they lost Sicilia and Sardinia both, and that which more is, yielded themselves tributaries and subjects to the people of Rome. Or should I make comparison of their unfortunate and unhappy battel in Africk afterwards? wherein this very same Annibal gave over play, yielded the bucklers, and confessed himself vanquished. Nay, they are not any way comparable with this, but only that they were born and supported with less courage, and valour of mind.

Well, to proceed, P. Furius Philus, and M. Pomponius the Pretors, assembled the Senat in the Court Hosilia, for to consult about the defence and guard of the City: for they made no doubt, but now that the armies were both defeated, the enemy would speedily come to assault Rome, the only piece of work, and warlike service that remained behind undone. But being to seek what counsel to take, and what remedy to devise for redress of these calamities, so exceeding great and grievous, and yet not known to the full, and interrupted and shrewly troubled besides with the clamorous noises and plaints of women: while that in every house almost, they ceased not to mourn, weep, and wail confusedly, as well for the quick as the dead (because as yet it was not openly and for certain known who were alive, and who were slain.) Then Fabius Max. gave his opinion, that certain light horsemen should be made out and sent forth by the highways Arpia and Latina, and to ride along, and enquire of them whom they hapned to meet with, (such I mean as fled, and were scattered here and there asunder) if happily some of them could report upon his knowledge, what was become of the Consuls, and the armies: and in case the immortal gods had of their mercy and compassion spared some poor remnant still of this miserable and woful Empire, for the Roman name: where that residue of small forces was: what way Annibal took: and whither he was gone after the battel was fought: what preparation he maketh, what presently he is doing, or intendeth for to do. His advice was, I say, that to espy, hearken and learn certainly, these premises, certain lusty young men, active and industrious, should be employed. But for the LL. of the Senat thus much, that considering there were few Magistrates at home, and those not able to rid the City of this tumultuous and fearful hurlyburly, therefore they should take upon themselves, to debar the dames and women, for coming abroad, and force them every one to keep home, and tarry within doors: to restrain the plaints and outcries of households and families: to cause silence throughout the City: to take order that all Rods, and messengers of news, should be brought before the Pretors: and that every man should attend at home the tidings, good or bad, that concerned himself, or his own state. Over and besides, that they should set warders at the gates, to see that no person went out of the City, and compel every man to hope for no other earthly safety for themselves, but in the preservation of the City, and walls thereof. And when the tumult and hurry is once hushed, then (quoth he) may the Senators well be called again into the Councel-House, and consult for the defence and safeguard of the City. When all the assembly liked well, and approved of this opinion, and went every man on Fabius his side without contradiction, so as the market place, by authority of the Magistrates, was cleared and voided of the multitude, and the Senators were divided and gone sundry ways to appease the uproars: then at last, came letters from Terentius the Consul, importing, that L. Emilius the Consul was slain together with the army: that himself was at Cannas, busie in rallying the reliques of so great an overthrow, as it were after a shipwrack upon the sea: and there were ten thousand souldiers of them, or very nere, and those much out of frame and good order. As for Annibal, he sat still now at Canna, busily occupied about the ransoming of prisoners, and intensive to the rest of the spoil and pillage: nor measuring the victory with the mind and courage of a conqueror, nor yet after the guise and manner of a noble warrior and great commander. Then were the privat and particular losses also divulged and spread abroad through every man his house and family, and the whole City was so filled with sorrow and lamentation, that the Anniversary solemnity of sacrifices to Ceres was forelet, because it was not lawful for those that mourned to celebrate the same: and there was not a marzon throughout the City, but was in heaviness and sorrow for the time. Left therefore other sacrifices likewise, as well publick as privat, upon the same occasion, should be neglected and discontinued, there passed an Act of the Senat, by vertue whereof a term was prefixed, to make an end of mourning within thirty days. Now was the trouble of the City no sooner allayed, and the Senators called again into the Councel-House: but to mend the matter, there were other letters brought out of Sicily from T. Octavius the Vice-pretor, notifying thus much, That the realm of Hiero was much wasted by the Carthaginian navy: and when he would have succoured him at his earnest suit and petition, there was another Armado ready rigged, decked and furnished, riding by the Islands Egates, waiting the opportunity of the time, that when the Carthaginians perceived once that he had turned and bent his forces, to the defence of the coast and river Syracuse, they might immediately set upon Lilybaeum, and the rest of the Roman province. And therefore in case they were minded to aid and maintain a confederate King, and defend the Realm of Sicily, they must of necessity rig and man another fleet out of hand. When the letters both of the Consul and also of the Vice-Pretor were read, agreed it was, and thought meet, that M. Claudius, Admiral of the fleet which rid in the harbour of Ostia, should be sent unto the army at Cannusum, and letters be dispatched withal unto the Consul, willing him upon the delivery of the army unto the Pretor, to repair unto Rome with all speed possible, and not fail, so far forth as he might, without any detriment and hindrance of the Common-weal. Besides these so great losses and adversities, men were put in fear with sundry prodigious tokens: and among others, in that one year, two Vestal Virgins, Opimia, and Floronia, were detected and attainted of manifest whoredom: the one of them was buried quick, as the manner was, under the ground at the gate Collina, the other killed her self. L. Caninius (a Secretary or Scribe unto the Bishops, whom now they call * Minores Pontifices) the party who had committed fornication with Floronia, was by the chief or high Priest so beaten with rods in the Comitium, that he died under his hand. This heinous last, and enormous offence falling out among so many misfortunes and calamities, was reckoned, I say, (as usually it is) for a portentous sign: and therefore the Decemvirs were commanded to search and peruse the Books of Sibylla. And Q. Fabius Pictor was sent to Delphos, to consult with the Oracle there of Apollo, and to learn, by what prayers and supplications they might pacify the gods, and what would be the end of so great and fearful miseries. In the mean while, out of the learning contained in those books of destinies, there were performed certain extraordinary Sacrifices: among which, a Frenchman together with a French woman: likewise a Grecian man and woman, were let down alive in the beast market into a vault under the ground stoned all about: a place aforetime embred and polluted with the blood of mankind sacrificed, but not according to the ceremonies and religion of the Romans. When they had sufficiently (as they thought) pacified the gods, M. Claudius Marcellus sent from the haven of Ostia for the defence and guard of the City, 1500. souldiers: whom he had levied and enrolled for the service at sea. Himself having sent afore the legion belonging to the Armado (which was the third) with Theanus Sidicinus a Colonel, and delivered the fleet unto P. Furius companion with him in commission: within few days after made haste, and with great journeys arrived at Cannusum. At Rome, by vertue of the Authority of the Senators, M. Junius was created Dictator, and T. Sempronius General of the horse, who proclaimed a muster, and enrolled all the younger sort above 17. years old, yea, and some also under that age, that yet were in their * Prætexta, and were not come to * Toga virilis. Of these were made up four legions full, and a thousand horsemen. Likewise they sent unto their Allies, and namely, to the Latine nation, to receive souldiers from thence according to the form of the league: giving commandment, that harness, weapons, and all other habiliments of war, should be in readines. Also to furnish out the army, they plucked from the Temples, and publick Galleries and walking Places, the ancient spoils and armor of their enemies. And for very need and want of free men, they were compelled to devise a new kind of mustering never used before: for they bought up in open market, with the City money, 8000. lusty strong young men, meer bond-slaves: but they demanded first of every one by himself, whether they were willing to serve in the wars, and so they put them in armor. And they thought it better to take up and levy souldiers thus; then to redeem and buy again their own who were captives, albeit they might have been ransomed for smaller sums of money. For Annibal, after this so fortunate field fought at Canna, setting his mind wholly upon the affairs belonging to an absolute conquest, rather then any more wars: caused his captives to be brought forth, and severed the Roman confederates apart from the rest: and unto them (as he had done aforetime at Trebia, and the Lake Trasymenus) he spake graciously, and sent them home untansomed. The Romans also he called unto him, and gave them kind and loving words, more then ever he had done before. "What? we and the Romans (quoth he) war not mortally and deadly one with the other to the utmost: nay, our quarrel is rather for honour and sovereignty. And as my father and progenitors afore me, were subdued of the Romans, and yielded at length to their valor and prowess: so the only thing that I seek for, and endeavor unto is this, That they likewise in their alternative turn, may give place unto my felicity and vertue together. And therefore I grant the Romans this favor and liberty, to redeem their prisoners: and this shall be the ransom, for every man of arms I demand * 500. Quadrigari, 300 for a foot-man, and 100. for a bond-man. And albeit the horsemans ransom was somewhat enhanced, above that sum which they capitulated for, when they yielded, yet glad they were to accept of any condition and covenant whatsoever. So it was agreed, that ten out of them should be chosen by voices, to go to Rome unto the Senat: and he took no other pledge for assurance of them but their oath, that they would return again. With them was sent Carthalo, a Noble man of Carthage with commission (if he could perceive haply the Romans encline to peace) to offer unto them conditions, and to capitulate with them. They were not so soon gone out of the camp, but one of them (a man of no Roman nature and disposition) made semblance, as if he had forgotten himself behind him, and so to discharge himself (forsooth) of his oath, returned into the camp, and before night overtook his company again. When word was brought, that they were coming to Rome, there was a Licor sent out to meet Carthago upon the way, and to warn him in the name of the Dictator, before night to depart out of the confines of the territory of Rome. But the Committees of the Captives had audience granted them in the Senat-house by the Dictator. And the principal man among them, Marcus Junius, spake in this manner.

The Oration
of M. Junius to

"Right honourable, and my very good LL. of the Senat, There is not one of you all ignorant, that never any City whatsoever, hath been at lets charge for redeeming of prisoners taken in wars, and made so small regard of them, then ours. But if we be not blinded in our own conceits, and think better of our cause, then there is reason: never were there any souldiers that fell into the hands of our enemies, more to be accounted of by you then we are. And why? We yielded not our weapons in battel for cowardize and fear, but after that we had stood well neer until night fighting over the dead bodies of our fellows slain, and so maintained the fight to the very last, then we retired our selves into the camp. The rest of the day and night following, notwithstanding we were weary with travel, and faint of our hurts, yet we manfully defended our rampart. The morrow after, when we were beset and invested round about by the conquerors army, yea, and excluded from water; and saw no other hope at all to break through our enemies, ranged so strong and close together, and thinking it not a matter of reproof, and against the law of arms, that when 50000. of our Citizens were slain in field, some Roman souldiers should remain alive after the battel of Canna: then and not afore, we agreed upon a sum of money, that being ransomed, we might be set at large, and so we yielded unto the enemies our weapons, wherein now we saw no help at all. We have heard likewise, that our ancestors redeemed themselves from the Gauls with a sum of gold: and our fathers also, notwithstanding they were most straight laced, and hardly brought to capitulate and compound for peace, yet sent Embassadors to Tarentum, for to redeem their captives: and both those battels, first in Italy with the Gauls; and then before Heraclea with Pyrrhus, were not so ignominious and shameful for the losse it self, as for the fright and beastly running away. But the plains of Canna are covered all over with heaps of Roman bodies; and we that be here had not remained alive after them, but that the enemies strength held out no longer, nor their sword would serve to kill any more. And yet there be some of our men also who fled not back in battel: but being left behind to guard the camp, were taken prisoners by the enemy as well as we, at what time as it was surrendered into their hands. Certainly, I envy not the fortune, nor repine at the welfare and good estate of any Citizen or fellow souldier, neither would I be thought the man, who by debasing another, would seem to advance my self. But even they verily (unless peradventure good footmanhip and swift running deserve reward) who for the most part fled out of the field unarmed, and never stinted before they gat Venusia or Canusium over their heads, cannot justly prefer themselves before us, nor boast and glory, that they stand the Common-weal in better stead, then we. Find them you shall (I doubt not) good men and valorous souldiers: so shall you us too, yea, and more ready to do true service to our country, in that by your bounty and good means we have been ransomed and restored again into our country. Ye have levied souldiers of all ages and degrees, and I hear say, there be 8000. bondmen in arms. We are no fewer in number our selves, and redeemed we may be with as small moneys as they are bought. I say no more but so, for if I should make farther comparisons between us and them, I must do wrong to the Roman name and nation. This is a special thing moreover (my LL.) which in mine advice ye are duely to consider in this deliberation, in case ye be so hard-hearted, as to have no regard of us, or of our desert, namely, in what enemies hand ye leave us. It is with Pyrrhus peradventure, who used us being his prisoners, like friends and guests. Nay, is he not a Barbarian and Carthaginian? who whether he be more covetous or cruel, can hardly be imagined. O that ye saw the irons and chains, the nasty filthiness and foul usage of your Citizens. I am assured, you would be no less moved and affected to compassion at the sight thereof, then if ye beheld on the other side your Legions lying slain all over the plains and fields of Canna. Ye may observe and behold the sorrowful cheer, and salt tears of our kinsfolk standing here in the porch and entry of this Court, and waiting for your answer. And if they so fare, and are so pensive for us, and for them that are absent, what heavy hearts have they themselves (think ye) whose liberty and whose life lieth now a bleeding? And in good faith, if so be Annibal himself would, contrary to his nature, be respective and merciful to us, yet should we think our lives did us small good, so long as we are reputed of you unworthy to be ransomed and redeemed. There returned in times past to Rome certain captives, sent home by Pyrrhus without any ransom paid; but the returned accompanied with Embassadors, right honorable personages of this City, who had been sent for their redemption. And shall I return unto my country again not esteemed a Citizen worth 300. Deniers. Every man hath a mind by himself, and a fanie of his own my LL. And I wot well, that my body and life is in jeopardy. But I fear more the hazard of honor and good name, lest we should be thought condemned and rejected by you. For the world will never believe, that you did it to spare your purse, and to save money.

When he had made an end of his speech, immediately the multitude who were gathered together in the common place, set up a lamentable and piteous cry, and held out their hands unto the Counsel.

The Oration
of T. Manlius Torquatus in the Senate.

A Council-house, breaching the LL. of the State to let them have and enjoy their children, their brethren, and kinsfolk again. The very women also, for fear and necessity, thrust themselves among this peck of men in the market place. But when all others before the Senators were ended, they began to debate and confute about the matter in hand. Great variance there was in opinion. Some thought it reason that their ransoms were to be paid out of their own pockets; others were of mind, that the City should bear no charge at all for their redemption: many they would not be against it, but that they might be enticed and deluded at their own cost and expence; and in such case were any that had not ready coin enough for present payment, the chamber of the City should lend them money, so as the people might have good security, as well by bonds bound, as by their good and lands, mortgaged for the satisfaction of that debt. And when T. Manlius Torquatus, a man of the old world for precise severity, and as most folk thought too hard and austere in this point, was demanded his opinion, he spake, by report, to the chief lords his wisest of Rome, for his opinion, notwithstanding that he was a young man, and of a low degree.

"If the Committee (quoth he) had treated and made suit, for the redemption of them only that are captive in the hands of the enemies, and there liked it: if they had not touched the person of any other besides, I would in few words have knit up my verdict and judgement of them. For what need I to have done else; but put you in mind, and exhort you, to observe the custom delivered among you from your ancestors, and to maintain the example so good and necessary for the service of war. Borne now, seeing they have not only justified, but also (as it were) glorified themselves, in that they yielded unto the enemies, and thought it good reason to be punished, not only before them, that were taken prisoners by the enemies in the field, but also that which they did themselves, and straped to Vaisa and Canasum; yea, and before C. Terentius himself the Consul, as I will not hide any thing from you my LL. but acquaint you with every thing that was done there. And would to God, that the words which I will utter here in your presence, I might deliver at Canasum, even before the body of the army, the best witness of every mans cowardice or valour, or at least will, that P. Sulpicius were present here alone, whom, if these fellows would have followed as their leader, they had been souldiers at this day in the Roman camp, and not captives at the devotion of the enemies. For while the enemies were wasted with fight, joyous and jocund of their fresh victory, and most of them retired into their own camp: they might have had the whole night to save themselves at their pleasure, and yet were not, yet being seven thousand strong, they had been able to have made a lane through them, were they never so thick, and to have broken away in despite of their hearts. But neither attempted they so much of themselves; nor yet would follow the leading of another. As Sulpicius as Tullius ceased not all night long almost, to exhort, to admonish, and encourage them, for to follow his conduct, to take the time when but a few of their enemies were about their camp, while they were at repose and rest, and while the night lasted favourable unto them, for to hide and cover their enterprise, persuading with them, that before day light they might easily reach unto places of security, and arrive safely at the Cities of their Allies. Like as in the days of our Grandfathers, P. Decius a Tribune Colobel in Sutrium, like as of late time when T. was a young man my self, in the first punick war, Caius Flaminius laid unto three hundred his voluntary souldiers, at what time as he minded to lead them to the gaining of a little hill standing in the midst of his enemies: Ier us die hardily my souldiers, and by our death save our selves, live our Legions, beset and besieged round about. If P. Sulpicius had said so much to you, he would never have esteemed you men of valour nor yet Romans, if no man among you would have borne him company, or seconded him in that singular vertue. But he shewed you a plain and easie way, leading as well to life and safety, as to honour and glory. He offered himself to be your guide, to bring you to your native country, to your parents, your wives and children: yet would not your hearts serve you to escape and save your selves. Where had your hearts been then, if he would have had you to die for your country? Good, of our Christian our Confessors, namely that very day, stand at your feet. If so many examples of manhood and vertue could not move you, nothing in the world will ever move you: it is to great a foil and overthrow was not able to make you despaire and set aside by this life: none will ever do it. Desire home a Gods name, and long after your native country, while ye are free and in safety: may, desire to be in your country, while it is your country, and while ye are Christians the good. Now your desire and longing cometh too late, being disfranchised, having lost your former state and right of Citizens, and made by your selves bondslaves to the Carthaginians. Think ye for a piece of money to recover your liberty again, and to return to your former degree, from which through sinne, heartedness and cowardice ye are fallen? You would not hearken nor give ear to P. Sulpicius, your Citizen, willing you to take weapon in hand, and to follow after him: but now after ye doth listen after Annus, commanding you to betray and render the ramp, and deliver up your armour. Borne by blame their licentious and dastardly feat, when I may reprove and chide them for willful and lewd wickedness: For they not only refused to be ruled by his good counsel and exhortations, but also attempted to hinder and stay him in his intended enterprise, had not mightily and valiant men with their swords drawn, set these dastardly beasts further off. P. Sulpicius truly so, had somewhat ado, to pass the ranks and traditions of his own countrymen, before he could break through the battalion of his enemies. Longeth our country to have them for her Children: who if the rest had been like them, should by this day, have had never a one of them that fought at Cannæ, for the Citizens: Of seven thousand armed soldiers, there were found none that had the heart to break away, manage the business, to escape and return with liberty, and with their arms, home into their country, but withstanding there were forty thousand and enemies to resist them, how easily then and safely, did you, might a power almost of two Legions have passed through them and gone their way? He had had this day my doubt twenty thousand at Cannæ, of eight brave hardy and loyal soldiers. But now which way can these fit, or would possibly be reputed true and faithful Citizens, for valiant soldiers, I am sure they will think themselves, not take up on them to be, unless a man could be persuaded and believe they were such, who would have impeached and withstood the rest for getting away, even when they were at the point to open a passage, or that they rather do not envy now, I hear the safety, and also the honor of others, which they have won by prowess, knowing in their own conscience, that their timorousness and cowardliness, was the cause of most ignominious and shameful servitude. They loved better to close within their pavilions, and to look for the day light, and the enemy together, when as in the still dead time of the night, they had the opportunity to escape. But how then? Although their hearts failed them, to break away out of the camp, yet to defend the same manfully, they had courage and valor enough. Besieged they were, almost beleaguered; in which they were day and night for a good time, and in their armor forced to stand upon their guard, and manfully they quit themselves within their camp, abiding (God wot) when they had assayed and endured all extremities, when all succors failed them for sustentation of this life: so pinched with hunger and so enfeebled, that they were not able to bear their own armor and lift up their weapons: overcome at the last, rather with the necessity of mans frail nature, then by the violence of the enemies, the good men gave over and yielded themselves. Nay forsooth, it is neither so nor so. The morrow morning when the sun rose, the enemies advanced and approached toward their camp, and within two hours after, without any trial and hazard of skirmish, they delivered up their weapons, and themselves. Thus ye see what their good service was, for two days together. When they should have stood so in field, and fought, then they fled back to their tents, when they were to guard and defend their camp and rampart, they surrendered them to the enemy, good no where, neither in battle nor in camp. I agree to ransom you, you (I say) when you ought to have sallied forth of the camp, linger behind and stay still: and when need was, to abide by it and to defend it like valiant men, surrender camp, give up your weapons, and yield your own bodies to the enemy. Nay, but to speak what I think, my sentence is (my LL.) that these fellows desert no more to be ransomed, then those to be delivered unto Annibal, who issued out of the camp, pierced through the midst of the enemies, and most valiantly saved themselves, for to do service another day in their country. When Manlius had said, all the prisoners were allied men in kindred: to most of the Senators, yet over and besides the precedent of the City itself, which never from the first beginning favoured the redemption of such soldiers, as suffered themselves to be taken prisoners, the ransom itself, which amounted to a good round sum, made them pause, because they were unwilling both to empty the public treasury: (having already disbursed great sums, in buying up horse, slaves, and arming them for the wars) and also that Annibal (who is the voice went, was as a very great hand for money) should be enriched thereby. When this their answer was returned, it was with no redemption of captives, there was a new fit of weeping and wailing, a fresh added to the former sorrow of the people, namely for the loss of so many Citizens: and so with many a tear that they shed, with sundry plaints and moans which they made, they accompanied the Committees above said, as far as the gate. One of the ten went home to his house the same time, who upon a fraudulent and cautelous return made into the enemies camp, as is aforesaid, supposed he had acquitted himself, and disburdened his conscience of his oath. Which being known and recommended to the Senat, they were all of mind that he should be apprehended, and attended with a good and sufficient guard at the charge of the City, and so carried back to Annibal. There goeth no other report of these Captives, that first there came rep of them as Committees: and when it was debated in the Senat, and doubt made, whether they should be admitted into the City or no:

 they were at length received, but so, as that they had no audience in the Senat: and upon longer stay made then they looked for, three others followed after them, to wit, L. Scribonius, G. Galpar-nius, and L. Marcius. Then by mediation of one Tribune of the Com, Minimian of Scribonius, the matter was propounded in the Senat concerning the ransom of the captives: but granted it would not be: whereupon the three latter Committees returned to Annibal, and another ten that first came, remained still behind: who upon a colourable occasion, had made an errand back to Anni-bal, when they were well onward on their way, to take a note, forsooth, of the names of the prisoners, and thereby seemed to have discharged their conscience of the oath. Also, that in the Se-nat there was hard hold, much question and variance, about the delivering of them again into the hands of Annibal, and how at last, they who were of opinion to have them rendered and sent back, failed of their purpose, by reason they came short by some voices and opinions, and that the other side carried it clean away. But by the next Censors that came in place, they were so marked and branded with all notes of disgrace and shame, that some of them immediately made themselves away with their own hands: and the rest forbore, not only the common place and market all their life time after, but also came not abroad, in manner, to be seen in the very streets, and were shunned out of their doors. Thus a man may rather marvel, that authors should so differ among themselves,

A selves, than from any of them pick out and discern the truth. But how much greater this overthrow and losse at Canna was, than any other before time, appeareth by this evident argument, in that those Allies, which ever to that day stood fast and true unto them, now fell to shrink and fail: and surely for no earthly thing else, but because they began to despair of the main chance of the whole State and Empire. For hereupon there revolted unto the Carthaginians, the Attellians, the Calatins, the Hirpines, a part of the Apulians, all the Samnites, except the Petellians, all the Brutii in general, and the Lucans. And more then these, the Surrentines and the whole tract well-neer, of the Greeks along the sea coast. The Tarentines, Metapontines, the Crotonians, the Locrians, and all the Gauls within the Alps. And yet for all these defections, and rebellions of their Allies
B and Subjects, were not the Romans one whit enclined to make any mention of peace, neither before the coming of the Consul, nor yet after that he was returned, and renewed again the dolorous remembrance of that woful overthrow received. And even at that very instant, so high minded was the City, and so far from drooping and being cast down, that as the Consul returned homeward from so great a defeat, whereof himself only was a principal cause, he was not only met upon the way by all the States and companies of the City in great numbers, but also highly thanked, in that he despaired not of the state of the Common-weal: who, if he had been the General and Leader of the Carthaginians, should have been sure to have smoked for it, and endured all extremity for content and punishment.

The three and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and twentieth Book.

THe Campanians revolted unto Annibal. Mago was sent to Carthage, with news of the victory at Canna: and in the entry of the Council-House, he poured out (on the floor) the golden rings which had been plucked from the fingers of the Romans there slain, which by report exceeded the measure of a Molodius. Upon these tidings, Hanno the noblest personage among all the Carthaginians, persuaded with the Senat of Carthage, to sue unto the people of Rome for peace, but he prevailed not, by reason of the Barchin side, and faction, that gain-said him. Cl. Marcellus the Pretor fought fortunately before Nola, in a sally which he made out of the town against Annibal. The Army of Annibal fell to riot at Capua, E and gave themselves to such sensuality, while they wintered there, that both in bodily strength, and also in courage of mind they became much enfeebled. Castellum was besieged by the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants within were driven by extreme famine, to eat thongs and leatherings, plucked from off their shields and targets, yea, and to feed upon Mice and Rats. They lived with Nuts which the Romans sent unto them down the river Vulturus. The body of the Senat was replenished by receiving unto them a new supply from out of the order of Knights or Gentlemen to the number of 197. L. Posthumius the Pretor, was together with his army defeated by the Gauls, and put to the sword. Cneus and Publius Scipios, vanquished Aldrubal in Spain, and had the conquest thereof. The remnant of the army defeated at Canna was sent away and confined into Sicily, and commanded not to depart from thence, before the war was fully finished. A league and society was concluded between Philip the King of the Macedonians and F Annibal. Sempronius Gracchus the Consul, discomfited and slew the Campanians. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate exploits achieved by T. Manlius the Lord Rapin in Sardinia, against the Carthaginians and the Sardi: who took the General himself Aldrubal, together with Mago and Hannibal, prisoners. Claudius Marcellus the Pretor vanquished and defeated in a set battel before Nola, the army of Annibal: and was the first that put the Romans in some good hope of better success, after they had been toiled out with so many foils and losses.

The three and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Annibal after the battel fought at Canna, and the winning and ransacking of both the Roman camps, dislodged anon, and was removed out of Apulia into Samnium, being sent unto, for to come unto the Hirpines country, by Statius, who promised to betray and deliver the City of Consa into his hands. Now there was a Citizen of Consa named Trebinus, a noble personage and of great name in his country. But the bend and faction of the Cossines (a family of great power, by favour of the Romans) kept him down and over-weighed him: but after

after the fame of the battel of Canna and the coming of Annibal, divulged and blown abroad by the speeches of Trebinus those Cossanes abandoned the City: and so was it without any confli& rendered unto the Carthaginians, and received a garrison. Annibal leaving behind him there, all the pillage and baggage that he had, divided his army into two parts: giving Mago in charge, to possess himself of the towns of that country, which would revolt of themselves from the Romans: or else to force them thereunto, in case they denied and refused so to do. Himself took his journey through the land of Campane, toward the nether sea, intending to assault Naples, that he might be Lord of a Port Town also, and have it at his devotion. When he was entred the confines of the Neapolitans, he placed some of the Numidians in Ambush, as cunningly as he could, (and there for the most part, the wayes are hollow, and full of close and secret nooks and holes) others he commanded to make a shew of driving away a booty out of the fields, and to ride out braving before the gates of the City. Against whom (seeming to be not many, and those disordered) a troop of horsemen issued forth, but the enemies of purpose giving back and retiring from them, led and trained them on, to the place of ambush: and so they were environed on every side, and there had not one of them escaped alive, but that the sea was neer, where they espied many fisher boats along the shore on the bank side, and as many of them as were skilful in swimming, gat unto them, and saved themselves: but in that shirnish nevertheless certain young gentlemen were slain. Among whom, Hegeas also, the Captain of that Corner of horsemen died in the place, who followed too hotly upon them that retreated & seemed to flie. But Annibal after he had viewed the walls, and saw they were not easie to be won, was discouraged and scared from giving assault to that City. From thence he turned his journey, and took his way to Capua, a City flowing in wealth and superfluity of all pleasures, by reason of long felicity, and the favourable aspect of gracious fortune. But among all corruptions that there reigned, it was infected most with the licentious looseness of the Commons, who exceeded beyond all measure, and abused their liberty. Pacuvius Calavius, a man of noble race there, and popular withal, but one that by lewd and indirect courses became rich and mighty, by means thereof, had both Senat & Com. under his girdle, and might do what he would. This man chanced to be head Magistrate the same year that the Romans were defeated and overthrowen at the Lake Thrasymenus: and supposing that the Commonalty (who had been a long time maliciously affected to the Senat and Nobility) would by occasion of alteration in the State, enterprise some notable act, to wit, (in case Annibal should come with his victorious army into those parts) the murdering of the Senat, and delivering of Capua into the Carthaginians hands. This man I say, lewd and bad enough otherwise, but yet not stark naught and wicked in the highest degree: and desirous to lord it, and domineer with the safety of the Common-wealth, rather then with the utter destruction of the same: as knowing full well that no State could remain safe, spoiled and bereft once of a publick counsel: cast about and plotted, how he might both save the Senate, and also oblige the same to be at his and the Commons devotion. He assembled therefore the Senat one day together, and after he had protested with a solemn preamble, "That in no case he would like & allow of the designment and intent of revolting from the Romans, unless it were upon necessity and constraint: for as much as himself had married the daughter of Appius Claudius, and had fair issue by her: and besides, affianced a daughter of his own in marriage unto Livius in Rome: but yet (quoth he) there is a matter of greater consequence toward, and a danger like to burst out more to be feared then that. For the Commons intend not by way of revolt and rebellion to rid the City of the Senators authority, but are purposed to massacre all the Senators, and so to deliver unto Annibal and the Carthaginians, the Common-wealth, clearly void of a Senat. Of which imminent peril (quoth he) I know how to free you, in case you will wholly trust and rely upon me, and forget all former jars, and old debates, which have fallen out in governance and managing of the Senat. Now when all of them in place, for fear were forced to put themselves into his hands: I will, quoth he) shut you up within the Councel-Chamber, and pretend unto them, as though I were one of their complices, both privy and party to this intended practise of theirs: and so by soothing them up, under a colourable approbation and allowance of their designments, which I should in vain cross and gain-say, I shall find out a ready way to save all your lives. And for assurance hereof, ask and have of me what bond and security ye will your selves. Thus having made his faithful promise to be fast and true unto them, he went forth, and commanded the Councel-House dores to be shut sure, and left warders to keep the gate and entry thereof, that no man without his license and commandment, should either enter in, or come forth. Then after he had called all the people together to an audience, in a solemn and frequent assembly, thus he spake unto them. "That which ye have often wished for (O ye Campans, my good neighbors and friends) namely, to have the power and mean to revenge your selves thoroughly of this wicked and cursed Senat, now lieth in your hands to perform with safety at your pleasure. And ye need not by way of an uproar to assault their houses one after another, to the great danger and hazzard of your persons, considering how they are defended with strong guards of their vassals, favorites, and bond-slaves: ye have them all fast and close mued up within the Councel-Chamber: themselves alone, without company, without armor and weapon: there you may take them. But see that ye do nothing hastily upon head without pause, nor rashly without advisement. I will so compass and bring about, that ye shall give your doom of life and death upon every one of them, to the end that each one may have his desert, and suffer due punishment accordingly.

The Oration
of Pacuvius Calavius to the Commons of Capua.

A "But above all things ye must have an eye and look to this: that ye proceed not too much in "heat and choler: but that ye have more regard of your own safety and profit, than of ire and re"venge. For (I take it) they be these Senators only whose persons ye hate and detest: and your "meaning is not wholly to put down and overthrow the Senate quite: for either ye must accept
 "of a King, (O government abominable) or else admit a Senat, the only Council indeed of a free
 "City and State: and therefore with one blush (as they say) ye are to go stop two gaps, and to do "both at once, namely to abolish and depose the old Senat, and to elect a new. I will command, "that the Senators shall be cited by name one after another: and concerning their life and death,
 "I will demand your opinion and resolute sentence: and look what judgement ye give, shall iust-
 "ly stand and be put in execution. But before the condemned guilty person be done to death, ye "shall substitute in his room a new Senator, some good man of valour and courage, and worthy "to succeed in his place. With that he late him down. And after all their names were thrown in-
 "to a lottery pitcher and shuffled together, he caused him to be cited and called aloud by name,
 "and the man himself to be brought forth of the council-House whose name chanced to be drawn "out first. He was no sooner named, but every man cried out, that he was a lewd and wicked per"son, and worthy to be hanged. Then Pacuvius said, I see (quoth he) what destiny ye presage this "man. Rejected he is, and cast out for naught and unjust: choose now a good Senator, and a right"eous in his room. As the first all was silent, and as still as midnight, for default of finding a better "to place in his stead. Afterwards, when some odde groom past all shame and reverence, seemed "to nominate one: by and by they grew to much louder words, and greater clamor: while some laid "flatly they knew not the man, others laid to his charge sundry lewd and naughty vices, and objec"ted against him either abject baseness, poverty and beggary, or else some dishonest kind of trade "and occupation, whereby he lived. Thus fared they, and much worse a great deal, when a second "or third Senator was named: so as it was well seen, that the men bethought themselves and re"pent of that they had done already, considering how they failed still and were to seek, when "they should substitute another in his place: forasmuch as it booteth not, but was absurd to nomi"nate the same again, since that their nomination gained them nothing but either to hear their vi"ces deciphered, or to hear reproachful terms: and as for all the rest, they were far more vile and "obscure persons, than those that came first into their remembrance and were soonest thought up"on. So the people fell at length, and gently came down to this point, and confessed, that Much "better was bad they knew, than bad they knew not: and Seldom came the better: willing the "old Senators to be let out of ward and enlarged. By this policy Pacuvius having bound the "Senate to himself, more than to the Commons, and even as much as their life was worth: with"out force of arms ruled the rest, and was at his devotion and command. Hereupon the Senators "laid aside the remembrance of their own dignity, port, and liberty, became affable to the Com"mons, and would salute them kindly: inviting them courteously, and entertaining them liberally "at their boards, with exquisite and delicate fare: undertaking and maintaining all their suits and "causes: ready at all times to assist them and stand by them: and in one word, emp-"nelling Juries (to go upon all causes and matters in law) of those whom they knew to be gracious and popular,
 "and fitter to win and procure the favour and affection of the common sort. Thus at the Council-
 "Table all matters were decided, as if the Commons had there sat, and not otherwise.

This Capua was a City ever given to dissolute life and excess in pleasure, as well by reason of the natural corruption and infer disposition of the Inhabitants, as also for the plentiful & flowing abundance of all delights, and the alluring inticements of all dainties, that either sea or land might afford. But at that time (such was the obsequious fawning and flattery of the Nobles, such was the licentious living of the Commons) they were so lavish, that they exceeded in lust and superfluity beyond measure, and laid it on in expense without stay. Besides their contempt of Laws, Magistrates, and Senate, they grew to this pass after the overthrow at Canusium, that whereas before, they had some awfull and reverend regard of the Romans, now they despised and set naught by the government and Empire of Rome. And nothing else stood in the way, but that presently they would have rejected their rule, and shaken off the yoke of obedience and allegiance, saving only this, That by reason of ancient entercourse of crosses and mutuell marriages, many noble houses and mighty families were linked and allied to the Romans: and again, which was the greatest bond of all, whereas there had served in the Roman wars, certain of them: there were three hundred men of arms, and those of noblest birth of all the Campans, chosen out of them and sent by the Romans to be resident in sundry garrisons of the Cities of Sicily: whose fathers and kinsfolk (with much ado) obtained, that Embassadors should be sent unto the Consul of Rome. They found the Consul at Venusia with a few souldiers and those armed by the halves (for as yet he was not gone to Canusium) being in that poor taking and hard plight, as he could not be in worse: either to move pity in the hearts of true and well affected allies, or to breed contempt in proud and hollow-hearted friends, such as these Campans were. Contemprible was their case, but the Cos. made himself and his condition more despised, by bewraying too much his present distresses, and laying open to the world the nakedness of his calamity. For when the Embassadors delivered unto him, That the Senate and people of Capua took it to the heart, and greatly grieved at the adverse overthrow of the Romans, and promised therewith, to furnish him with all things fit and meet for war: "Ye have (quoth he) O Campans, observed an order and custome, and for form and fashion visited us your confederats, in willing us to require at your hands all supplements of war:
 "rather

"rather than said any thing directly besetting the present estate of our fortune. For what have we "left us at all, after this discomfiture of Canne, that we should be willing to have that supplied "by our allies which is wanting? As who would say, we had somewhat already. Should we de"mand of you footmen, as though we were furnished with horse? Should we say that we lack"ed money, as if money only were wanting, and nothing else? No, no; Fortune hath dealt so "hardly with us, that she hath left us just nothing, nor so much as that, which might be made "up and supplied by others. Our Legions of footmen, our Corners of horse, our armor and mun"ition, our Standards and Ensigns, horse and man, money and victuals, all is gone, lost, and per"ished; either in the battell, or the morrow after in the ruin of our Camp, when we were turned "out of our tents and pavilions. And therefore ye are not, O Campans, to aid and help up in this "war; but in our behalf, and for us, ye ought to take the whole charge of the war upon your "own selves, against the Carthaginians. Call to remembrance how in time past, when your an"cestors and forefathers were fearfully driven to keep within your walls, standing in dread and "bodily fear, not of the Samnits only your enemies, but also of the Sidicins: we took them into "our protection, and defended them before Sarricula: and how for your sakes we began war "with the Samnits, and maintained the same for the space of an hundred years, and in great "variety of fortune, giving and taking sundry foils all the whiles. Over and besides, call to mind, "how we concluded an indifferent and equall league with you, to the disadvantage of neither
 "parts: how we granted unto you the liberty of living under our own laws: and how at the "last (a matter, I wot, of right great importance and consequence, before this our late over"throw at Canne) we granted unto a great part of you, the freedom and priviledge of Burges"sie, and parted with you the franchises of our own City. And therefore ye ought of right (my "Masters of Capua) to repute this loss and misfortune now received, to be as well yours as ours:
 "and to make reckoning to defend the common state and country of both. It is neither Samnit
 "nor Tuscan that we have to deal with, to whom, if we lost and parted with our Empire, yet it "remained still within the compass of Italy: but the enemy that pursueth us, is a Carthaginian,
 "drawing after him a train of souldiers, who are not so much as born in Affrick, but coming "from the farthest and most remote parts and bounds of the world, from as far as the streights
 "of the Ocean sea, even from Hercules his pillars: void of the knowledge of all law, right, and dis-"ference of condition, without reason and discretion, and (in manner) without commerce of "mans language. These souldiers so fierce and fell by nature, so cruell and merciless by use and cu-
 "stome, their captain hath withall made more wild and savage, by making bridges, causeys, and "high-waies, over heaps of dead mens bodies: and (which I abhor to speak, by teaching them "to eat men flesh. To see and endure these men to be their LL. whom feeding as they do upon "such execrable meats and viands, which even to touch and handle without great horror we "may not: to resort for justice as far as into Affrick and Carthage, and to suffer Italy to be re"duced into a Province under the Numidians and Moors, what is he that would not detest and "abhor, were he but born only within Italy? A worthy honour and immortall glory it will be "for you, O ye Campans; if the Roman Empire and dominion, thus growing to ruin and falling "down prostrate under the weight of this late overthrow, might by your fidelity and forcible "power be staide and upheld, and set upright again, I suppose ye have levied and enrolled alrea"dy thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, out of Campain: for coin, for corn, ye have "store and plenty: Now if your faith and truth be answerable to your wealth and fortune, nei"ther shall Annibal find that he hath won the victory, nor the Romans feel that they have lost "a journey. With this Oration thus ended, the Consul gave the Embassadors their discharge, "and dismissed them. As they returned homeward, one of them, Sabius Virius by name, said
 "thus unto his fellows. "Now is the day come (quoth he) wherein the Campans may be able,
 "not only to recover again the lands which in times past the Romans have wrongfully taken "from them, but also obtain & enjoy the sovereign rule & Empire of Italy. As for Annibal, we "may conclude, covenant, and capitulat with him what articles and conditions we list our selves,
 "to our best behoof and benefit: And it is all to nothing, that Annibal, having now dispatched
 "and finished the war, will of his own accord depart like a Conquerour into Affrick, and with"draw his forces out of these parts: so as the dominion of Italy shall be left wholly to the peo"ple of Capua. Virius had no sooner delivered these speeches, but they all applauded him and "accorded thereto. And in such terms they related their Embassage, as all men thought no less "but the Roman Empire and name was utterly perished and extinct for ever. Incontinently the "Commons and the greatest part of the Nobility of Capua enclined to revolt and rebell: Yet
 "by the countenance and authority of the Ancients and Elders the matter was staide and defer"red for some few daies. At length, the greater part prevailed, whose opinion was, That the same "Embassadors which were sent to the Roman Consul, should be addressed in embassie unto Annibal.
 "But I find in some Annal-records, that before they went, and before their resolute determi"nation to revolt, there was an Embassage sent from the Capuans to the City of Rome, demanding
 "thus much, That if they meant to have any help and aid from them, one of their Consuls might "be a Capuan. Whereat the Senat of Rome took such snuff and indignation, that the said Embas-"sadors were commanded to void the Council-House, and a Serjeant sent after them at their heels, "to set them out of the City: charging them at their perill, to take up their lodging that night "without the territories of Rome. But because this demand jumpeth too near to the like that the "Latines

* Gibraltar:

A Latines made long before: and both Cassius and other Historians have (not without good reason) passed it over and said nothing thereof; I dare not avow it for a truth. Well, Embassadors there came unto Annibal, and concluded peace with him under these conditions; and covenants: Imprimis, That no General, Captain, or Magistrate of the Carthaginians should have any jurisdiction or power over a Citizen of Capua: Item, That no Citizen of Capua should be compelled against his will to serve in any wars, or execute the charge and office of a souldier: Item, That the Campans still enjoy their old Laws and Magistrates of their own: Item, That Annibal deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman Captives, such as they themselves shall choose: whom they might course and exchange for these three hundred horsemen of the Campans that were in garrison, and served for pay in Sicily. These were the Articles of the accord. But the Campans stuck not to do more than so, and to go farther than their capitulations: committing divers and sundry outrages. For the Commons suddenly at once apprehended all the Roman Captives over the confederate souldiers, yea, and attached other Citizens of Rome, that were either employed in any military charge, or otherwise occupied in their private affairs: and caused them to be clapt up within the stoves and hot houses, as in ward and late custody, where their breath being stifled and stopped up with exceeding heat, and steaming vapours, they were stifled, and died miserably. But there was one Decius Magnus, a man who wanted no means of sovereign authority, but only the sobriety, discretion, and wisdom of the Citizens with whom he lived: who withstood all that ever he could such enormous and audacious courses, and endeavoured to hinder the Embassage sent to Annibal. And so soon as he heard that Annibal was sending a garrison, he recounted unto his fellow Citizens the proud and lordly rule of Pyrrhus, the miserable and wretched thralldom of the Tarentines, as precedents sufficient to give them warning. He ceased not to cry aloud in open place and audience, first, that they should not receive the garrison into the City: then, that being admitted, they should either be thrust out again: or rather if they would expiate and make amends by some valiant and memorable act for that shamefull lend part of theirs, in revolting so from their most ancient Allies, yea, and kinsmen by blood, they should fall upon the Carthaginian garrison, and kill them every one, and so reconcile themselves again to the Romans. Annibal al having intelligence of these plots (for they were not a forging and contriving in a corner) first sent certain messengers to summon Magnus to repair unto his presence within his Camp. After that, seeing he stoutly denied to go, (for he pleaded that Annibal had no authority nor right to command a Citizen of Capua) he waxed wroth, and commanded the man to be apprehended, and to be haled perforce bound unto him. But fearing, upon better advice, lest by offering such violence some tumult might arise, and in the heat of blood break forth into an inconsiderate fray, he dispatched beforehand a messenger of purpose unto Marinus Blossius, the Prætor or L. Governor of Capua: signifying, that the morrow next following he would be personally in Capua: and so with a small guard about him, he set forth of his Camp, and put himself on his journey. Marinus assembled the people together, making proclamation, and warning them to be ready in all frequent solemnity, with their wives and children, to meet Annibal upon the way. They of the adverse side unto Magnus and the Romans performed this not only obediently, but also most effectually, and with great diligence and endeavour. Yea, the common sort likewise were very forward in this action, as desirous especially to see this great General and brave warrior, so noble and renowned for his many victories. Decius Magnus neither went forth to meet him, nor yet kept his house, because he would not seem to fear and carry a guilty conscience: but walked up and down idly for his pleasure in the Market place with one of his sons, and a few of his vassals and followers, whiles the whole City besides was busily occupied, and much troubled in the entertaining and beholding of this great Captain and Commander of the Carthaginians. Annibal being entred the City, incontinently required to have audience in their Council-House. Whereupon, the Nobles and principall Citizens of Capua requested him that he would not that day intend any weighty matters of importance, but himself in person solemnize it with joy and mirth, as an high and feastivall holiday for his welcome thither. And albeit he was by nature hasty, and ready to fall into fits of anger, yet because he would not seem at his first coming to deny them any thing, he employed a good part of that day in seeing and viewing the City. Entertained and lodged he was and his whole train with the Manii, Celeres, Strenius, and Pacuvius, the most noble and honourable personages, and the wealthiest of all others. Thither unto him, Pacuvius Calpurnius (concerning whom I spake before, the principal man of that bend and faction, which reduced the City to the obedience and devotion of Annibal) brought his own son a young Gentleman, and said withall, that the youth kept continually with Decius, and that he was faine to pluck him away from his company and train, whose part he took; and stuck most stiffly to him, in maintaining the old society and amity of the Romans, against the new League with the Carthaginians; and neither the bending and inclination of the whole City to the contrary side, nor yet the reverent majesty of a father, had yet driven him from his obstinate resolution. And for that time the father laboured with Annibal rather by way of prayer and intreaty, than by excusing and clearing his son, that he would not be discontented nor displeased with the young man. So he was overcome with the importunate request and plentiful teares of the father, and gave commandment, that he together with his father should be bidden to supper, at which feast he purposed to have the company of no other guests of all Capua, but only of his hostess that have him entertainment, and one Jubellius Taurus, a famous and brave warrior. To supper they went long before day-light went down, and sat at the table, not after the guise of Carthaginians nor according to the discipline of souldiers but after the order of a City and house, which had been used a long time to have the board furnished with sundry sorts of dainty dishes, and with all delicate junkets to please the palate and taste. Perolla only the son of Calavius, could not be brought to change his mind, and shew himself cheerful and merry at meat, notwithstanding the Masters of the feast; and Annibal himself otherwhiles invited him to bear them company, and sit with them; but he ever made his excuse to his father, that he was ill at ease and sickly whensoever he seemed to examine him, and to know the cause of such wonderful trouble of mind, and vexation of spirit. So a little afore sun-setting, when his father arose, and was gone out from supper, he followed hard after him; and when they were come into a secret place apart, (a garden it was on the back side of the house) "I will tell you a thing father, I have in my head a policy, and a ready mean, how we shall not only obtain pardon at the Romans hands for our trespass committed, in falling away from them, and turning to Annibal; but also how we Campanians may be in far greater estimation and favour among them than ever we were. The father marvelling hereat, was desirous to know what device that might be; and wish that the youth cast his gown from off his shoulders; and shewed him a good blade girded to his side. "I will, quoth he, out of hand, establish and seal sure the Roman League with the bloud of Annibal. I was desirous (father) to let you know of it aforehand, if peradventure you would be willing to be out of the way when the deed is a doing. The old man seeing and hearing this, in a great fearfull agony, as if he had been present to see the execution of that which he heard him to speak of. "Now I beseech thee, my son (quoth he) and pray thee of all loves and bonds that bind children and parents together, that thou wilt not before thy fathers face either commit or suffer this so horrible a part, full of all abominable wickedness, whatsoever, and not to be named. There are not many hours since that we swore by all the gods and holy hallows in heaven, and by joyning hand in hand, made faithful promise, and obliged our selves to communicate together with him, and to eat at the holy table of sacred viands. And are we no sooner departed asunder from our familiar conference and parley, but we arm our selves against him? Arise thou indeed from thy friends guest-board, to which thou wert thy self a third man bid-den of all the Campanians, and even by Annibal, and wilt thou stain and pollute that board with the bloud of the principal guest? Is thy father, erewhile was able to reconcile Annibal to my son; and can I not pacifie my son likewise, and appeale his fierce stomack against Annibal? But if their be nothing sacred and inviolable, nothing to be trusted in the world, neither faithful promise, nor religious oath, nor any piety at all, and good nature, things so honest and just: then adventure hardly, and spare not to put in execution all actions detestable and not to be spoken, so that besides the note and infamous mark of wickedness, they bring not upon our own heads present mischief, and utter confusion. Darest thou alone assail the person of Annibal? What will that multitude about him do, the while, so many freemen and bondmen both? All their guard and regard all their eyes upon him alone, what serve they for? What will become of so many hands of theirs? Thinkest thou that they will be benumbed and dead at the time of that frantick enterprise of thine? The grim visage of Annibal himself, whom whole armies of souldiers tremble to behold: who the people of Rome dread, and for fear of whom they quake again, wilt thou alone abide to see? And if all other means of help should fail him, wilt thou endure to strike and wound me thy father, putting my body between for the safeguard and defence of Annibal? And stab me thou must through the very heart, before thou canst hurt him, or run him through. Suffer therefore thy self here to be frightened from this thy intended mischief, before thou have the foil there, and miss of thy purpose. Let my prayers take place with thee, as once this day they prevailed for thee. With that, he marked his son to weep and shed tears, and embracing him about the middle, and kissing him ever and anon, he left him not, nor gave over to pray & entreat him instantly, untill he got at his hands to lay off his sword, and promise him faithfully, that he would not attempt any such enterprise. Then the youth, seeing how the case stood, "I will (quoth he) pay unto my naturall father that kindness and love, in which I am bound as a debtor to my native Country. But alas for you, good father, I am right sorry for your hard hap; who are to answer before God and the world, for the betraying of your country no fewer times than thrice already. Once, when you gave counsell and perswaded to forsake the Romans, and to revolt from them: again, when you were the principall agent, and advised to make peace with Annibal; and now this day the third time, when you are the only obstacle and hinderance that Capua is not restored again into the hands of the Romans. O sweet country and native soil of mine, take here at my hands this sword, wherewith erewhile I was girt and armed for dear love of thee, and was fully minded to defend this thy chief Castle and Fortreis, and not to spare, but embroe it in the bloud of thy mortall enemy: take it I say, since my own father is ready to wrest it from me. This said, he hung his sword over the garden wall into the high way and open street; and therewith, because he would not grow into any suspicion, he shewed himself again to the guests within the house, and took part of the banquet. The morrow after, the Senate in favour of Annibal solemnly met together in great number: in which frequent assembly, the beginning of his speech was very pleasant and gracious: wherein he gave the Capuans thanks, for preferring his amity before the alliance of the people of Rome; and among other fair and magnificall behests to them made, he promised that within a while,

A Capua should be the head City and chief State of all Italy, whereunto the people of Rome, together with other nations, should resort for law and justice. Mary, quoth he, there is one that hath no part or fellowship in the society and league made between the Carthaginians and you, namely, Magius Decius, who neither was a Campan nor ought of right to be so called and reputed: him I demand to be delivered into my hands, and that in my presence the Senate should be asked their opinion concerning his trespass, and an Act presently entered thereof. All of them there assembled allowed of the motion, and gave their assent in the end: albeit a great sort of them thought both the man unworthy of that hard fortune and calamity, and that this was but an ill beginning and a very overture to the infringing of the right of their freedom. The chief Magistrate then went forth of the Council-Chamber, and late in the Judicall Hall or Temple, and commanded Decius to be attached, and to stand before him at his feet, and there to answer for himself and make his defence. Who persisted still in the same stoutness and boldness of spirit, alledging that by virtue of the covenants in the League comprised, he might not lawfully be pressed and forced thus far. Whereupon he had irons clapt upon him, and commandment was given that he should have a Lictor attend upon him, and to be conveyed into the Camp of Annibal. All the way as he was led, so long as he was bare-headed and open-faced, he went preaching to the multitude that flocked about him, and with a loud voice spake and said: "Now Capuans, ye have the liberty that ye sought and longed for. In the open market place, at noon-day, and in your sight, lo how I, a man inferior to none in all Capua, am led away bound in chains to die. What greater violence could be offered if Capua were won by assault of the enemy? Go forth, go and meet Annibal adorn and hang the City with rich cloath of tapistry, Register in your Kalender, among other holidais, this day of his Entry, that in the end ye may behold this goodly triumph over one of your own Citizens. Upon the utterance of these words, the multitude seemed discontented at the indignity of this sight. Whereupon he was hoodwinked, and his head covered, and the Serjeant was charged to have him away quickly, and make haste out of the gates. So, he was brought into the Camp, and immediately shipped and sent to Carthage, for fear lest some commotion might arise in Capua, upon so unworthy and shamefull a deed: and lest the Senat also should repent themselves, that they had delivered and yielded out of their hands a principal personage among them: also to prevent that no Embassage might be sent unto him for his redelivery, whereby he should either offend his new Allies, in case he denied them their first request, or suffer Capua to have alwaies a busie and seditious Citizen ready ever to stir up new troubles, if he granted their suit. The ship wherein he was embarked, was by a tempest cast upon Cyrene, a port town in the dominion at that time of the KK. There, Magius fled for refuge as to a Sanctuary, unto the Image of King Protopaus, and was brought by his guard and keepers unto Alexandria to the Kings presence, and enformed the King, how contrary to the tenor and priviledge of the covenant he was in bonds by Annibal. Whereupon he was loosed from his chains, and put to the choice, whether he would return to Capua, or go to Rome. Magius answered, that he could not in Capua remain in safety, and if he went to Rome, at that time especially when there was war between the Romans and the Capuans, he should be sooner lodged there in a prison like a fugitive runnagate, than entertained in house for a friend and loving guest: and concluded in the end, that he would make abode and live the rest of his daies more willingly in no place of the world, than in his highness Realm, whom he found already to be the saviour of his life, and the redeemer of his liberty and enlargement.

While these occurrents fell out abroad, Q. Fabius Pictor, sent (as is above said) Ambassador to Delphos, returned to Rome, and out of a writing he read openly, the answer of the Oracle in these words (now ye must understand, that in this Script were certain gods and saints named, unto whom they should make solemn supplication, and the manner also with all ceremonies and complements thereto belonging): "Then (O Romans) if ye shall so do, your state shall prosper and be more happy: your Common-weal shall go forward better to your mind, yea, and victory in the wars shall happen unto the people of Rome. But remember that when all things shall go well on your side, and your State shall be saved and preserved, ye send unto Pythius Apollo a present, according to the merit of a due recompence; and of the silver raised of the pillage, prizes, and spoils taken from the enemies, do him honour accordingly. After he had rehearsed these words, truly translated out of the Greek Original then he said moreover, That so soon as he was departed from the Oracle, he presently sacrificed unto all those gods with frankincense and wine. Also, that he was commanded by the Priest of Apollo, that like as he both came to the Oracle, and also celebrated sacrifices, crowned with a garland and chaplet of Laurel, so he should in the same manner adorned take ship and be embarked, and not lay off the said garland before he was arrived to Rome. Finally, that all ceremonies performed most precisely and diligently, which he was commanded to observe, he had laid and bestowed the said chaplet upon the altar, before the Shrine of Apollo at Rome. Then the Senate made a decree, That those sacrifices and supplications should with all speed and carefull regard be celebrated.

While these things passed at Rome and in Italy, Mago the son of Amilcar, arrived at Carthage, and brought the first tidings of the victory at Capua. This Mago was not immediately and directly sent from his brother, out of the field where the battel was fought, but staid certain daies about receiving the homage and subjection of certain Cities of the Bruttii, which revolted from the Romans. Who having audience given him in the Senat of Carthage, related what acts and exploits his brother Annibal had achieved in Italy: namely, That he had given battell to six Generals, whereof four were Consuls, and two were the Dictator and Commander of horsemen: That he had fought against six entire Consular armies, in which battels he had slain above 20000 enemies, taken prisoners more than 50000. That of those four Consuls, he had killed twain outright: as for the other two, one of them was deadly hurt, the other having lost his whole army, was fled, accompanied scarcely with fifty men: that the General of the Cavalry created with full Consular authority, was discomfited and put to flight: and the Dictator (forsooth) because he never would hazard the fortune of a field, was counted the only warrior and worthy Captain: That the Bruttii and Apulians, part of the Samnites, and Lucans, were revolted to the Carthaginians: That Capua, the head City not of Campania only, but (after the Romans defeat and overthrow in the battell at Canna) of all Italy also, was surrendered to Annibal. For these so many and so worthy victories, he required (meet and requisite it was) that there should be a solemn festivall day holden and sacrifices solemnized to the honour of the immortal gods. And for the better assurance of these lucky and fortunate achievements, and to verifie his words, he caused the gold rings of the Romans, slain at Canna, to be poured forth in the porch and entry of the Council-House. The heap of them was so great, that as some authors affirm, when they measured the same, they filled three Modii and an half. But the constant report went, and sounding nearer to a truth, that they were not above one Modius. He added moreover, and said, (and all to prove their overthrow the greater) that none but knights and men of arms, and those of the better sort, who served on horses found at the Cities charges, used to wear that ornament. The drift and conclusion of his speech was this, "That the sooner that Annibal hoped to make an end of the wars, the more he ought to be aided and helped with all provision and furniture accordingly. And why? The service was far from home, in the midst of the enemies land, a huge deal of corn was consumed, a great mass of money was spent; and as so many battels had utterly swoopt up the enemies armies, so reckning was to be made, that they had in some measure lessened and impaired the forces of the conquerour. Therefore, a new supply of men was to be sent over, and money for soldiers pay, yea, and corn also was to be transported to so brave souldiers, that had done so singular good service, and deserved so well of the Carthaginian nation. Upon these reports of Mago, when all men else were wondrous glad, and took great contentment, Himilco, a man of the Brachin bend, supposing he had now good occasion and opportunity offered to carp and check Hanno. How now Hanno quoth he, what say you to this gear? Repent you still and mislike the war undertaken against the Romans? Let us see now, give your voice and opinion that Annibal be yielded: forbid now thanksgiving to be performed to the immortal gods, for this prosperous speed and fortunate success. Let us hear a Roman Senator now to speak in the Council-House of the Carthaginians. Then Hanno; "I would have held my peace this day, my LL. quoth he, for feare to speak ought that in this common and generall joy might not be altogether pleasant unto you. But now, seeing a Senator blundly spurth me the question, whether I mislike still of the enterprise of war against the Romans? if I should keep silence and say nothing, I might seem either proud and insolent, or else faulty and culpable. Whereof the one is the part of a man that hath forgot the liberty of other men; the other a property of him, that thinketh not of his own. Well may I therefore answer to Himilco, that I cease not yet to mislike this war, nor never will give over to blame and challenge this invincible Captain and warrior of ours, before I see the war ended and determined, upon some indifferent hand, and tollerable condition: and nothing else shall stint the mils I have, and quench the longing desire of the old peace, but the making of a new. And therefore these particulars, which Mago erewhile so magnified and vaunted of, are for the present joyfull news to Himilco, and other of that crew, and the supporters of Annibals and to me likewise in some measure, they may be acceptable tidings, in this regard, that good success and lucky speed in war, if we will make the right use and benefit of our fortune, will be a mean to procure us a more easie and honourable peace. For if we let slip this advantage and opportunity of the time, when as we may seem rather to give than take conditions of peace, I fear me, that even this present so goodly a shew of rankness as it maketh now, will run up all to straw, and bear no head to yield corn in the end. And yet let us consider now, what a special matter this is. Slain I have whole armies of enemies: Therefore send me fresh and new souldiers. What could you (Sir) demand more, if you had been overthrowen? Won I have by force two strong holds where the enemies were encamped, full and fraught (we wust needs think) of prizes and victuals; Allow me more corn and money. What would you have required and craved more, a say, in case you had been riddled, and turned perforce out of your own Camp and pavilions? But that I may not marvel alone at these strange Enthymemes and conclusions (for it is as free and lawfull for me to ask some questions, seeing I have already answered to Himilco) I would fain have Himilco or Mago, I care not whether, to make answer likewise to me. Say, that in the battell before Canna, the Roman Empire was wholly defeated and soiled. Say also, that certain it is, how all Italy is at point ready to revolt. tell me first and foremost, whether any one Nation of the Latine people is faine from them to us? Secondly, whether any one person of the five and thirty wards in Rome, is run away, and fled to Annibal? When Mago said nay, and denied both. Why then (quoth he) there be great numbers of our enemy still behind. But I would gladly know what courage, what heart, what hopes, that multitude hath. When Mago answered, he could not tell. And nothing (quoth Hanno) is more ripe & easie to be known.

A " Say man, sent the Romans any Embassadors to Annibal to treat for peace? Nay, had ye any intelligent brought unto you, that there was so much as one word slipt, or mention made at Rome of peace? When Mago said hardly nay, to that too. Why then (quoth Hanno) by this account this war will find us work, and keep us occupied as much as it did the very first day that Annibal set foot in Italy. How variable fortune was in the former Punick war, how victory went and came reciprocally, we are most of us yet alive that well remember. We never siped better nor had a luckier hand, both by land and sea, than before Caius Laetanius, and Aulus Posthumus were Consuls. And whiles Lucius and Posthumus were Consuls, were we vanquished and utterly overthrowen before the Islands Ægates. And in case now (which God forbid) fortune should change, to change and turn her wheel, hope ye to have peace then, being overcome, which now when we are conquerors, no man offreth nor seeketh after. For mine own part, if any man should ask mine opinion of peace, either to present and tender it to the enemies, or to accept it at their hands, I wot well what to say: but if ye would know what I think concerning those demands of Mago, my advice is, that there is no sence nor reason to send aid and supplies to conquerors: now if they bear us in hand, delude, and abuse us with a vain and false persuasion of conquest and victory, much les a great deal. These remonstrances of Hanno took small effect with many of them: for, both the secret grudge and ran, or which he bare to the Barthin House, much impeached his credit and authority, and also by reason that their minds were to fully possessed of the present joy, they could admit and abide to hear of nothing, that might sound otherwise to daunt their glad hearts: thinking verily that the war would soon be at an end, if they now would strain a little and help it forward. And therefore with great consent, there passed an Act of the Senat, That there should be a supply sent unto Annibal of forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and many talents of silver. Also the Dictator was sent before with Mago into Spain, to leavy and hire twenty thousand footmen, and four thousand horsemen for to make up those broken armies which were in Italy and in Spain. But these matters (as usually it hapneth in time of prosperity) were performed but slackly and at leisure. The Romans contrariwise made more speed, as being by nature more industrious: and besides, such was their adverse fortune and extremity, that they might not neglect their affairs and go slowly about their business. For neither the Consul was wanting in any affairs that were by him to be managed: and the Dictator M. Jun. Brutus, so soon as he had performed all the complements concerning sacrifices and religious ceremonies, proposed unto the people, That (as the usuall manner was) he might mount on horseback. Which done, over and besides the two legions of Citizens, which in the beginning of the year had been levied and enrolled by the Consuls, and the bondslaves that were before mustred, and certain squadrons gathered together out of the Picene and Gauls country, he proceeded to the last remedy and succour of a distressed and well near desperate state, when as honest and direct courses must give place unto commodious and profitable policies, and alight from his horse, and made proclamation, That whosoever were guilty and condemned of any capital crime, or whosoever were imprisoned for debt, and would willingly serve under him, he would take order that they should be exempt from all punishment, and discharged from their creditors. And of such he armed six thousand with the spoils of the Gauls, which in the triumph of Flaminius were carried in shew. Thus he departed from Rome five and twenty thousand strong.

Annibal having possessed himself of Capua, and solicited the Neapolitans once again, and founded their minds, proposing before their eyes fear and hope, and all in vain, led his forces into the Country of Nola, with this mind, not at first to go roughly with them to work, and by way of open hostility, because he was not out of all hope, that they would willingly come off and yield themselves: but in case they wavered and answered not his hope and expectation in some good time, he would surely proceed against them in all extremity, and put them to whatsoever they could endure or fear. The Senate, and especially the principall of them, continued fast and sure in their alliance with the people of Rome: But the commons (as their manner is, desirous of alteration and to see a new world) inclined wholly to the side of Annibal, casting many doubts, and fears, that their lands and possessions should be wasted and spoiled with sundry calamities and indignities that follow upon siege: neither wanted there heads and ring-leaders of a rebellion. Whereupon the Senate (for fear lest if they should seem to thwart and cross them, they had not been able to withstand the violence of the multitude once up and drawn to an head) closely dissembled their intent and purpose, and so by temporizing, prevented a present mischief. For they made semblance that they liked well, and were resolved of revoluing unto Annibal: but upon what conditions and capitulations they should enter into new league and amity, they knew not certainly. So having taken a farther time they dispatched in haste certain Embassadors unto the Roman Praetor Marcellus Claudius, who remained with the army at Cannus, advertising him in how great jeopardy the state of Nola stood, to wit, That Annibal was already Lord of their lands, and the Carthaginians would soon be masters of the City, unless they were succoured and relieved: that their Senat were driven to this shift, for to yield unto the Commons, and grant to revolt whensoever they would have them, and by that means staid them that they rebelled not over hastily. Marcellus after he had commended the Nolans, willed them with the same dissimulation to protract time and hold off untill his coming: and in the mean while to conceal and keep secret to themselves, the dealings and treaties with him, and in no case to be known known of any hope they had of aid from the Romans. Himself went from Canusium, to Calatia, and from thence passed over the river Vulturnus, and by the way of Saricula and Trebia, journeyed over Stessula through the mountains and arrived at Nola. A little before the coming of the Roman Prætor, Annibal was departed and gone out of the Territory of Nola, and drew downwards to the sea-side near unto Neapolis: his teeth watered at the Port-town, and that out of Africk his ships might arrive thither, as to a safe and sure harbour. But after that he heard that N. ples was held by a Roman Provost, M. Junius Syllanus (sent for thither by the Neapolitans themselves) and had received a garrison: seeing he could not be admitted into Neapolis, no more than into Nola he went to Nuceria. Having beleaguered it round a long time, and often assaulted it forcibly, and assailed to solicit as well the Commons as the Nobility, but without effect: at the length by famine he forced them to yield, and so became master of the Town upon composition, That they should depart every man disarmed in their single garments. Then, as one that would seem ever from the beginning, to use clemency to all Italians, but only the Romans: he made fair promises of great rewards and advancement to honour, unto all those that would tarry behind and serve under him. But no man upon those hopes would remain with him. For they all gave him the slip, and went sundry waies, some to their friends and acquaintance, others at a venture as their mind stood to divers Cities of Campain, but most to Nola and Naples. Amongst the rest, there were almost thirty Senators, and those (as it fell out) of the best sort, that came to Capua: but being kept out there, because they had shut their gates against Annibal, they went to Cumes. The pillage of Nuceria was bestowed upon the souldiers, the City sacked and burnt. Now kept Marcellus Nola, not presuming more upon the strength of his own garrison, than upon the confidence he had in the great men and chief of the City. But he had the Commons in jealousy, and above all, one L. Banius, who for that he had conspired to rebell, and therefore stood in fear of the Roman Deputy: one while was pricked and incited to attempt treason, and to betray his Country: another while, in case he should fail of that opportunity, and miss his purpose, to make an escape and run away to the enemy. A courageous and lusty young man he was, and the bravest Cavaleer in those daies of all the Roman Confederats. His hap was to be found lying half dead among the heaps of slain bodies before Canna: Annibal took order for the curing of his hurts, and when he was thoroughly healed, right courteously sent him home well and bountifully rewarded. In remembrance of which favour and good turn, and in token of thankfulness, he was willing to deliver and yield Nola into the hands of Annibal, to be at his devotion. But the Prætor had an eye unto him, and observed how his head wrought, and was busily occupied to bring an alteration. And seeing there were but two waies to deal with him, either by punishment to keep him short, and cut him off; or by some benefit to win his heart: he thinking it a better course, to gain unto himself so hardy and valiant a friend, than only to bereave his enemy of him: he sent for him, and in this manner spake friendly unto him: "You have (quoth he) amongst your countrymen and fellow-Citizens, I see well, many that envy you, as it appears well by this, that there is never a neighbour you have at Nola that hath told me of you, and how many noble exploits and good services in war you have performed. But yet your valour cannot be unknown and hidden, ever since you served in the Roman army. For many there must be which were souldiers then with you, which have made report unto me of your prowess, and what perils you have entred into, and how often you have put your life in hazard, for the safety and honour of the people of Rome: and namely, how in the battell before Canna you gave not over fight, untill at length having bled well near to death, you were born to the ground and lay under foot, overwhelmed with men, horse and armour, falling upon you, and so kept down that you could not rise up again. But be of good chear man, and go on still in this thy vertue and well-doing: you shall have at my hands all honour and reward that may be possible: and the oftner you come to me and keep me company, you shall find it will be more for your reputation and commodity both. The young man was glad at heart for these gracious words and large promises: and so Marcellus gave unto him freely, a good brave courser, and commanded the Treasurer to tell him out in money * 500 * Bigats of silver, charging his officers and Lictors to let him have access unto him at his pleasure, whensoever he came. By this courteous usage and humanity of Marcellus, the young mans stout heart was so dulced, mollified and easie to be wrought, that of all Confederats and Allies there was not one, who bare himself more valiantly, nor maintained more faithfully the State of Rome. When Annibal was approached to the gates of Nola (for he was returned from Nuceria, and came thither again) and the Commons within the town practised a-fresh to rebell, Marcellus had a little before the coming of the enemies, retired and put himself within the wals: not for fear that he should not be able to keep the field and his hold: but lest he should give advantage and opportunity to betray the City, seeing too many of them within disposed and forward thereunto. After this, they began on both sides to arrange their battels in array the Romans under the wals of Nola, the Carthaginians before their own fort. Small skirmishes there were between the City and the Camp of Annibal (with variable event of fortune) because the Generals were not willing either to deny and debar some few that were so eager and forward to call for fight, or yet to give forth the signall of a generall battell. Whiles these two armies temporized thus, and held their Corps de guard, continually, and in manner of a solemn set Assembly, the chief Nobles of the Nolans advertised Marcellus, that there used to be night-meetings and conferences between their own Commons and the Carthaginians: and

* 19 li. 1 s. 6 d.

* Bigatus was a piece of Roman silver coin, so called of Bigia, a chariot drawn with two horses, stricken or stamped upon the one side, and it was the same that Denarius.

A and that it was plotted and set down, That when the Roman Host was issued in battell-array out of their gates, the Commons in the mean while should fall to rising their carriages, packs, and trusses within, and then shut the gates upon them, and keep the walls: and so having the City and all their goods and baggage under their hands, should from thenceforth receive Annibal into the City instead of Marcellus. Upon these advertisements, Marcellus after he had thanked and commended the Senators of Nola, determined before any commotion and tumult arose within the walls to try the fortune of a battell. At those three gates that stood toward the enemy, he ranged his forces divided into three battallions, & gave order that all the carriages should follow after: and that the lackies, landers, and other Camp followers, together with the feeble and sickly persons, should carry stakes and pales for the rampier. At the middle gate he placed the flower and strength of the legions, together with the Roman Cavalry: at the two gates at either hand he bestowed the new souldiers the light armed, and the auxiliary horsemen of allies. The Nolans were by straight commandment forbidden to approach the gates or the walls. As for the baggage and carriages, the ordinary guard was appointed to attend thereupon, for fear, lest while the Legions were busied in fight, there should be some assault made upon them. In this order and array marshalled they were within the gates. Annibal, who likewise ready arranged, stood with banner displayed (as he had done for certain daies together) untill it was well toward noon first wondered at it, that neither the Roman army issued out of the gates nor any souldier appeared upon the walls: and supposing afterwards, that their usuall complots and conventicles were discovered and revealed, and that for very fear they kept within and sat still, sent back part of their souldiers into the Camp, with commandment, in all speed to bring abroad into the open field before the vanguard, all the Ordnance and Artillery for to batter the City walls: with assured confidence, that if he came hotly upon them, and gave an assault, while they thus ingred and issued not forth, the Commons would make some tumult and stir within the City. But anon as every man was busily occupied, running to and fro in haste about his own charge, before the vanguard and forefront of his battell, even at the point when he advanced forward to the walls: all upon a sudden a gate was set open, and Marcellus caused the trumpets to sound the alarms, and the souldiers to set up a shout, commanding the footmen first, and then the horse to falli out, and with all the might and force they could, to charge upon the enemy. Soon had they terrified their main battell sufficiently, and made disorder there, when at the two gates of each side, P. Valerius Flaccus and Caius Aurelius, two Lieutenants generall, issued forth upon their flanks and wings. The horse-boies, scullions, and the other multitude above said, which was set to guard the carriages, arose up and made a new outcry, and shouted, so as to the Carthaginians (who contemned them before for their small number especially) they represented all at once a shew of a mighty army. I dare not avouch that which some Authors stick not to write, that of enemies were slain in this conflict, 2300 and that the Romans lost but one only man. But what victory soever it was, either so great, or smaller, surely a doughty piece of service was that day atchieved & I wot not whether I may truly say, of the greatest consequence that any ever was, during the time of that war. For as the time was then, it was a greater matter for the Romans (albeit they were the Conquerors) not to be vanquished of Annibal, than it was afterwards to vanquish him. Annibal disappointed of his hope to win Nola retired to Acerre. And Marcellus immediately having shut the gates, and placed the guards and warders to keep the same, that no man might go forth, sat judicially in the marketplace to examine those that had used secret conference and purling with the enemies: and finding above seventy guilty of this action, pronounced sentence of death upon them, as in case of treason. Those he cut shorter by the head, and commanded their goods to be confiscat. And thus leaving the government of the City to the Senat thereof, he departed with all his forces, and above Suessula encamped himself, and there abode.

Annibal being come before Acerre, first summoned the City, to surrender voluntarily & without constraint: but seeing them obstinate, and willing to relent, he made preparation to lay siege unto the town and to assault it. But the Acerrians had better heart and courage, than might and strength to resist him. Therefore, when they saw themselves like to be intrenched all about, and were past hope to defend and keep the town: before the enemies had brought all ends of their trenches and sconces together, they got between the trenches and rampiers (where they were not finished, and stood not close together) in the dead time of the night, and escaped through the sentinels and watches that were slendely looked unto, and as well as they could making shift through by-waies and blind lanes, over hedge and ditch (as either their wits guided them, or their fear carried them) recovered those Cities of Campania, which they knew for certain were not revolted, but persisted true and fast unto the Romans. Annibal after he had put Acerre to the sack, and set it on fire, having intelligence, that the Roman Dictator and the Legions were received at Casilinum: and fearing, lest while the enemy lay so near encamped, some should have recourse also into Capua, led his army to Casilinum.

At the same time Preneſte was held by 500 Preneſtins, with a few Romans and Latines, who upon the news of the overthrow at Canna, were retired thither. These Preneſtins, by occasion that they were not levied and mustered at Preneſte by the day appointed, set out from thence somewhat too late: and were come as far as Casilinum, before the rumour was bruited of the defeat before Canna: where they joyned themselves with other Romans and Confederats, set forward from Casilinum, and marched together with a good great company: but meeting by the way with

with the tidings of that unfortunate field, turned back again to Casilinum. And after they had spent certain daies there, as well fearing the Campani as suspected of them again, (for they devised on both sides how to entrap one another, and how to avoid each others trains) and having received also certain intelligence, That in Capua there was treating about a revolt, and that Annibal was there received: they in one night let upon the Townsmen of Casilinum, and killed them, and got that part of the City which is on this side Fulturnus, (a river that runneth through it, and divideth it into two parts) and kept it still. Their number was well increased by the coming of a cohort of four hundred and sixty Perusini, who likewise were driven to Casilinum, by the same report and news, which a few daies before had turned the Prenestini thither. And surely there was sufficient almost of armed souldiers to man and defend the walls of that part, being of so small a circuit as they were, considering the town was flanked on the one side with the river. And again, for the proportion of corn (whereof they had small store) they were men but too many. Annibal being now not far from thence, sent before him the Getulians, under the conduct of a Captain named Isulca: with direction, that first if he could come to a parley, he should perswade with the Inhabitants within, and by fair words induce them to open their gates, and receive a garrison; but in case they continued still in their obstinacy, then to assail them by force, and give the attempt to enter into the City one way or other. When they were come under the walls, the barbarous Captain Isulca, supposing (because he heard no noise, and saw no stirring) that they had quit and abandoned the town and were fled, began to assail the gates, break open the locks, & burst the bars. But all at once on a sudden the gates were set open, and two cohorts well appointed and provided for that purpose within, sallied forth with an exceeding great noise and tumult, overthrew a number of the enemies and beat them down. Thus when the first had the repulse and were set back, Makarba was sent with a greater power to second them, but was not able to make his party good with these squadrons that sallied forth and charged upon him. At last Annibal himself encamped even before the wall, and with all his power and forces put together, made preparation to give assault to this little town & small garrison. And while he pressed hard upon them with fresh and hot assaults, investing it round about, the enemies from off their walls, curtains, and turrets, let flie their shot so lustily upon the assailants, that he lost some of his best & most forward men there. Once they issued forth of themselves upon a bravery, and minded to bid them battell, but by a course of Elephants, set between them and home, they had like to have been shut forth and kept out, and so they made haste in great fear to recover the gates and put themselves within the town again: having lost, considering so small a number, a great sort: and more had died for it, but that the night parted the fray, and made an end of the skirmish. The morrow after, the assailants were all of them sharp set to give a fresh and hot charge, but not before there was a mural Coronet of gold shewed, and promised unto him that first could scale the walls. And the General himself cast in their teeth and reproved them for being so long about the assaulting of a small and weak sconce, to speak of, seated also upon a plain: whereas before they had won the strong town of Saguntum. He put them in mind both all and some, of Canna, Thrasymenus, and Trebia. Then began they to set mantlets and pavises to, and to undermine. Many and sundry enterprises were attempted, and nothing left undone, that either by meer force could be performed, or by art and cunning devised. The Roman associates against these their engines and fabricks raised mounts, and platforms: yea, and with countermines and cross trenches, met with the mines of the enemies; so as both above ground, and underneath, they impeached all their attempts: so long, untill Annibal for very shame was faine to give over his design for the present. And when he had fortified his standing Camp, and placed there a mean guard for the defence of it, because he would not seem to have relinquished altogether the enterprize, he withdrew himself into Capua, there to winter. There he lodged his souldiers within house for the better part of winter: those souldiers, I say, who many a time and often had endured long, and held out against all travels and hardness that can possibly happen to the body of man: and never had been used to any good keeping, nor acquainted with delights and pleasures of the world. But even these men, whom no calamity, no misery could tame and overcome, were spoiled and undone with too much wealth and excessive dainties: and so much the rather, as they more greedily fell thereto: and having not tasted thereof before, gave themselves wholly that way, and were deeply plunged and drowned therein. For sleeping on soft beds, wine and delicate fare, wenching and bathing, stews and hot-houses, idleness and taking ease, which by use and custome grew pleasant and delightful unto them every day more than other: had in such sort weakened their bodies, and made their hearts so effeminate, that from that time forward the reputation and name only of their victories past defended them more than any present strength and vigor they had: insomuch, as expert and skillfull warriors judged their Captain Annibal in more fault, and farther overseen in this action, than in not leading his Army straight forward to Rome, after the battell before Canna. For, that stay might have been thought to have deferred only the entire and final victory for a time, but this error and oversight seemed to disable him for achieving the victory for ever. So little retained he of his former old discipline that I assure you, he went out of Capua again as if he had led some other Army and none of his own. For, not only they returned from thence most of them intrangled and snared in the love of harlots, but so soon as they came again to lie abroad on the bare earth under tents and pavilions covered with beasts hides, to march long journeys, and to taste of other military toil and labour: their bodies so tired, their hearts so fainted, as if they had been raw

Araw souldiers, new come into the field: in such wise, as all the time of their summer abode in Camp, many of them without license and passport, would slip out of the way, and depart from their colours: and these start-backs had no other place of haunt to lurk in, but Capua. Now when the winter season began to be more mild, and draw towards the Spring, Annibal brought forth his souldiers out of his wintering harbours, and returned to Caslinum: where, albeit the assault ceased, yet the siege had continued so freight, that the townsmen and the garrison within the Fort, were driven to extreme necessity and want of victuals. Now the Captain over the Roman Camp was T. Sempronius [Gracchus] by reason that the Dictator was gone to Rome to take new Auspices. And as for Marcellus, who was desirous for his part to relieve and succour the besieged, was impeached for coming to them, partly by the rising and swelling of the river Vulturnus, and partly, by the intreaty of the Citizens of Nola and Acerre, who greatly feared the Campains, in case the garrison were once departed from them. And Gracchus, lying and keeping near unto Caslinum, stirred not one foot, by reason of the express commandment of the Dictator. That he should attempt nothing in his absence: albeit there came daily from Caslinum into the Camp such news, as would have moved and provoked the most patient man that was. For it was constantly reported, and for certain known, that some of them within the town, no longer able to endure the famine, threw themselves down headlong, and brake their necks: others stood unarmed upon the walls, offering their bare and naked bodies as a Butt and mark to the shot of arrows, and others darts. Gracchus grieved much to hear these pitious tidings, yet durst he not for his life, skirmish and fight without the warrant of the Dictator: & he saw full well, that if he would convey corn and victuals unto them openly, fight he must; there was no remedy. Having therefore no hope at all to send any, but it should be spied, he devised to fill many tuns and pipes with corn, that he had gotten together out of the country all about: and withall, to dispatch a messenger to the chief Magistrate of Caslinum, advising him, that he should in the night season take up all those vessels that came down the river. The night next following, every man watched at the river side, according to the hope they conceived by the foresaid Roman messenger, and so received those tuns, hulling down the midst of the stream: and the corn was equally divided among them all. Thus did they the morrow after, and the third day also. For, ever by night these vessels were let down into the water, and the same night they might easily come unto them: by reason whereof the sentinels and guards of the enemies were nothing ware of that which was done. But afterwards, the current growing more swift and rough, by occasion of continuall rain that fell, the said tuns were some of them driven cross the channel to the bank side, even where the enemies warded: and were espied waving and sticking among the willows and osiers that grew along close unto the banks: whereof Annibal was advertised. And so from thenceforward they tended the watch more straightly, that nothing sent down the river Vulturnus could escape them, and pass to the City. Afterwards, there was powred into the water great store of nuts from the Camp of the Romans: which floated down the channel unto Caslinum, and with grated skimmers of wicker were taken up. But at the last, they within the town were driven to this poor shift and extremity, for to take their thongs and bridle reins, to pluck of the leather from their shields & bucklers, and make them soft in scalding water, and prove how they could eat them. Nay, they spared not so much as mice, and rats, nor any other like vermin. Nor there was not a weed nor a root that they could come by, upon the banks and terraces under the walls, but they gathered and digged up. And when the enemies had turned up with a plough all the green-sord of the counter-scarp without the walls, they within cast turnip-seed upon the mould. Whereupon Annibal made a hout at it, and cried aloud: What? shall we sit here about Caslinum so long, untill these rapes be come up and grown. And whereas before that time, he would never vouchsafe to hear of any composition and agreement now at last, he was contented to take reason, and be conferred withall about the ransom of as many as were freemen within the Town. And it was covenanted between him and them, that they should pay for their redemption * seven ounces of gold a peece. So upon faithfull promise made, and security given,

* 21. lib. ster.

Fthey yielded themselves: and were kept bound in prison untill they had made full payment of the gold aforesaid. After which, they were sent back under safe conduct to Cumes. For this is more like to be true, than the report which goeth, That there were sent out after them certain horsemens, who fell upon them and slew them in the way. Most of them were Preneftins. And whereas, there were of them in all five hundred and seventy in garrison the one half well near, were either by sword or hunger consumed: All the rest, together with their Prætor Manitius, (one who a foretime had been a Scribe or Notary) returned safe unto Prenefte. In memorial and testimony of this his Statue was erected in the market place of Prenefte, armed in his cuirasse, clad in a long robe, with his head covered: and three other images, with a title or inscription engraven in a plate of Brasse, with this tenor: That Manitius had made a vow for the souldiers who lay in garrison with him at Caslinum. And the same title also was engraven under three other images, set up in the Temple of Fortuna. The Town of Caslinum was restored again to the Campains, with a strong garrison of 700 souldiers, deducted out of the army of Annibal: for fear lest when he was departed once from thence, the Romans should assail them.

The Senat of Rome by vertue of a decree, granted unto those souldiers of Prenefte double wages, with five years vacation & rest from warfare. And when to gratifie them farther for their valiant service, they made offer unto them of the Burgesie and freedom of Rome, they chose rather to remain still at home, and would not change their own Country. But what befell unto the Preneftins, roins, is not recorded so plainly: for neither appeareth evidence by any publique monument and memoriall of their own, nor yet decreed extant of the Romans. At the same time the Petellins (who alone of all the Brutii remained in friendship and amity with the Romans) were assaulted not only by the Carthaginians, (that were possessed of a great part of the Country about them) but also by the other Brutii with whom they would not joyn in the complot of their rebellion. The Petellins not able of themselves to hold out and endure these dangers, sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave their aid and assistance: whose humble prayers and piteous tears (for after an answer received, That they should provide and shift for themselves; they fell into lamentable moans and complaints, and lay prostrate upon the earth, before the porch of the Council-House) wrought exceeding compassion and pity in the hearts of the Senators, and also of the people: whereupon the LL. were moved again the second time, by M. Aemilius the Prator, to deliver their opinion. And when they had cast all about, and well weighed and considered their present state, and what they were able to do: being forced to confess, that it lay not in their power to help their Allies, so far distant and remote from them: they willed them to repair home again; and since they had performed their fidelity to the full, according to covenant, they gave them leave in this calamity of theirs to take that course that they thought best for themselves. When they were returned with this answer unto the Petellins, their Senat all on a sudden was stricken into such sorrows, dumps, and fearfull maze; that some of them were of mind, and gave advice, to abandon the City, and fly every man wheresoever he could: others were of opinion and perswaded, that seeing they were forsaken of their old friends, they should joyn with the other Brutii, and by their means, turn to Annibal, and come under his protection. Howbeit, a third side prevailed, who would in no wise that anything should be done over hastily and rashly: but that they might meet again, and sit in counsell about the matter. And so it was put off, and respite given untill the next day. Then, after more mature deliberation, and their former fear somewhat asswaged, the principall personages there assembled grew to this resolution, namely, To convey all things out of the Territory about them into the City, and to fortifie both it and the walls.

Near about one and the same time, there came Posts with Packets of Letters to Rome, from out of Sicily and Sardinia. Those out of Sicily from Octavius the Vice-Prator, were read first in the Senat-House importing these news: That L. Furius the Prator was come out of Affrick, and with his fleet arrived at Lilybeum: himself sore hurt, and lying at point of death: that neither the souldiers, nor sailors, and mariners, had their money or corn duly paid at the day; neither indeed was there any to be had, for to keep touch and make payment: moving and advising them earnestly, to send supply thereof with all convenient speed: and if they thought so good, one also of the new chosen Prators to succeed after him. To the same effect in manner wrote Cornel. Mamurra the Pro-Prator, out of Sardinia, as touching that point of money and corn. Answer was returned to the one and the other. That they had it not, and therefore they were to look themselves both to their Armados and Armies, and to provide for them. Octavius, who addrest Embassadors unto K. Hiero (the only refuge and stay of succour that the people of Rome had) received for souldiers pay, as much silver as was needfull, and corn to serve six months. The confederat Cities likewise in Sardinia contributed liberally unto Cornelius, and served his turn. At Rome also for want of silver, there were (by a law published by Minutius, Tribune of the Commons) created three Bankers, called Triumviri Mensarii, to wit, L. Aemilius, who had been Consul and Censor; M. Atilius Regulus, twice Consul afore time: and L. Scribonius Libo, a Tribune of the Commons for the time being. Two Duumvirs also were chosen, M. and C. Atilii, who dedicated the Temple of Concord which L. Manlius Prator had vowed before. Three High Priests also were consecrated Q. Cecilius Metellus, Q. Fabius Max., and Q. Fulvius Flaccus all to supply the rooms of P. Scaminius late deceased: of L. Aemilius Paulus the Consul, and Q. Aelius Paetus, slain both in the journey of Cannæ.

Now when as the LL. of the Senat had fulfilled other wants, and made up all decays and breaches, which fortune by continuall calamities and losses had wrought and brought upon them, so far forth, as by any wisdom and policy of man, they could provide for: at length they had respect and regard unto themselves also, even to the desolate estate of the Council-House, and the infrequent number of Senators, assembling to the publique Council of the City. For since that L. Aemilius and C. Flaminius were Censors, there had been chosen no new Senators, notwithstanding that in five years space, what with unortunate battels, and what with other particular chances, so many of them had miscarried. And when M. Aemilius the Prator, in the absence of the Dictator (who after the loss of Castellum was now gone again to the host) had at the request of them all, propounded this matter: then Sp. Carvilius, after he had in a long oration complained, not only of the penury, but also of the small choice of those Citizens, who were capable of Senators dignity, spake unto the point, and said, "That he held it a matter of good importance both for the repairing and restoring of the decayed body of the Senat, as also for to bind the Latine Nation in a more fast bond of amity, that two Senators out of every State of the Latines (if the LL. of the Senat of Rome would agree unto it) should be enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and taken into the Senat in place of those that were deceased. This opinion of his the LL. of the Senat could abide to hear with no better ear than in times past they accepted the motion and demand of the Latines themselves in that behalf. And there being throughout the whole House a great muttering

A muttering, for very indignation and disdain of those his words, Manlius above the rest brake out into this speech, and said; "That they were not all dead, but one man yet was left alive of that house and line, out of which a Consul (when time was) threatened in the Capitol, that he would kill with his own hand, that Latine whomsoever he saw sitting in the Councel-House of Rome. With that, Q. Fabius: "Never was there a thing, quoth he, propounded and mentioned in the Senat-house, in a worse and more unseasonable time, than at this present, when as the hearts and affections of our Allies being so wavering, their faith and alleageance so doubtful, the very breaking and breaching of such a matter as this, were enough to set them farther out. And therefore this inconsiderat speech of one foolish vain person, is to be suppressed and buried presently with the silence of all men, and never once to be spoken of again. And if ever there were uttered at Councel Table, any secret and mystery, which were to be concealed, this of all other ought most to be kept close, hidden and smothered in oblivion, and reputed as never spoken at all. So this matter was dashed, and dyed there in the very birth. Then they proceeded and agreed, to create Dictator for the choosing of Senators, one that had been Censor aforetime, and of all those who had been Censors, and were then living, the most ancient: and thereto they gave order, that C. Terentius Varro the Consul should be sent for, to the nomination of that Dictator. Who being returned out of Apulia, leaving the camp there with a good guard, and taking long journeys, until he was come to Rome: the night next following (as the manner was) created by authority of an act of Senat, M. Fabius Buteo, Dict. for six moneths, without a General of Horse. When he was mounted up with his Serjeants to the Rostra, [which is the place of publike audience] for to make a speech unto the people, he said: "That he neither allowed of two Dictators at one time, (a precedent never seen and known afore) nor yet could take himself for a Dictator, so long as he was without his General of Cavalry. I mislike also (quoth he) that the entire authority and power of Censors, should be put into the hands of one and the self-same man, twice: and that a Dictator should have the rule and government for six moneths, unless he were created for the managing of wars. And therefore (said he) I will my self limit and gage those things, which fortune, occasion of the times, and necessity have made excessive and beyond all measure powerful. Neither am I minded to depose or displace any of those from his Senators dignity, whom C. Flaminius, and L. Amylius late Censors, have admitted into the Senat: but only, that a transcript and rehearsal be made of their names, for that I would not have it lie in the power of one man alone, to censure and give judgement of the fame and behavior of a Senator: but this course will I take in substituting new Senators in the room of the dead, that it may appear, and be said; That this Order and degree is preferred before that, and not one person before another. So after that the names of the old Senators were copied out and read, then he chose first into the place of them that were deceased, those who after the time of L. Amylius and C. Flaminius Censors, had borne any Magistracy of State, and of the chair, and yet were not elected Senators. And according as they had exercised their office one before another in order of time, so were they chosen first Senators in their course. This done, he made a second election, of those who had been Ediles, Tribuns, Pretors, or Questors: and last of all, such as could shew the spoils taken from the Enemies of Rome hanging in their houses: or had been honoured and rewarded with a Civick garland. Thus after he had with right great approbation and contentment of all men, taken into the Senat 177. forthwith he resigned up his office, descended from the pulpit a private man again, discharged and put from him the Serjeants, and came and stood beneath among the other multitude that attended their own private business: trifling out the time for the nonce and of purpose, because he would not have the people to leave the common place for to wait upon him. Howbeit, for all that lingering and stay which he made, the peoples affection cooled never the more, and so with a goodly train of men he was accompanied, and conducted home to his house.

The next night following, the Consul returned toward the army, without making the Senate privy and acquainted with his departure, for fear he should have been detained still in the City for the solemn election of new Magistrats. The morrow after the Senate decreed, upon a motion propounded by M. Pomponius the Pretor, to write unto the Dictator, that if he thought it were for the good of the common-weal, he would together with his General of the Cavalry, and M. Marcellus the Pretor, repair to Rome to subrogate and choose new Consuls, to the end that when they were all together in place, the LL. of the Senate might by them take knowledge in what state the Common-wealth stood, and consult how to provide for every thing. They all came that were sent for accordingly, leaving behind them their Lieutenants for the government and conduct of the Legions. The Dictator spake of himself but little, and with much modesty, ascribing the greatest part of the honor unto T. Sempronius Gracchus, and then summoned the general assembly for the Election: in which were chosen Coss. L. Posthumus the third time (who then was absent, and as L. Deputy ruled the Province of Gallia) and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who at that time commanded the Cavalry, and repaired to Rome with speed. Then were elected Pretors M. Valerius Levinus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. Mutius Scævola. The Dictator after the choosing of these Magistrats, returned to Theannum, where the army wintered: leaving the General of the Horse behind at Rome, to the end that he being to enter into his government, within few dayes after, might consult with the LL. of the Senat as touching the levy and enrolling new armies against the year ensuing.

The defeature of L. Posthumus
my.

Whiles they were in their busiest and deepest conferences about these matters, news came of a fresh overthrow: such was the fortune of that year to heap one calamity in the neck of another: to wit, that L. Posthumus the Consul elect, was himself slain, and the army together with him in Gallia, utterly defeated and destroyed. The manner of which misfortune was this. There was in those parts a wide and huge Forrest (which the Gauls call Litana) through which Posthumus was to lead his army. The trees there growing on either hand of the pae, the Gauls had so cut, that they might stand upright of themselves so long as they were not stirred, so being forced never so little, they must needs fall down. Now had Posthumus the conduct of two Roman legions; and of associates besides, from the high coasts of the upper Sea, he had enrolled so many souldiers, as that he came into the enemies countrey 25000 strong. The Gauls who had bestowed themselves in ambush round about the skirts of the wood, so soon as the army was all engaged within the streights of the pae, shoved from them the trees (so guilded) which stood next unto them, and they fell one upon another (standing as they did, so ticklish of themselves, and ready to totter and come down on both sides of the way) and in the fall overthrow withal and covered over and over both horse and man, with their armour and munition, so as scarce ten of them escaped alive. For as most of them were felled and stricken stark dead, either with the bodies of the trees, or the broken arms and boughs; so the rest of the multitude, affrighted with this unexpected and unhappy accident, were killed by the Gauls that beset all the streights and passages of the wood: and of that great number, they took few prisoners, who making towards a bridge standing over the River, were intercepted by the way, and stopped by the enemies that kept the advenue of the bridge: in which place Posthumus was slain, for he strived all that ever he could, not to be taken alive. The spoils of this General Captain, together with the head cut off from the rest of his body, the Boians with great joy and solemnity brought into the Temple that amongst them was reputed most holy and sacred. And after they had censed the head, as their manner is, they enchaced and garnished the skull with gold, and that served as well for an holy vessel to sacrifice and Divine withal, upon high and festival dayes, as also for an ordinary drinking mazar for the high Priest, and other Prelats of that Temple. The booty also which the Gauls gained of their enemies, was of no less importance than the victory: for although a great part of the beasts and living creatures was crushed and squealed to death with the fall of the wood, yet all other things, by reason that nothing was scattered and lost by flight, were found wholly on the ground, as the souldiers lay along in that order as they marched.

These woful tidings being reported, the City was for many dayes in such fear and perplexity, that all shop windows were shut up, and no stirring at all in the streets throughour, from one end to the other, as if it had been night continually. Then the Senat gave the Aediles in charge to walk all about, and command the shops to be set open, and to make no more shew in the City of publick sorrow and heaviness. Then T. Sempronius assembled a Senate, spake comfortably to the L.L. of the Councel, and exhorted them, that "as they were not dismayed with the overthrow and discomfiture at Cannæ, so they would not be cast down and daunted with lighter and smaller losses and calamities. For if it might please the Gods to blesse them, and give them good speed (as they hoped no less) against the Carthaginian enemies and Annibal, the war with the Gauls might without danger and inconvenience either be laid aside clean, or put off and deferred. As for the revenge of this deceitful practise, it should rest still in the power either of the immortal Gods, or of the people of Rome, to be performed one time or other. But for the present, they were to consult and resolve concerning Annibal their grand enemy, and to grow to some point and conclusion of such forces as were meet for that war. And first himself discoursed and laid down what companies of foot and Horse, what number of citizens, and how many confederats were in the army of the Dictator. After him, Marcellus shewed and recounted the proportion of his own power and their strength. Also, what forces, and of what quality, were with C. Terentius the Consul in Apulia, they were required to declare, who might speak upon their knowledge. Then they proceeded to cast and examine, whether two Consular armies well appointed and furnished, were sufficient to go through so great a war. Thus for that year they let Fraunce alone, albeit they had good cause to be angry, and were provoked that way to follow revenge. The Dictator his army, was appointed unto the Consul. As for the forces under the leading of Marcellus, consisting of them that fled out of the field at Cannæ, those they ordained to be sent over into Sicily, there to remain in service so long as the war continued in Italy: and that thither also should be posted over out of the Dictator his Legions, all those souldiers who were able to do least service, there to abide in souldiery, without any other limitation of time than that, which the Laws in that case provide for. For the other Consul, who should be substituted in stead of L. Posthumus, there were assigned two Legions of Roman Citizens: and order was given, so soon as the Auspices would permit, he should be elected with speed. Likewise it was agreed upon and ordained, to send for two legions besides out of Sicily: out of which, the Cons. unto whom those Legions aforesaid of the City were allotted, should take what souldiers he thought needful. Finally, C. Terentius the Consul, had his commission of command continued for another year, without empairing one jot of the army, which he had in his conduct for the guard and defence of Apulia.

* i. The term of ten years.

Amids these affairs and preparations in Italy, the war went forward nevertheless in Spain, and ever to that day prospered on the Romans side. P. and Cn. Scipios divided their forces so,

As Ce. should serve by Land, and Publius at Sea with the navy. Asdrubal the chief Colonel and Commander there of the Carthaginians, distrusting his own strength both by Sea and Land, kept himself aloof, and far from the enemy, in sure places of safety: unto whom, after long suit and instant prayers, were sent 4000 foot, and 500 horse out of Affrick for supply. Having thus at length, with new helps gathered, with hope, he encamped neerer to his enemy, and gave order and direction withal, that the Alimo should be rigged and decked for the defence of the Islands, and the Sea-coasts. And while he was thus beginning hotly to make war again, he was suddenly distempered and disquieted with the revolt of the Admirals and great Captains of the navy: who for their fearful abandoning of the fleet upon Iberus, having been sharply checked and rebuked, were never after trusty and sure, either to the Colonel himself, or to the State of Carthage. These fugitive renegats had first practised to raise troubles and insurrections in the Land of the Carpesii, and by their soliciting and instigation, certain Cities were procured to rebel, and one of them they had forced by assault. Whereupon, Asdrubal turned his forces from the Romans, and bent them wholly against that Nation: and with a cruel army entering the frontiers of the enemies, determined to give the charge upon Galbus, a Nobleman, and renowned chieftain of the Carpesians, even before the City, that some few dayes before was lost, where the said Galbus with a puissant power kept himself strongly encamped. Having therefore sent out before, certain vancurriers lightly armed, to train forth and draw the enemies to skirmish, he made out withal certain Companies of his Infantry sundry wayes to over-run and spoil the country, and likewise to catch up and meet with all straglers, dispersed in the fields. Whereupon, at one time there was a skirmish before the camp: and likewise in the fields, they were either slain, or put to flight. But afterwards, having by divers wayes from all parts recovered again the camp, suddenly they shaked off all fear, plucked up their hearts, and thought themselves good enough, not only to defend their fort and hold, but also to bid the enemy battail. They sallied out therefore of the camp in good array, shouting, dancing, and hopping after their manner, so as this unexpected boldness and courage of theirs, terrified the enemies, who a little before had challenged them to fight. Whereupon Asdrubal himself withdrew and retired his power for more security to an hill of good height, and situat for his advantage, with a River likewise between him and his enemies. The light armed vancurriers also, and the forlorn hope, together with the Horsemen that rode scattering abroad, he caused thither to repair for their better safety. And because he trusted neither hill nor river, he fortified himself with a trench and rampier besides. In this alternat and interchangeable fear on both sides, there passed some bickerments; and blows were dealt between. In which, neither the Numidian Horsemen were able to match the Spaniards in that kind, nor the Moores archers could make their part good with the light Carpesians targetiers, who in nimbleness and swiftness were as good as they; and for courage and bodily strength, far better. These Carpesians seeing they neither could provoke Asdrubal to a battail, with all their braving hard under his camp, nor yet easily by assault win it, they took by force the City Asena, into which Asdrubal when he first invaded the Frontiers of his enemies, had conveyed store of corn and other victuals: yea, and became LL. of all the country thereabout. And they grew so lusty and audacious, that neither in their march and array, nor within their camp they would be ruled and ordered by any mans command. This secure and careless negligence of theirs, when Asdrubal perceived to arise (as usually it doth) upon good success and prosperity; after an exhortation made to his souldiers, to charge upon the enemies, roving abroad without their colours, he descended from the hill, and marched in battail array against the camp. So soon as the Spaniards were advertised by those who came in great hast, and fled from the Sentinels and corps de guard, that he was coming, and neer at hand, with a great outcry they gave the alarm. And as every man could get weapon in hand they ran upon the head to battail, without direction and commandment of Captain, without signal, ensign, and order, confusedly. When the formost in the vanguard were joyned in conflict and come to hand-fight, some of their fellows were seen running on heaps and by ftroups, and others were not well come forth of the camp: At the first the enemy was terrified with their bold adventure. Afterwards, as they encountred, thin and loosely railed, with the enemies thick and closely ranged together, seeing themselves too weak, and not sufficient, so few in number to defend themselves, they looked back one upon another for succour: and being on every side put back, and forced to retreat and lose ground, they cast themselves into a ring, and thus thrust (as they were) close together, body to body, and armour to armour, they were so pent and pestered in so narrow a ground, that they had scarce room enough to wield their weapons: so they were compassed and environed round with the enemy, and for a good part of the day hewen, in peeces, and massacred. Some few of them that brake through by dint of sword, escaped to the woods and mountains. With like fear the camp was abandoned: and the day following, the whole nation yielded, and came under the subjection of the Carthaginians.

Long they continued not quiet. For within a while news came from Carthage, that Asdrubal should make what speed he could with his army into Italy. Which rumour being blown abroad through Spain, turned in manner all their hearts away unto the Romans. Whereupon Asdrubal addressed his Letters immediately to Carthage, shewing what hurt the fame of his departure had done already: and in case he should set forward on his journey, and go out of those parts, all Spain would turn to the Romans, before he were passed the river Iberus. For over and besides, that he had not strength enough to leave behind for a garrison, nor a sufficient commander

mander in stead of himself, the Generals of the Roman armies, who had set foot in Spain, were of such, as he might hardly make head against them with equal puissance. And therefore, if they had any regard of Spain, he advised them to send one to succed him with a strong power: For he should have his hands full, and enough to do in the Province, till out things as fortunately as they could. These letters, albeit at the first sight they greatly troubled the Senat, yet because the Italian affairs seemed of more moment and greater importance, they wrought no alteration in their intended course, either for Asdrubal himself, or his forces. Howbeit Himilco was sent with a complete and competent army, and a greater Armado, both for the holding of Spain in their allegiance, and also for their defence by Sea and Land. Who having passed over with all his power, as well for Land-service as the Sea, fortified his camp, drawn his ships ashore, laid them up in drie Land, and empaled them strongly all about: himself in person with his elect and most choice men of arms, made what hast possibly he could, through nations partly enemies, partly doubtful and untrusty, and staid not either in one place or other (but evermore standing upon his guard) until he was come to Asdrubal. After he had declared unto him the order decreed by the Senat, and what he had in commission, and taken himself direction likewise from him, in what manner the war in Spain was to be managed, he returned back again to his own camp. In which voyage to and fro, he travailed safely by no one thing more than by speedy expedition. For he was ever gone from a place, before the people could agree together, and make head against him. Now Asdrubal, before that he dislodged and set his army on foot out of those parts, levied sums of money of all the Cities and states under his jurisdiction: for well he knew, that Annibal had paid sweetly before him, for his passage through certain countries: and as well he wist besides, that the Gauls he was fain to wage: for amongst them no money, no men. And if he undertook and entered upon that great expedition, poor and bare of silver, he had never reached so far as the Alps. Thus having in great hast raised and collected his monies, he came down to the river Iberus.

When the Romans heard of the proceedings and designments of the Carthaginians, and likewise of the journey of Asdrubal: both the Generals (laying all other matters apart) prepared to joyn their whole forces together, to oppose themselves, and to withstand such intended attempts: supposing and considering, that if Annibal (who by himself alone was an enemy to Italy hardly supportable) were once seconded by Colonel Asdrubal and the Spanish army, the Empire of Rome would soon be at an end. Upon these careful cogitations being grieved and perplexed, they assembled all their power neer to Iberus: and after they had passed over the river, and long consulted whether they should encamp themselves and abide the coming of the enemies to bid them battail; or by invading and assailing the associates and subjects of the Carthaginians, to stay the enemy and hinder his intended journey: they resolved at length and made preparation to assault Ibera (so named of the river neer by) the richest and most wealthy City at that time, of all others in those parts. Whereof when Asdrubal was advertised, he for to help his friends, advanced himself likewise to set upon another City lately yielded to the Romans, and reduced under their subjection. And so the Romans after they had begun to lay siege to Ibera, gave over that enterprise, and made head against Asdrubal himself. And for some few dayes they lay incamped five miles asunder one from the other, not without somelicht skirmishes: but never came to pitch a fair field. At length upon one and the same day (as if they had been so agreed afore) they happened on both sides to set out the signal of battail, and to come forth with all their power into the plain ground. The Romans stood arranged in three battailons: one part of the Infantry was placed before the standards in the vanguard, another Regiment belowed behind in the rereguard: the men of arms flanked the sides like wings. On the other part, Asdrubal strengthened his main batrel with Spaniards: in the right point he marshalled the Carthaginians, in the left, the Africans. As for the auxiliar and mercenary Horsemen, whom he waged and hired: such as were Numidians, he ordained affront the Carthaginians footmen to guard them: the rest that were Africans, he distributed and disposed about the skirts and edges of the battailons. Neither were all the Numidians placed in the right flank, but such as after the guise and manner of Vaulters, led two Horses apeece: and used often times in the mids of the hottest conflict, to leap armed as they were from their wearied horse, to another fresh one. So nimble are they themselves, and so tractable and well taught to their hands are their Horses. Thus stood they arranged on both sides in order of battail. The Captains of either part for hopes in manner nothing unequal: for neither in number or quality of souldiers, was there any great odde between them: Many, for courage and heart, there was great difference and inequality in the souldiers themselves. For the Romans (notwithstanding they fought far from home) were so perswaded by their leaders, that they fought for Italy and the City of Rome: and therefore as if the whole hope of their safe return into their country, were to be tried and decided in this one battail, they resolved either to win the day or to dye for it. On the other side, the souldiers were not so resolute, for most of them being Spaniards, would have chosen rather to be conquered and overcome in Spain, than with conquest and victory to be drawn into Italy. And therefore at the first shock, when scarcely the darts and javelins were lanced and let flye, their main battail retreated: and so soon as the Romans with great violence redoubled the charge, they turned their backs and fled. Howbeit in both flanks the fight was hot enough. The Carthaginians of the one side, the Africans on the other, charged the Romans very hard, and fought sore against them, as if they had them invironed round about within their battailons. But when as the whole power of the Romans were once rallied and gathered Ared together in the mids, they were strong enough to remove and set back the wings of the enemies. So they maintained fight in two divers places at once. But both in the one and the other, the Romans (after they had discomfited the main battail in the mids) were no doubt, much better, as well in number, and also in strength and vigour of men. Many a tall fellow was there slain. And had not the Spaniards at the first when the battail was scarce begun, fled again by heaps, very few of the whole battail had escaped and remained alive. The Horsemen fought little or not at all. For the Moors and Numidians, so soon as they espied the battail to shrink and lose ground, presently all on a sudden fled as fast as they could, and left the sides and flanks of the said battail naked, driving afore them the Elephants withal. And even Asdrubal himself, who maintained the skirmish to the very last, escaped with some few out of the thickest massacre and execution. The Romans took their camp and rifled it. This battail was of such import and consequence, that it caused all the Spaniards, who were before but wavering, to turn wholly to the Romans: and left Asdrubal no hope at all, to pals with his forces into Italy, nor so much as to make abode with safety in Spain. The news hereof being broited abroad and sent to Rome, by the letters of the two Scipio's, great joy there was, not so much for the victory, as because Asdrubal was tied by the foot, and staid for coming into Italy.

Amids these exploits in Spain, * Petelia (a City of the Brutii, having endured the siege and many assault for certain moneths) was finally won by Himico, one of Annibal's Captains. But that victory cost the Carthaginians much blood, and many a sore wound. No force nor violence overcame the besieged Petelians more, than very famine. For having consumed and eaten up all food of corn, all flesh of four footed beasts whatsoever: they were driven at length to feed and live upon shoemakers lether, weeds, and roots, tender barks of trees, and the crops of briars and brambles: and they gave not over so long as they were able to stand on their legs upon the walls, and bear their armour.

Annibal after the winning of Petelia, conducted his army against * Consentia, which being not so valiantly defended, was within few dayes surrendered up into his hands. Neer about the same time, a power of the Brutians also, laid siege unto Gercon, a City built and inhabited by the Greeks, and in times past, mighty in men and munition: but now at this time so distressed with manifold and grievous calamities, that of all ages one with another, they were not able to make twenty thousand men. And therefore no marvel, if the enemies were soon masters of the City, being so destitute as it was of Citizens to defend it. Only the Castle they kept still, into which there were some that escaped in that tumult when the City was taken, out of the mids of the massacre. The Locrians likewise revolted unto the Brutii and the Carthaginians, by reason that the common multitude were fraudulently betrayed by the chief and principal Citizens. The Rhegines only of all that country, continued both true unto the Romans, and also at their own liberty to the very last. The same disposition to revolt, was to be seen even in Sicily, in so much as the very house of Hiero was not cleer and free in all parts from rebellion. For Gelo his eldest son, having in contempt both the olde age of his father, and also (after the overthrow at Canna,) the society and friendship of the Romans, turned unto the Carthaginians. And he had, no doubt, made a general alteration in Sicily, but that his death came between and cut him off: which hapned so jump, even when he was arming the multitude, and soliciting his friends to rebellion, that his very father himself was drawn into deep suspicion that he took his life away. These were the occurrents that fell out that year with variable event, in Italy, Affrick, Sicily, and Spain.

* Consenza.

In the end of the same year, Q. Fabius Maximus moved the Senat, and made request, that the Temple of Venus Erycina, which he had vowed being Dictator, might now be dedicated. And the Senat made a decree. That Titus Sempronius, Consul elect, should so soon as he was entered into his office, propose unto the people, that they would creat two Duumvirs for the dedication of Temples. And in honour of Emilius Lepidus, who had been Consul twice, and Augur, his three sons, Lucius, Marcus, and Quinius, exhibited certain funeral games for three dayes space; and a shew in the Common place likewise for three dayes together, of two and twenty pair of sword-sensers, to fight at sharp to the death. The Curule Edils, C. Lelivius, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, now Consulelect, who in his Edileship had been General of the Horsemen, set out the Roman games, which were renewed and continued still for three dayes. Likewise, the Playes of the Commons, were thrice exhibited by M. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Claudius Marcellus. Now after three years expired of the Punick war, T. Sempronius the Consul, began his government upon the * Ides of March. As for the Prætors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who had afore-time been Consul and Censor, obtained by lot the jurisdiction of the Citizens: and M. Valerius Corvinus, of the strangers and aliens. To Appius Claudius Pulcher was allotted the government of Sicily: and to Q. Mutius Scævola of Sardinia. M. Marcellus was by the people allowed to have the authority of a Vice Consul, in regard that he above all the Roman Captains, after the defeat of Canna, managed his affairs and warred prosperously in Italy.

Now the very first day, that the Senat was assembled in the Capitol, they decreed upon the first motion, that within the compasse of that year, there should be levied a double tax or tribute: and that one single tribute should be forthwith gathered, for present pay to all the soldiers, saving those that served at Canna. Then concerning the armies this order was set down: Imprimis, that T. Sempronius the Consul, should appoint the two legions of Citizens a certain day.

day to meet at Calas. Item, that six legions should be conducted to the camp of Claudius above Suessula. Item, that the legions which there were (and those consisted for the most part of the residue of the Cannian army). Ap. Claudius Pulcher the Pretor, should put over Sea into Sicily, and as for those that were in Sicily, they should be transported to Rome. Item, unto that army which was appointed to meet by a day, at Calas, M. Claudius Marcellus was sent: and he was commanded to conduct the legions of the Citizens to the camp of Claudius. Last of all, to receive the charge of the old army, and to lead it into Sicily, T. Manlius Cressus Lieutenant was sent by Ap. Claudius. Men looked at first, and yet they said nothing, that the Consul should call an assembly for the creating of a Colleague unto him. But after that they saw that M. Marcellus was sent out of the way (as it were of purpose) whom above all others they were desirous to be the Consul for that year, in regard of his notable good service while he was Pretor; there arose much muttering in the Senat house. Which the Consul perceiving: "My L.L. quoth he, it was for the good of the Common-wealth, that both M. Claudius should go into Campaign to exchange the armies: and also that the Election of Consuls, should not be proclaimed, until that he were returned again from thence, with dispatch of that business which he had in charge: that ye might have a Consul, such a one as the present condition of the State required, and your selves most desired." So there was no more speech of the election, until Marcellus was come back again. In this mean time were two Duumvirs created, Q. Fabius Maximus for the dedication of one Chapel to Penus Erycina, and T. Otacilius Crassus, of another to the Goddess Men. Both stand upon the Capitol hill, divided asunder no more than with one only conduct of water passing between. And as concerning the three hundred Campaign Horsemen, who had served out their full time of warfare faithfully, and were come to Rome, a motion was propounded to the people, that they should be enfranchised Citizens of Rome: and in like manner, that they should be reputed as free Denizens of Cumes, from the day afore that the Capuans revolted from the people of Rome and rebelled. The chiefest cause of proposing this act, was this, because themselves denied hardly that they knew, to whom they did appertain, seeing they had abandoned their old native country: and as yet were not enrolled and incorporat into that state, unto which they had retired. After that Marcellus was come again from the army, the solemn day of election of a Consul in place of L. Posthumus, was published. And with exceeding great content of all men, Marcellus was chosen: and forthwith he was to begin his Magistracy. At whose nupt entrance, it hapned to that day: and the Augurs being called to give their opinion of it, pronounced that they thought he was not rightfully created. And the Senators gave it out commonly and bruited abroad, that the Gods were nor well pleased therewith, because (forsooth) two Consuls were elected of the commonalty (a thing never seen before.) Whereupon Marcellus resigned up his place, and in his room was substituted Fabius Max. the third time.

That year the Sea burned. At Suessula a cow brought forth a hoise foal. And at Enathum in the Temple of Iuno Hospita, certain statues or images dropped with blood: and about that Temple it rained stones. For which shew, there was solemnised, according to the custonable manner, a Novendial sacrifice. The other prodigious signs likewise were expiat with great care and beneficial regard. The Consuls then, parted their armies between them: Fabius took charge of both forces which had been commanded by M. Junius the Dictator. Scipio had the conduct of all the voluntary souldiers, and besides of 25000 of Auxiliaries sent from the confederats. M. Valerius the Pretor had the legions appointed for him, that were returned out of Sicily. M. Claudius the Vice-consul, was sent unto that army, which lay in garrison at Nola, above Suessula. And the Pretors took their journey into Sicily and Sardinia. The Consuls, whensoever they would assemble the Senat, proclaimed that the Senators, and all others that had lawful authority to speak their mind and deliver their opinion in the Council-House, should meet at the gate Capena. The Pretors, those that were Judges in the Court, and to whom the civil jurisdiction appertained, erected their Tribunal seats and places of Assizes at the publick Fish-pond: and thither they commanded all writs to be returned, and apparence there to be made. And for that year all pleas and judgements of causes passed there.

In this mean time news came to Carthage (from whence Mago the brother of Annibal was minded to transport and set over into Italy 12000 footmen, and 1500 horsemen, 30 Elephants, and 1000 talents of silver, together with a guard and supply of 60 gallies) That in Spain things went untowardly: and that all the Cities of Spain (in a manner) were revoked unto the Romans. Some there were of opinion, to withdraw Mago with that fleet and power of his, from the enterprise of Italy into Spain. Considering there was good hope shewed of a suddain, recover again Sardinia, for that there was but a small power of Romans there: and Cornelius the old Lord Deputy, well acquainted with the State of the Province, was now upon his departure from thence, and a new expected in his turn. Over and besides, that the Sardinians were weary already of the Romans government, which they had so long endured, as when the year that past was, had tyrannised over them cruelly, and exercised their authority with oppression, covetously imposing upon them hard exactions and tributs, and levying of them a most unjust taxation and contribution of corn: and finally they wanted nothing but an head, upon whom they might relie themselves. To this effect there was an Embassage sent secretly from the Lords and Princes of the Island. And the principal actor and procurer hereof, was Heracleus, a man in those dayes of greatest authority and power among them. Upon these tidings aforesaid, hapning so just at one time, they were both dis-

A disquieted, and also refreshed. So they sent Adage with his fleet, and other forces into Spain: and they chose for the expedition into Sardinia, Asdrubal (surnamed Calvus), for the L. General, furnished and appointed with as great a power almost, as Mago had.

At Rome likewise, the Consuls having dispatched the affairs of the City, addressed themselves to the war. T. Sempronius appointed Stimacius to be the Rendevous, where the soldiers should meet at a certain day. And Q. Fabius, by an order and direction from the Senat, made an Edict, That all men should before the first day of July, next ensuing, gather all their corn out of the countries, and convey the same into the principal walled strong Towns: proclaiming that whosoever did not accordingly, their fields he would lay waste: tell their servants in port sale at the spear, and bid their farms and villages a fire. Not so much as the Pretors themselves (created for civil jurisdiction and to decide law matters) were freed and exempted from the conduct of war. As for Valerius, the Pretor, he was appointed to go into Apulia, for to receive the army of Terentius: and when the legions were returned out of Sicily, to employ them especially for the guard and defence of that country: and that the army of Terentius should be sent with some one of the Licinius Legions. And M. Calpurnius having sail allowed him, to keep and defend all the Sea coasts between Brundisium and Tarentum. The like number of ships was assigned to Q. Fulvius the City Pretor, for to guard the River side, near adjoining to the City of Rome. C. Terentius the Proconsul had in charge to take up by commission soldiers in the Picene country, and to guard those quarters. And T. Quinctius Crassus, after that he had dedicated the Temple of Mars in the Capitol, was sent into Sicily, as Lord Admiral of the Armado there.

Upon this war between two of the mightiest Cities, and most puissant states of the World, there was not a King and Prince, no, nor a Nation under Heaven, but was smoked. Among whom Philip King of the Macedonians, had an eye thereto, and was more intensive, in that he was secret unto Italy, and only divided from thence by the Jonian Sea. He at the first, when the bruit came to his ears, That Annibal was passed beyond the Alps: as he joyed much, that there was war kindled between the Romans and the Carthaginians; so, as long as it was uncertain, whether that on was the stronger, he wavered in mind and was in suspense, whether of the twain he should wish to have the victory. But after that he heard once, that in three several battails one after another, Annibal and the Carthaginians had gotten the better hand, he inclined to the fortunate side, and sent Embassadors unto Annibal: who falling off, and desirous to avoid the Havens of Brundisium and Tarentum, which were guarded and kept by the Romans fleet, arrived and landed at the Temple of Juno Lucina: and so through Apulia, travelling toward Capua, chanced to light upon the midst of the Romans corps de guard, and were brought before M. Valerius Levidus the Lord Deputy, being then encamped before Nucerina. Where Xenophanes, the principal of the Embassadors, bethought not to say, That he was sent from King Philip, to treat and conclude a league and amity with the people of Rome, and had commission and direction to the Consuls, to the Senat likewise and people of Rome, to that effect. Valerius taking great contentment to hear of this new society and friendship with so noble a King, especially upon the rebellion of so many old allies, courteously inquired and friendly entertained this false hearted enemy, in stead of a trusty friend:

and appointed divers to accompany him forward, to guide him carefully in the wayes, and to shew him what places, what passages and freights were held and kept, either by the Romans, or the enemies. Xenophanes with these instructions passed through the midst of the Roman guards into Campania, and so the next way arrived at the camp of Annibal, and made a league and amity with him, under these conditions and expulations. Imprimis, That King Philip should with a right puissant Armado (for that he was supposed able to set out 200 sail) pass over into Italy, wait and spoil all the Sea coasts, and to his power maintain war by Sea and Land. Item, That when the war was finished, all Italy, together with the very City of Rome should be possessed by the Carthaginians and Annibal, and unto him all the pillage and booty like wise should belong. Item, When Italy was thus subdued, that they should sail into Greece, and wage war with what Princes there they pleased, and that all the Cities of the main, and the Islands which lay to Macedony, should fall unto Philip, and be annexed to his Kingdome. In these terms, and upon these Articles, in manner, was the league concluded and confirmed between the General Annibal, and the Embassadors of the Macedonians: and with them were sent back unto the King for the better ratifying of the said covenants, certain Legats, to wit, Gisgo, Bostar, and Mago, who arrived together at the same Temple aforesaid, of Juno Lucina, where there rid closely a ship at anchor, expecting their return. From whence being departed, they were not so soon lanchd out into the deep, and had taken the open Sea, but they were desiered by the Roman fleet that guarded the coasts of Calabria. Q. Fulvius Placcus made out certain Corsyreans, to pursue and fetch in that ship. Whereupon, the Macedonians began to flee, but seeing themselves overmatched in swiftness of sail, and not able to make way with them, they yielded themselves unto the Romans, and were presented unto the Admiral: Who demanded what they were, from whence they came, and whether they were bound. Xenophanes who had already spied so well by making of a lye, began to cog again, and say, That he was sent from Philip unto the Romans: that he came unto M. Valerius, because to him only he was able to pass in safety, but could not possibly get beyond Campania, being so strongly kept with garisons of the enemies. But afterwards, upon the sight of the Carthaginian habit and apparel, they began to suspect the Embassadors of Annibal: and they being questioned withal, their speech and language bewrayed them. Then was their retinue taken apart, and threatened to confels. Letters also were found upon them, sent from Annibal unto Philip, concerning the peace between the King of the Macedonians and Annibal. Upon these matters thus detected and certainly known, it was thought good to convey the Embassadors and their Company with all speed prisoners to Rome, unto the Senat there, or unto the Consuls whersoever they were. To this purpose were chosen five Pinnacles that were most swift, under the conduct of L. Fulvius Anius, who had his direction and charge to part these Embassadors in several ships, and keep them sure alunder: and to take good heed, that they neither talked nor conferred together.

About the same time it hapned at Rome, that An. Cornelius Mammula, upon his departure out of the Province Sardinia, made report in what state the Island stood; namely, that they all inclined to rebellion and war: that Mutius who succeeded after him, presently upon his first coming, by reason of the ill air and unwholish water, was fallen into a sickness, not so quick and dangerous, as chronick and tedious, and would not be able long to endure the service of war: that the army there, as it was sufficient to guard and keep in good order a quiet and peaceable Province, so it could not hold out with the war that was like to ensue. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat gave order, that Q. Fulvius Flaccus, should levy and enrol 3000 foot, and 400 horse, and provide that this legion should pass over with all speed into Sardinia: and send therewith whom it pleased him to conduct and manage the war until Mutius were recovered of his disease. For this intent was T. Manlius Torquatus sent Governour; one, who had been twice Consul and Censor, and in this Consulship and subdued the Sardinians.

Neer about the same time, there was an Armado sent out from Carthage unto Sardinia, under the leading of Asdrubal surnamed Calvus, and being sore tossed and beaten with tempests, was cast upon the Balear Islands: where (so far out of order was not only the ship-tackling, but also the very keels and bodies of the ships so shaken) they drew up the ships to shore, and whiles they stayed there about calking and trimming them again, they spent much time.

In Italy whiles the wars began to flake and wax cold, by reason that after the battail of Canna, the strength of the one part was much abated, and their force decayed, and the courage of the other, well allayed and made effeminate: the Campains upon their own heads began to contrive, how to reduce the State of Cumes under their obedience, first soliciting them to revolt from the Romans: and seeing that course would not speed and take effect, they devised by a fraudulent practise to compass and entrap them. The Campains use yearly to solemnise a set feast and sacrifice in a certain place called Hama: and they gave notice unto the Cumans, that the whole Senat of Capua would resort thither: requesting the Senat of Cumes, likewise to meet them there, for to confer and consult together in common, how both Cities, the one and the other, might have the same friends and the same enemies, and no other: giving them withal to understand, that they minded there to have a good guard about them of armed men, for fear of some sodain and dangerous attempt from the Romans. The Cumans, albeit they suspected some treachery, denied nothing, supposing thereby to colour and cover their own crafty intended designment. Now all this while, T. Sempronius the Roman Consul, having surveyed and purged his army at Sinuessæ, at which place he had made proclamation, that his forces should meet together: passed over the river Fulturnus, and encamped neer unto Linternum: where because the Souldiers in the standing camp had nothing else to do, he exercised them to run often the race and skirmish in array, to the end that the raw Souldiers (for such were the voluntaries for the most part) might by use and practise learn how to follow their colours in good order, and in the time of battail know their own ranks and ensigns. In these kinds of training, the special care that the General had, and the only thing that he aimed at, was their concord and good agreement. And for this purpose, he charged the Lieutenants, and the Colonels and Captains, that they should not cast in any mans teeth one or other, their fortune and condition aforetime, thereby to breed any discord and heartburning among the companies: and that the old experienced souldiers should suffer themselves to be but equal in estate to the new learners: and those that were born free unto the voluntaries, who had been slaves: reputed them all of birth good enough, and of gentle blood descended, unto whom the people of Rome had vouchsafed to commit their armor and ensigns: saying, that the same fortune which had driven them so to do, forced them likewise to maintain the same, and make the best of it, now it was done. The Captains were not more careful in giving these good lessons and instructions, but the souldiers were as diligent to observe the same: and within a while their hearts and affections grew to be so linked and united together, that they forgot generally, in what degree and of what condition each souldier entred into service. Whiles Gracchus was busied hereabout, the Embassadors of Cumes certified him, what kind of Embassy came unto them from the Campains, a few dayes before, and what answer they had returned: advertising him that their festival day was to be holden three dayes after: that not only the whole Senat would be present, but also the camp and army of the Campains. Gracchus having commanded the Cumans to convey all that they had out of the fields and territories about, into their City, and themselves to keep within their walls: himself the day before the solemnity aforesaid of the Campains, removed his power to Cumes, and there incamped. Now Hama is three miles off from thence. The Campains by this time were assembled there in great number, according to appointment: and not far from the place, Marcius Alpinus the chief head Magistrat of Capua, was incamped closely with fourteen thousand souldiers. He, what with preparation of the sacrifice,

A and contriving withal, the deceitful train of treachery, was more busy and careful therewith, than either in fortifying his camp, or in any other military action. Thus for three dayes continued this festival sacrifice at Hama. And ever in the night season it was performed: so, as before midnight all was done and finished. Gracchus supposing that a good time for his ambush to be employed, having set certain warders before the gates, that no man might go forth to give intelligence, caused the souldiers betwixt the first and tenth hour of the day, [from noon until four of the clock] to refresh themselves and take their sleep: that in the beginning of the dark night, they might assemble together at the watch-word or signal given them. And about the first watch he commanded to display their Ensigns and advance forward: and thus with a still march, he arrived at Hama by midnight: surprised the hold of the Campans, and entred all the gates at once, being negligently guarded, by reason of their overwatching. Some he killed lying along fast asleep: others, as they returned unarmed from the sacrifice. In this night-tumult there were slain more than two thousand, with Marinus Alfius himself their leader: and 43 Ensigns taken and carried away. Gracchus with the losse of fewer than one hundred of his souldiers, having won the camp, retired speedily to Cumes, for fear of Annibal, who lay in fort encamped upon Tifata over Capua. And (as he was a provident man and of great forecast) nothing was he deceived in his opinion. For so soon as this defeat was reported at Capua, Annibal (supposing that he should at Hama find the army of the Romans (consisting for the most part of raw souldiers, and those, bondslaves) jocund and lusty above measure, and insolent upon their fresh victory, busie in rifling their dead enemies thus conquered, driving away booties, and charged with pillage: removed his forces in haste, and marched apace beneath Capua: and encountered with some of the Campans that were fled, whom he caused between two guards to be conducted safe to Capua, and such as were hurt and wounded, to be set in waggons and carried thither. Himself found at Hama the camp empty and void of enemies, and nothing there but the tokens of a fresh massacre, and the dead bodies of his friends and allies lying here and there scattered. Some there were that advised him presently to advance forward to Cumes, and to assault the Town. And albeit Annibal was willing enough thereto, and passing desirous (seeing he could not come by Naples) to have Cumes at least, a maritime port-Town, as well as the other: yet because his souldiers had brought nothing with them but their weapons, as being led forth to march in such haste, he retired back again to his fort and camp upon Tifata. From whence, at the importunate prayers of the Campans, the day following he furnished himself with all the Ordinance and Ensigns need for the assault of a City, and returned toward Cumes: and having waited the territory thereof, he encamped himself a mile from the Town. Then Gracchus, more for shame, that he might not seem to leave his associates in such necessity, (who craved protection and recommended themselves to him, and to the people of Rome) than for any confidence and trust that he reposed in the strength of his army, stayed in Cumes. Neither Fabius the other Consul, who was encamped at Cales, durst set his army over the River Volturnus: as having been busied first at Rome in renewing the Auspices and bird-sights: and after that, troubled also about the fearful prodigious signs which were reported one after another. And when he sought expiation thereof by sacrifices, the Sooth-sayers made answer and said, That they could not perceive that the Gods were appeased and pacified for all that he did. Thus whiles Fabius upon these occasions was kept back, Sempronius was besieged, yea, and by this time assaulted, with fabrics and engines of battery. One mighty great Towre of wood there was erected against the Town. Against which, the Roman Consul raised another from the very wall somewhat higher than it: for that he used the wall (which of it self was of good height) in stead of a ground-work, and planted thereon strong posts and piles of timber to bear up the foresaid frame. From thence, at first the souldiers within, defended the Town and Walls with stones, with long poles and perches and other instruments to lance against the assailants. But at length seeing the other turret coming forward even close to the Town wall, they flung thereon at once much firework, and burning matter: at which fires the multitude of armed men for fear leapt headlong down the turret: and withal, they of the Town issued out at two gates at once, discomfited the guards of the enemies, and drave them into their camp: so as that day Annibal was more like one besieged himself, than laying siege unto others. There were of Carthaginians slain about fourteen hundred, forty wanting one were taken prisoners alive, such as about the walls and their Corps de guard stood careless and negligent, fearing nothing leise than a sally out of the Town, and were suddenly at unwares taken and surprised. Gracchus sounded the retreat, and caused his men to retire within the Walls, before the enemies after their suddain high could be rallied together. The morrow after, Annibal (supposing that the Consul in his ruff for this happy hand, would come into the field to fight a set battail) arranged himself in array between his Camp and Cumes. But after that, he saw no stirring at all from the usual guard and defence of the City, and nothing put to the rash hazard of doubtful hope, he retired to Tifata, without any good at all done.

At the very same time that the siege was raised before Cumes, Titus Sempronius surnamed Longus, fought fortunately in Lucania before Grumentum, with Hanno the Carthaginian: slew more than two thousand of his enemies, lost himself two hundred and eighty men, and went away with 41 ensigns. Hanno thus driven out of the confines of Lucania, retired himself back into the country of the Brutii: And M. Falerius the Pretor, recovered by force from the Hirpini.

pins, three Towns that had revolted from the Romans. Vercellius and Sicilius the movers and Captains of that Rebellion were cut shorter by the head. More than one thousand captives were sold at the spear in port-sale, to who that would bid most. All the pillage besides was given to the soldiers, and the army brought back to Cumes.

Whiles these things hapned in the Countreies of the Lucans and Thripins, those ships above-said (wherein were embarked the Embassadors of the Macedonians and Carthaginians as prisoners) having sea compass from the upper Adriatick Sea unto the nether Sea of Tuscan, round about (in a manner) all the Sea coast of Italy, hapned to sail along neer the City of Cumes: and being not certainly known whether they were friends or enemies, Gracchus put forth out of his fleet two Pinates to encounter them. When as by demanding and questioning one with another, it was once certified unto them, that the Consul was within Cumes, and the ships there arrived in the haven, the prisoners were brought to the presence of the Consul, and all the letters delivered. The Consul after he had read over the letters, both of Philip and Annibal, sealed them up again sure, and sent them by Land unto the Senat of Rome, but commanded the Embassadors themselves to be conducted thither by Sea. When as both letters, and also the Embassadors were arrived at Rome, in a manner, all in one day, and that (after due examination) words and writings agreed together in one: at the first the LL. of the Senat were pensive and plunged deeply into cares, considering in how great danger they stood of a new Macedonian war, who were hardly able to endure the Carthaginian. But in conclusion, so far were they off from being utterly dismayed hereat, and sinking under the water, that forthwith they began to treat and debate, how they might begin themselves to war with these enemies first, and to stop them from their entrance into Italy. The captive Embassadors they laid up fast in irons: their train and retinue were sold in open market: and besides the five and twenty ships, whereof Q. Fulvius Flaccus was Admiral, they took order for twenty more to be rigged and decked: which being provided, furnished and shot into the pool afloat, together with those five barks wherein the prisoners were conducted: there were 50 sail in all, that loosed from Ofsin and arrived at Tarentum. Quintus Fulvius had commission to embark the soldiers of Varro, who had been under the leading of L. Apustius the Lieutenant at Tarentum, with his fleet of fifty sail, not only to defend the Sea-coast of Italy, but also to hearken and have an eye after the Macedonian war: and in case he could learn, that the designment and intent of Philip was suitable to those letters and informations of the Embassadors, then he should by his letters certifie M. Valerius the Pretor so much, and that leaving with L. Apustius his Lieutenant the charge of the army, he should go to the Armado at Tarentum, and with all speed possible set over into Macedony, and there endeavour to keep Philip play at home within his own realm. As for that money which was sent unto Appius Claudius into Sicily for to be repayed unto King Hiero, it was appointed unto him, for the maintenance of his Armado, and managing of the Macedonian war. This money was by L. Apustius the Lieutenant brought to Tarentum, and with it, there were sent from Hiero * 200000 Modij of wheat, and 100000 of barley.

Whiles these preparations and doings passed at Rome, one ship of those prisoners which were sent to Rome, chanced to single it self from the other, and to escape away to Philip: whereby M he was advertised, that the Embassadors or Commissioners were taken, and the letters intercepted. But he not knowing what covenants had passed between Annibal and his legats, and what answer they should have brought unto him, sent forth another embassy with the same commission. The Embassadors sent unto Annibal, were Heracitus surnamed Scotinus, Cicero of Beveda, and Sesichemus of Magnesia. These went to and fro between in safety, these carried and recalled their errands fortunately. But the summer was come and gone, before the King could enter into action, or execute any enterprise. Of so great moment and importance was the boording of that one ship at the first with the Embassadors, for the deferring of that imminent war intended against the Romans.

When Fabius had passed over the River Vulturinus, after the expiation at length of the prodigious tokens aforesaid, both Consuls together made war about Capua. Fabius by assault won these Cities, Combulteria, Trebula, and Austicula, which had revolted unto the Carthaginians: and within them he surprised the garison soldiers of Annibal. Many of the Campans likewise were taken prisoners. At Nola (like as in the year before) the Senat held with the Romans, but the Commonalty took part with Annibal, and plotted secretly, how to murder the Nobility, and to betray the City. But to stop the proceedings of these mischievous designments, Fabius led his army between Capua, and the camp of Annibal upon the hill * Tifata, and fortified himself upon the mountain * Vesuvius, in that fort where Claudius had encamped before. From thence he sent M. Marcellus the Vice-Consul with those forces which he had, into Nola, there to lie in garison.

Likewise in Sardinia, T. Manlius the L. Deputy, began to administer those affairs, which had been forelet, by occasion that Q. Mutius the Pretor was fallen sick, and lay of a long and lingering disease. Manlius after he had drawn the Gallies ashore at Caraleis, and put the mariners and rowers in arms for Land-service, and received of the Pretor his army, was able to make 22000 foot, and 1200 horse. With this power of men of arms and footmen together, he entred into the enemies countrey, and not far from the camp of Hersicora, pitched his tents. Hersicora himself was by chance gone then, into the countrey of the Pellidians (a people of Sardinia) to

A arm the youth there, for the mending of his strength; and left his son named Hioftus, Ruler over the camp in the mean time. He a luty hot youth, rashly joynd battail, and quickly was difcomfited and put to flight: thirty thousand Sardinians in that field were flain, and upon 1030 taken prifoners alive. The reft of the army first fled ftragling afunder over the fields, and through the woods: but afterwards, hearing by the voyce that went, how their captain was fled to * Cornelio. the head City of that region, they retired thither alfo. And furely they had in that one battail, made an end of all war in Sardinia, but that the Armado of Carthage, under the leading of Asdrubal (which by tempeft had been caft upon the Baleare Iflands) came in time to entertain the Iflanders, in hope to rebel. Manlius, after it was noifed abroad, that the Carthaginian fleet was arrived, retired himfelf to Caraleis: which gave Herficora good opportunity and overture to joyn with Asdrubal. Who having landed his fouldiers, and lent the fhips back again unto Carthage, went forward by the guidance of Herficora, robbing and fpoiling the Lands of the Roman confederats: and had come as far as Caraleis, but that Manlius with an army encountred him upon the way, and reftained him from fo lavifh over-running and robbing the cuntry. At the first they encamped one againft the other not far afunder: afterwards, they began to put out certain bands and companies, and to maintain light skirmifhes with variable event, until at laft they pitched a fet field, and in full battail fought for the fpace of 4 hours. The Carthaginians held out conflict a good while, and the victory ftill remained doubtful (for the Sardinians were ever ufed to have the foil) but at laft, feeing every quarter full of the Sardinians either lying along dead, or running away, they alfo were difcomfited: and as they turned their backs and were about to flie, the Romans wheeled about with that wing, wherewith they had defeated the Sardinians, and enclosed them round, and fo they fell rather to killing than fighting any longer; 12000 enemies were there flain of Sardinians and Carthaginians together, about 3700 were taken prifoners, and 27 military enfigns won. This was a noble and famous battail, memorable efpecially above all, for taking of thefe prifoners: namely, Asdrubal the L. General, Hanno and Mago, two noble men of Carthage. Mago was of the Barchine houfe, neer of kin and in bloud to Annibal. Hanno was the follicitor of the Sardinians to rebellion, and no doubt, the principal Author of that war. Neither, was this field lefs famous for the overthrow of the chief commanders of the Sardinians: for both Hioftus the fon of Herficora was flain in fight: and alfo Herficora himfelf, as he fled with a few Horfemen, hearing befides other calamities and loffes, of the death of his fon, in the night feafon, becaufe he would have no man come between to fave his purpofed intent, killed himfelf. All the reft efaped to the City * Cornelio, as they had done afore, and there as in a place of refuge fought to fave themfelves. But Manlius following the train of his victory, came againft it, and within few dayes was mafter of it. After this, other Cities alfo which had revolted, and turned to Herficora and the Carthaginians, gave hostages, and yeelded by compofition. And when Manlius had levied of them certain money for the fouldiers pay and corn likewife, according to the power and ability or trespafs of each of them, he led his army back to Caraleis: and there having put the Gallies on the water, and embarked the fouldiers that he had brought with him, he failed to Rome, and recounted unto the LL. of the Senat the utter fubduing of Sardinia. The money he delivered to the Treafurers, the corn to the Ediles, and the prifoners unto Fulvius the Pretor.

Much about that time, T. Otacilius the Pretor, having failed from Lilybaum into Affrick, and wafted the territory of the Carthaginians, as he was bound from thence and fet fail for Sardinia, whither Asdrubal as the news went had lately croffed over from the Baleare Iflands, he met with the Armado returning back into Affrick: and after a skirmifh made upon the Sea by his fouldiers lightly armed, he took therewith seven Gallies with their oars and mariners: the reft for fear were fattered, as it had been with a tempeft, all over the Sea. And it hapned about the fame time, that Bomilcar with certain companies of fouldiers fent from Carthage for a fupply, and forty Elephants, and good ftore of victuals came to Locri. For the fuprizing and fetting upon him on a fudden, Ap. Claudius leading his army in haft, and marching to Meffara under a colour of vifiting the Province, put over to Locris with the tide. Now was Bomilcar paffed already from thence into the Brutians country to Hanno, and the men of Locris shut the gates againft the Romans. So Appius, after much ado and preparation, having effected nothing, returned back to Meffara. In the fame fummer, Marcellus made many rodes from Nola (which he held with a garrifon) into the Hirpins country, and the Samnits, about Caudium, and made fuch waft there, with fire and fword: that they in Samnium called into their fresh remembrance the old loffes and overthrows which they had received: whereupon there were fent immediately from both nations Embaffadors together, unto Annibal, who in this wife delivered their fpeech unto him. "We have been enemies, O Annibal to the people of Rome, firft of our own felves, and in our own quarrels, fo long as our armor & forces were able to defend us: but after that our hope therein began to fail us, we drew to a fide, and took part with King Pyrrhus. And when he forfook us once, we accepted of peace for very neceffary: wherein we continued for fifty years almoft, even until the time that you entred into Italy. Neither was it your prowess, vertue and fortune, rather than your fingular courtefy and benignity extended toward our country-men and fellow Citizens (whom being taken prifoners, you releafed and fent unto us back again) which hath caufed us to entertain your amity: in fo much, that fo long as you remain our friend, alive and fafe, we would not ftand in dread of the people of Rome, nor of the very Gods themfelves. “ it be lawful (so to say) were they never to anger against us. Howbeit assuredly, for this summer “ season, we have been divers and sundry times spoiled and wasted, not only whiles you are a“ live and safe, but also (which is more) present in place, where you might both hear, in manner, “ the wailing and weeping of our wives and children, and also see our houses on a light fire: So it “ seemeth it was M. Marcellus and not Annibal that had the victory at Canna. And the Romans “ boast and say, That you are good at the first push only, and when you have once let fly and lan“ ced the Javelin (as it were) out of your hands, you are clean done, and can abide no longer. We “ warred almost an hundred years with the people of Rome, without help either of foreign Cap“ tain, or army of strangers: save that for two years only, Pyrrhus with the aid of our souldiers, “ rather increased his own strength, than by any power of his defended us. But we list not to make “ vaunt and boast of fortunat success and brave victories, namely, how we subdued and put under “ the yoke two Consuls, and two consular armies: nor of other noble exploits which hapned to “ our joy and honor. And as for the crosses and adversities that befell us during that time, we may “ report them with lesse grief and indignation, than those that this day light upon us. Then in “ those dayes, mighty great Dictators with their Generals of Horsemen, two Consuls at once, “ with their two royal hosts, entred our territories, having sent out before hand their espials and “ scouts, and led forth their souldiers to make spoil, under their colours and ensigns, arranged in “ good order of battail, and seconded strongly behind. Now are we exposed as it were to be a “ prey of one only garrison, and that but a small one, left for the guard and defence of Nola. For, “ now they overrun all our confines and borders, not by bands and companies in warlike wise, but “ like Theeves and Robbers, more carelesly and negligently, than if they ranged about for their “ pleasure in the Roman territory. The only cause is this, because your self make no reckoning to “ protect us: and all our own youth (which if they were at home were able to defend us) serveth “ under your banner and standard. But I know neither you, nor your army at all: if I should not be “ perswaded and believe that he whom I wot well to have discomfited and put to flight so many “ Roman armies, were soon able to defeat and suppress these robbers that wander about our coun“ try, stragling without leaders, and without their colours disordredly whither they list, according “ to the vain hope of pillage that haleth them here and there, and, as every one gapeth for prizes, “ which they shall never get. No doubt but if you put forth a few of your Numidians, they will “ soon fall into their hands: Send but unto us a garrison to succour us, you shall quickly displace “ that other at Nola; in case you judge not us (whom you have thought worthy to be your con-“ federats) now, unworthy to be defended after you have received us into your protection. Here“ to Annibal made this answer again, and said; That the Hirpines and Samnites hudled up all at “ once together: they declared their calamities and losses, they craved aid and succour, and they “ made complaint that they were neither guarded by him, nor regarded of him. Whereas they “ should have first made declaration of their harms: after, sued for help: and last of all, if they “ might not obtain, then and not afore they should have complained, that they had besought his “ helping hand in vain. Howbeit he promised, that he would not bring his army into the territory, “ either of the Hirpines or the Samnites, lest himself also should be chargeable and troublesome unto “ them, but into the next quarters belonging to the allies of the Romans: by spoiling and wasting “ whereof, both he would fill his souldiers hands, and also with the terror thereof, set their ene“ mies far enough off from them. And as for the managing of the Roman war, like as the battel “ of Thrasymenus, was more noble than that of Trebia; and the field of Canna more memorable, “ than that of Thrasymenus: even so would he make the memorial of Canna dim and obscure, in “ regard of one greater victory yet, and more renowned than the other. With this answer, and “ with honourable rewards besides, he dismissed the Embassadors, and gave them their dispatch.
“ And leaving a small guard to keep the Hill Tifara, he marched in person with the rest of his ar“ my against Nola. Thither also was Hanno come, out of the country of the Brutii, with the sup“ ply that he brought from Carthage, and the Elephants. Where, after Annibal had pitched his “ Tents not far from the Town, and made diligent enquiry, he found, that the case was far other“ wise, than it was reported by the Embassadors of his associates. For Marcellus bare not him“ self in any of his actions: so as it might be truly said, that he blindly committed ought to the haz“ ard of fortune, or rashly adventured upon the enemy. For he never went a plundering without “ his scouts and espials, without setting strong guards in due places, whereunto he might retire “ himself in safety: but had a good eye afore him, and a wary regard and heedful forecast, as if he “ were to encounter with Annibal in person. And even then at that time, when he perceived, “ that the enemy approached and was coming, he kept his forces within the City: commanding “ the Senators of Nola, to walk up and down upon the walls, and to survey all over, and espie “ what the enemies did, or were about. Amongst whom, it hapned, that Hanno being come under “ the very wall, espied Herennius Bassus, and Herius Peirius, whom he called out to a parle. And “ when they were gone forth unto him by the permission & leave of Marcellus, thus he spake unto “ them by his interpreter. First, he highly extolled the vertue and fortune of Annibal, debasing and “ treading under foot the dignity and Majesty of the people of Rome, growing now old in time, and “ decaying in force and strength. “ Which if they were (quoth he) on both sides equal, as some“ times they were, yet seeing they had good experience, how heavy and grievous the government “ of the Romans was to all their Allies, and again, how indulgent & gracious Annibal is, even to all “ the captives of the Italian nation and name, they should wish rather to be in league & amity with

A "the Carthaginians, than with the Romans. If both Coss. were with their armies at Nola, they "were no more able to match with Annibal, than they were at Canna: much less might one Pra"tor with a few raw and new souldiers hold out and keep Nola against him. And as for the No-
 "lans themselves, it concerned them much more than it did Annibal, to consider, whether he "should win Nola by force, or enter upon it by surrender and composition. For to be Lord thereof
 "he made no doubt, like as he was Master already of Capua and Nuceria: but what odds and diffe"rence there is between the state of Capua and of Nuceria, the Nolans know best themselves, who "are seated as it were in the mid way between both. Loath he was to prognosticate so much un"to Nola, what calamities might befall the City, if it were conquered by assault: rather yet would B "he give his word and promise, That if they would deliver Marcellus with his garrison, and yield "up Nola into Annibal's hand, they should themselves, and none but they set down and capit-
 "late under what conditions they would entertain alliance & friendship with Annibal. To this motion Herennius Bassus framed his answer in this sort. "For many years already there hath been "continuall amity between the people of Rome and Nola, and neither of both to this day hath "repented thereof. As for the Nolans themselves, if they had been disposed to turn with the wind, "and to change their faith and allegiance, together with their fortune, they would have done it
 "long before this: for now it was too late to start & alter. If they had minded to yield themselves
 "unto Annibal, they would never have sent for a garrison of Romans: but since they were now "come to protect and defend them, they had imparted & communicated all their state with them C "already, and would take such part as they, so long as they had an hour to live. This emparl put Annibal clean besides all hope of gaining Nola by treason. Therefore he beleaguered the town on every side, and invested it round about like a garland, to the end, that in one instant he might give the assault on every part of the walls. When Marcellus saw him under the walls he set his people first in battel array within the gate, and then with a great noise and tumult he suddenly sallied out.
 At their first shock and onset divers of the enemies were beaten down and slain: but after that, they ran from all parts to battel, and were come together with equal forces, the fight began to be hot and sharp, and a memorable conflict it had been and few like it, but that it rained and poured down so fast, and with so many storms and tempests, that it parted both the battels, and staid the fight. So for that day, having with that smal skirmish kindled their courages, and set their blood in D heat, they retired back, the Romans within the City, and the Carthaginians to their Camp. Howbeit, of the Carthaginians there were slain, upon the first sally and charge given, not above thirty, and of the Romans not one man. This tempestuous shower of rain lasted all night long, and continued still, and never gave over untill nine of the clock before noon the next day. And therefore, albeit they were sharp set, and their fingers itched on both sides to be a fighting, yet for that day they kept within their hold and strength. So the third day Annibal sent out certain companies into the territory about Nola, for to forrage and fetch in booties: which, so soon as Marcellus understood, he presently set his men in array, and entered the field, neither was Annibal for his part behind. Now there was a mile distance, or very near between the City and the enemies Camp. In this space between (for all about Nola is plain and champian) they encountred and joyned battel.
 E The shout that they set up on both sides, reclaimed and caused to return unto the fight already begun the nearest of those cohorts and bands which were gone a forraging into the country. The men of Nola likewise came unto the Romans, and merded their battel: whom Marcellus commended for their forwardness, and gave them in charge to abide in the reeward, to help as occasion served, and to carry forth of the skirmish those that were hurt and wounded, and to forbear fight in any case, unless they had a signall and token given them by him. The fight was doubtfull, for both the Generals gave encouragement effectually, and also the souldiers did their best, and fought right manfully. Marcellus was earnest with his men to press hard and charge still upon their enemies, whom they had defeated not three daies ago, who not many daies past were put to flight, and driven from Cumes, and who the year before were beaten from Nola under his conduct, by other souldiers, saying, "That they were not all there in the field, but many of them gone F "ranging abroad in the country, for to hale booties, and get prizes. As for them that fought, they "were such as were decayed with rioting and following their delights in Capua, such as with "wine-bibbing in every tavern, whore-hunting in every Stews and Brothel-house, all the whole "winter, were become enfeebled in body, spent and wasted utterly. As for that lively strength and "vigour of theirs, it was clean gone: those able and lusty bodies were detaired, those couragi-
 "ous hearts abated, wherewith they passed over the Pyrenean mountains, and the high cliffs of "the Alps. There remained now nothing but the reliques and shadow of those men to fight, who "are scarce able to bear their very armour, to lift up their arms, and carry their own bodies.
 "Adding withall, that Capua was another Canna unto Annibal: there died his warlike prowess, G "there, lost he his military discipline: there was the glorious fame of former daies buried, there "the hope of future time for ever suppressed and stifled. As Marcellus by reproving these and such like things in his enemies, animated his own souldiers: so Annibal rebuked his men with more sharp words and bitter checks. "I know these to be (quoth he) the same arms and weapons,
 "the very same ensigns and standards which I saw and had at Trebia, at Thrasymenus, and late "of all at Canna. But surely, me thinks, when I went to Capua there to winter, I carried with me "thicker, other manner of souldiers than I have brought again from thence. Have ye indeed so "much ado to maintain fight with a Roman Lieutenant, Leader of one only Legion and cornet:

souldiers.

"whom heretofore two full Consular armies were never able to abide in the field? Shall Marcellus with young and raw souldiers of his own, seconded only with the aid of the Nolans, challenge and bid us battle the second time? Where is that souldier of mine that unhorsed C. Flaminius the Consul, and stroke off his head? What is become of him that at Canna slew L. Paulus? What? is the edge of the sword dull, and the point blunt? Or are your right hands asleep and benumbed? Or what strange and wonderfull accident is befallen you? Ye that were wont, being few in number, to vanquish many, are ye now, being many in number, hardly able to withstand and abide the violence of a few? Ye spake big, and gave out great brags and proud words, that if any man would lead you, you would win Rome, that you would. Behold, now, a smaller piece of service. Here I would have you prove your strength, and make trial of your valour. Let us see now, win me Nola, a City situate in the Champian, on a plain, defended neither with sea nor river. O out of this so wealthy a City, will I be ready to lead you, laden with rich pillage and spoil, whither soever ye will, or follow you, wheresoever ye would have me. But nothing availed either his chearfull words, or his checking rebukes, to encourage and confirm their hearts. For the Carthaginians being forced on every side to retreat, (whiles the Romans grew more and more animated, not only through the comfortable speeches of their own Captains, but also the Nolans themselves, who with their loud shouting in token of their love and affection, enkindled their courages to hot fight) turned their backs, and were driven into their hold. And when the Romans were desirous to assail the same, Marcellus reconducted them to Nola, with great joy and congratulation even of the Commons there, who before, were more inclined and affected to the Carthaginians. There were of the enemies slain that day above one thousand, sixteen hundred were taken prisoners, nineteen military ensigns won, two Elephants gotten alive, and foure slain in the conflict. Of Romans there were not killed all out one thousand. The morrow after they spent (upon a truce concluded) in burying the dead that were slain on both sides. Of the spoils of the enemies Marcellus made a great swe. upon a vow pronounced unto Vulcan. On the third day, 1272 horsemen of Numidians and Spaniards, one with another (upon some spleen and anger I believe, or else for hope of more liberall entertainment and commodious gain) fled from Annibal and turned to Marcellus: whose valiant and faithfull service stood the Romans in very good stead oftentimes during that war. And after the war was ended, the Spaniards in Spain, and the Numidians in Affrick, in reward of their vertue and prowess, were endued with fair lands and large possessions. Annibal sent Hanno back from Nola to the Brutii, together with the forces that he came with: himself went to the wintring harbours of Apulia, and lodged about Arpi.

Quintus Fabius so soon as he heard that Annibal had taken his way into Apulia, conveyed all the corn from Nola and Naples into his Camp, which he had pitched above Suessula: and having well fortified the hold, and left there a sufficient garrison to guard the place for that winter time, removed himself nearer to Capua, and there encamped: and so wasted the Campan Territory with fire and sword, that the Campanians little trusting in their own forces, were constrained to issue forth of their gates, and fortifie themselves in Camp before the City, in the open plain. Six thousand they were in all. Their footmen were weak and not for service: their horsemen were far better and more able: so that oftentimes they charged their enemies with their horse, and provoked them to fight. Among many brave men of arms that the Campanians had, one Jubellus, surnamed Taurca, a Citizen of Capua, was the worthiest and best horseman of them all, by many degrees: insomuch, as when he served under the Romans, Claudius Asellus only, a Citizen of Rome, was able to match him in glory of good horsemanship and horse service. This Taurca when he had ridden all about the troops of his enemies, casting his eye every way to see if he could espie Claudius Asellus, enquired at length closely, after silence made, where about he was, and made this challenge unto him, That seeing he was wont in words to contend with him for valour and prowess, he should now determine the question by the spear-point and dint of sword, and either be de spoiled of his glorious armour, if he were overcome, or else gain the same with the victory. Which defiance being brought into the Camp to Asellus his ears, he made no more to do, but went presently to the Consul, to know whether he might with his good leave and licence, out of his rank fight extraordinarily with his enemy that bad him combat. After leave obtained, he armed himself immediately, mounted on horseback, and rode before the enemies corps de guard, oftentimes calling upon Taurca by name, and bidding him come forth to encounter whensoever he durst. Now were the Romans by this time gone forth of the Camp in great number to behold this combat: the men of Capua likewise filled not only the rampier of their hold but also the walls of the City to see this fight. When as they had made some goodly flourish afore hand with brave swords and stout speeches, to set out the actions they set spear in rest, and put spurs to horse, and jostled together again. Afterwards, having gotten the liberty of the ground they dallied one with another, trifling out the time, and making along peece of work of it, without giving or taking wound. Then quoth the Campan Knight to the Roman, This will be but a fight of horses, and not of horsemen, unless we ride out of the open plain ground here into this hollow way, where having no such scope to prick out at large, we shall soon come to hand grips, and close together. The word was not so soon spoken, but Claudius turned his horse head, and rode into the foresaid way. But Taurca a stouter champion

A champion in word than deed: Oh, take heed of all things (quoth he) how you ride a gelding in a ditch: Which grew afterwards to a by-word, used among the country people. Claudius after he had rode in and out, up and down, a long time in the lane, and never met with his enemy, returned again into the open plain: and rating the cowardice of his enemy, with great joy and gratulation, rode back as conqueror into the Camp. Some Annals and Chronicles do record and add to this combat of horsemen, a strange and wonderful thing (no doubt) if it be true, as by the common opinion it is reputed no less; namely, that when Tullius fled back into the City, Claudius followed him and after him in chase, entered with him at one gate standing open, and rode out clear at the other without, to the great wonder and astonishment of the enemies. Upon this, the standing Camps were quiet on both sides: and the City removed backward farther off from the City, that the men of Capua might sow their grounds: neither did he any harm unto their fields, before the corn was come up and so well grown, that the blade thereof yielded good forrage and food for the horses, which he gathered and brought into the standing Camp and hold. Claudius above Suessula, and there he built winter harbors for to make his abode. And he gave order to M. Claudius the Vice-Consul to keep still at Nepes a competent garrison for defence of the City; and to discharge the rest of the souldiers, and send them to Rome, that they should neither be cumbersome to their Allies, nor chargeable to the Common-weal. Tib. Gracchus also whiles he led his Legions from Comes into Apulia to Luceria, sent M. Valerius the Prætor from thence to Brundisium, with that army which he had at Luceria, commanding him to keep the sea-coast of the Salentine Country, and to provide for all things necessary against Philip and the Macedonian war.

In the end of this summer, wherein these acts were achieved, whereof I have written, there came a packet of Letters from R. and Cornel. Scipio, importing how great and how fortunate exploits they had performed in Spain: but there wanted money for pay: and apparell and corn to serve both souldiers and mariners. And albeit all these things were away, yet as concerning money, if the City Chamber and common Treasure were not stored, they would make some shift to raise it of the Spaniards: but for all the rest, needs it must be sent from Rome, for otherwise neither could they keep the Army together, nor hold the Province in their allegiance. When the letters were read there was no man there but acknowledged that they wrote a truth, and demanded that which was reasonable. But they considered withall, what great armies both on land and at sea they maintained: and what a mighty Armada they must prepare and set out atiew, in case the Macedonian war went forward. As for Sicily and Sardinia, which before the wars began, paid tribute, were scarce able to find and keep the garrisons, that lay there for the guard of the Provinces: and that they were to trust upon their own revenues and tribute for the maintenance of the charge they were at. But as the number of them that paid rent and conferred tribute, was greatly diminished by so great overthrowes of the armies, both at the pool Thrasymenus, and also at Canusio, so those few that remained if they were burdened with many exactions and payments, should be plagued and undone another way, therefore it was concluded, that unless the Common-weal maintained not herself by her credit and borrowing money, she were not able to be sustained by her own wealth and riches. So it was agreed, That Fulvius the Prætor must needs assemble all the people together, and lay abroad and declare unto them the necessity and exigent that the Common-weal was driven unto, and to exhort all them that had enriched themselves and increased their livings, by renting and taking to farm the revenues and commodities of the City, should now do good to the Commonweal for a time, by which they were grown to that wealth, and undertake the provision at a price, and furnish the army in Spain, with all necessities thereto belonging, to be contented and paid therefore with the first, out of the common Chest, when it were stored with money. Thus the Prætor made declaration of these matters in the open assembly of the people, and withall determined and set down a certain day, whereupon he minded to put forth the souldiers, liveries and apparell, and corn to be provided for the Spanish Army, and all things else requisite for the mariners. When the day was come, there presented themselves unto him three companies of nineteen men, for to take this bargain. Who made two requests and demands, the one, that for that three years next ensuing, there should be no other Publicans or farmers of the City: the other, that whatsoever they shipped, the Common-weal would make good against all force of enemy, or violence of tempest. Both being granted, they took upon them the matter, and so the Common-weal was served by the money of private persons. This was the demeanor, this was the loving affection to their country, that went through all degrees of men (as it were) after one sort and manner. And like as they undertook with great courage to serve the army, so with singular fidelity they performed every thing, in such sort, as there was nothing at all wanting, no more than if they had been maintained from a rich treasury, as in cities past. At what time as this provision came, the town of Iliturgi was assailed by Asdrubal, Mago, and Amilcar the son of Bomilcar, because it revolted unto the Ro-

or Anduar el rio.

Amidst these three severall Camps of the enemies, the two Scipios passed into the City of their Allies, that made resistance against, and with great loss of men; and brought corn with them, whereof there was great want: and after they had encouraged and exhorted the townsmen, that with the same resolution they would defend the walls as they had seen the Roman army to fight for them and in their quarrell: they led forth their power to give an assault upon the greatest Camp, whereof Asdrubal was the General. Thither also repaired the two Captains and two Armies of the Carthaginians: when they saw that the whole trial of the matter was there to be determined, and so they issued out of their tents and fought. Threescore thousand enemies were that day in field, and above 16000 Romans: and yet the victory went to clear with the Romans, that they slew more of their enemies than they were in number themselves; took prisoners more than three thousand men, and not many under a thousand horses; and withall won 60 military ensigns wanting one, and killed five Elephants in the battell: and to conclude, were Lords that day of three Camps. After that the siege was raised from Illucurgi, the Carthaginian armies were led to the assault of the town Incubili, having their companies made up and supplied again out of the Province, (as being a nation of all others most desirous and eager of war, so there be hope of pillage or good recompence) and at that time especially full of young and lusty men. Where there was a second field fought with like sort of both sides as before. There were slain above thirteen thousand enemies, and more than 3000 taken prisoners, besides two and forty military ensigns, and nine Elephants. Then in a manner all the Cities of Spain revolted to the Romans. And far greater exploits were that summer performed in Spain, than in Italy.

The four and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the four and twentieth Book.

Herome, King of the Syracusians (whose grandfather Hiero had been a friend unto the people of Rome) revolted unto the Carthaginians, and for his cruelty and pride, was by his own people murdered. Titus Sempronius Gracchus the Praeconsul, had a fortunate battell near Beneventum, against the Carthaginians and Hanno their General, through the help especially of the bondslaves, whom for their good service, he commanded to be made free. Claudius Marcellus the Consul laid siege upon Syracuse in Sicily, which wholly in manner was taken away and turned to the Carthaginians. War was proclaimed against Philip, King of the Macedonians, who in a night-skirmish was surprised, discomfited, and put to flight: and with his army well near disarmed, escaped into Macedonia. To manage that war, Valerius the Praetor was sent. This book containeth also the acts achieved in Spain by P. and Cn. Scipios against the Carthaginians. Syphax King of the Numidians, having entered into amity with the Romans, fought against Masanissa King of the Massilians: who stood for the Carthaginians, and being overcome, passed over into Spain with a most mighty army unto Scipio, lying over against Gades, where the narrow sea runneth between Affrick and Spain. The Celtiberians also were received into friendship, whose aids the Romans sent for: and this was the first time that mercenary soldiers were waged and served in the Roman wars.

The four and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Hanno was not so soon returned out of Campane, into the country of the Brutii, but by their help and guidance he solicited to rebellion the Greek Cities, which continued the more willing in league and alliance with the Romans, because they saw that the Brutii, whom they both hated and feared, sided with the Carthaginians. And first he assailed and went in hand with Rhegium, where he spent certain daies to little or no purpose. In this mean time, the Inhabitants of Locri were busie in carrying away with great haste the corn, wood and fewel, and all things else, necessary for the use of man, out of the country into the City: because they would leave nothing for the enemy to prey upon. And daily more and more of them went out of the gates by heaps, so as at last there was no more left in the City, than those that were compelled to repair the breaches of the walls and the gates, and to bring into the turrets and bulwarks store of darts and other shot. Against this multitude and confused mixture of all ages, sexes, and degrees, ranging over the fields, whereof most were altogether unarmed, Amilcar the Carthaginian sent out his Cavalry, giving them direction, and charging them to hurt no person. These horsemen opposed their troops between them and home, only to exclude them out of the City, when they were scattered one from another in flight. The General himself in person encamped on a high ground, from whence he might view the country and the City. And gave commandment to a cohort of the Brutii to approach the walls to call forth the principall Citizens of Locri to parley, and by making promise of Annibal his friendship, to perswade and exhort them to yield up the town. At the first they gave no credit at all unto the Brutii: whatsoever they said: But afterwards, when they discovered Hanno and the Carthaginians upon the hills, and heard by some few

A few of their own Citizens that were fled back & escaped, how all the rest of the multitude were fallen within danger of the enemies, they made answer, that they would confer and consult thereupon with the body of the people. So immediately they were assembled together. The most light headed persons were desirous of a change and new alliance: they also, whose kinsfolk and friends were by the enemy intercepted and kept out of the City, had their minds engaged and bound sure enough, as if they had put in hostages: and some few who were well affected inwardly in heart, & liked of constancy and true loyalty, yet durst not be known thereof, and shew themselves to stand to it: so as, they all agreed in outward appearance, to surrender themselves to the Carthaginians. And after they had closely conveyed into the haven, and embarked L. Atilius the Captain of the Garrison, and all the Roman souldiers that served under him to the end, that they might be transported to Rhegium, they received Amilcar and the Carthaginians into the City, with this condition, that presently there should be concluded a league upon equall and indifferent covenants and capitulations between them. But the promise in this behalf (when they had once yielded themselves) was nothing well performed: whiles Amilcar charged the Locrians, with fraudulent dismissing and letting go the Romans: and they again alleaged for their excuse, that they fled away, and made an escape. The horsemen also followed hard in chase by land, if haply either the tide might cause the ships to stay in the current within the straight, or drive them a land. But those whom they pursued, they could not overtake: marry, other ships they espied, crossing the streights from Massana to Rhegium. Roman souldiers they were sent from Claudius the Prætor, to lie in garrison there, and to keep the town. Whereupon they presently departed from Rhegium.

As for the Citizens of Locri, they had peace granted them by express order and direction from Annibal upon these conditions: Imprimis, That they might live free under their own laws: Item, That both the City and the haven should remain still in the hands of the Locrians. The substance of the covenant rested and was established upon these terms. That the Carthaginians and Locrians should aid and assist one another mutually, both in peace and war. So the Carthaginians retired from the streights, notwithstanding the muttering and murmuring of the Bruttii, because they had left Rhegium and Locri untouched, which two Cities they made full account to have sacked and rifled. And therefore they of themselves having levied and put in arms a power of fifteen thousand of their own youth, marched forward to assail Croton, a Grecian City likewise, and seated upon the sea. Assuring themselves, much to better their estate, if they could be possessed of a port and sea-town, fenced with strong wals and Bulwarks. This only troubled and perplexed their minds, that they durst not, but send unto the Carthaginians for aid: fearing, lest they might seem to have entred into action and war, without regard of the common good of their confederates, if they called them not: and doubting besides, that if the General of the Carthaginians should prove again, rather an arbitrator of peace, than a coadjutor in war, they should fight in vain against the liberty of Croton, as they had done before against the City of Locri. Whereupon they thought best to send Embassadors unto Annibal for his warrant, and to be secured from him, that if Croton were recovered by the Brutians, it should be subject unto them. Annibal made answer, that this matter required consultation of men present with them in place, and therefore he put them over to Hanno, from whom they received no certain answer to trust unto. For willing they were not, that a noble and rich City, as it was, should be spoiled: and besides, they were in good hope, that in case the Brutians should assail it, and the Carthaginians all the while not seen, either to allow or help them in their enterprize, the Citizens would the more willingly revolt unto them. The Inhabitants within Croton were not of one mind, and affected alike. For there was one malady that had infected all the Cities of Italy, namely, the dissention between the Commons and the Nobles. The Senators inclined to the Romans, the Commoners on the other side took part with the Carthaginians. This division within the City, the Bruttii were by a fugitive runaway advertised of, in these terms: namely, that Arifomachus, the ring-leader and head of the Commons, minded to betray the City: that it was a wide, vaste, and desolate town taking a great circuit of ground: and all the walls being decayed and in sundry places broken down, the Senators and the Commons kept their severall guards and watches in sundry quarters far asunder. And look (quoth he) where the Commons ward, there ye may enter at your pleasure. Upon this intelligence and direction given by the fugitive, the Bruttii environed the City round about: and being let in by the Commons at the first assault were masters of all places, saving the Castle. The Nobles held that piece foreseeing what might happen, and therefore provided themselves of a sure refuge. Thither fled Arifomachus also, pretending that he meant to deliver the City to the Carthaginians, and not to the Bruttii. Now this City Croton had a wall (before Pyrrhus coming into Italy) twelve miles in compass: but after it was laid waste by that war, scarce the one half of the town was inhabited. The river that was wont to run through the midst of the town passed now along the wals without those streets where the houses stood thick and well peopled, far from the parts inhabited.

Six miles without the town there stood a noble Temple of Lacinia Juno, more renowned than the City it self, as being honoured with great religion and devotion of all the Cities and nations thereabout. A sacred grove there was in that place compassed with a thick wood, of tall fir trees, having in the midst within it divers pleasant and fruitful pastures, wherein were fed beasts consecrated unto the goddess, of all sorts, without any keeper and pastor. And albeit the cattell went forth in the morning by herds and flocks of their own kind, severed by themselves, yet at night they used to return back again to their own pens and stalls, without harm received either by the wait, laying of wild and ravenous beasts, or by deceitfull fraud of men. Great encrease therefore and much commodity accrued by those cattel, inasmuch as thereof was made a masse Column or pillar of beaten gold, and consecrated in that place, so as the Temple was famous, as well for riches, as holiness and devotion. And many times it falleth out, that to such notable places there are attributed some strange miracles. For the report goeth, that there standeth an altar in the very porch of the Temple, the ashes lying whereupon, no wind was ever known to blow away.

But to return to Croton. The Castle thereof on the one side standeth upon the sea, on the other side it bendeth and looketh toward the land. Defended in times past it was only by the naturall situation of the ground, but afterwards fortified also with a wall; on that part whereas Dionysius the Tyrant of Sicily, having gained the back rocks and cliffs behind, by craft and guile sometime won it. This Castle at that time supposed to be strong and safe enough, the Nobles seized and kept, notwithstanding the Bruttii and their own Commons besieged them. At length the Bruttii seeing the Castle impregnable, by all the forces and assaults that they could make of themselves, were driven of necessity to crave aid of Hanno. Who having assaied to draw and urge the Crotonians to yield, upon these conditions, To suffer a Colony of the Bruttii thither to be brought, and there planted: and that thereby a City lying so waste and desolate, might be replenished and peopled again, as in ancient time: could not move and perswade any one of them all, but Aristomachus. For all besides, protested and said, they would die before they would be intermingled with the Bruttii, to change their own rites and manner of life, their customes, their laws, and within a while their language also for others that were strange and forraign. Aristomachus alone, seeing that he could not prevail neither by perswasions to induce them to yield, nor find any means to betray the Castle like as he had done the town before, fled away to Hanno. Shortly after, certain Embassadors from Locri, by the licence and permission of Hanno, entred the Castle, and perswaded them to be content for to be translated to Locri, rather than to abide and stand out the extremity: saying, that they had sent Embassadors already to that intent unto Annibal, and had got a grant at his hands, that they might so do. So they abandoned Croton, and the Crotonians were brought down to the sea side and embarked, and the whole multitude departed to Locri.

In Apulia, the very winter season was not quiet between the Romans and Annibal. Sempronius the Consul wintred at Luceria, and Annibal not far from him in Arpi: and as they could spy opportunity, or take their vantage, of the one side or the other, there passed some light skirmishes between them. But the Romans had alwaies the better, and every day more than other, became more wary and secured from all trains and deceitfull snares of the enemy.

In Sicily the Romans found a great change, and all out of order, by reason that King Hiero was dead, and the Crown translated to his Nephew, or sons son, Hieronymus: being yet a child, not like to use his own liberty with moderation, and much less to sway the Kingdom and Scepter with discretion. His guardians and friends gladly entertained the protection and government of such a nature, and were ready enough to plunge him headlong into all vice and wickedness. Which King Hiero foreseeing, was willing (by report) in his latter daies, to have left Syracusa free and at liberty, to the end that so noble a kingdom, acquired and established by good means, should not under the Lordly dominion of a child to the great obloquy and shame of the world, be ruinate and come to nought. But his daughters with tooth and nail crossed this his designment, and made full reckoning, that the child should only bear the name of a King, but the government of the whole State should wholly rest in them and their husbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus: who were the principall guardians, left to oversee the young Prince. And an easie matter it was not, for an aged man, now four score years old and ten, so hardly laid at day and night, by the fair speeches, and feminine flatteries of his daughters, to keep his mind free, and to apply and convert it to intend private regards, and the publike consideration of the State. And therefore he left fifteen tutors to oversee and govern the child, whom he besought upon his death-bed, even when he was going out of this world, to maintain entire and unspotted, the faithfull allegiance to the Romans, which he had kept and observed inviolate for the space of fifty years: and to let to their helping hand willingly, to direct the young Prince above all, to tread in his steps, and to follow that discipline wherein he had been nurtured and taught. After he had given this charge, and yielded up his breath, the guardians came abroad, brought forth the Kings last will and testament, and shewed the young Prince in the open assembly of the people (and well near fifteen years of age he was.) Where some few, such as were bestowed here of purpose within the press of the assembly for to shout and shew testimony of their joy and good liking, approved with open voice, and allowed the Kings will: whereas all the rest fared as Orphans in a City bereaved of their King, and (as it were) become fatherless, and feared all things that might ensue. The King was interred and his funerals solemnized, with the love and kind affection of his people and subjects, more than with any studious care and diligence of his own friends that were nearest to him. After this, Andronodorus removed from about the Prince all other guardians but himself, giving out oftentimes that Hieronymus was past a child, and able to govern of himself as King. Thus by depositing the Protectorship, which was common to him and many others, he took upon him and usurped the power and authority of them all. Hard it was even for a right good King and well governed, that should succeed after Hiero, to find favour and win grace among the Syracusans: so heartily they affected and loved King Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had been willing and desirous, that by his vicious and wicked life, they should have a great miss of his grandfather, and wish again for him: at the very first sight, when he shewed himself abroad in open place,

A place, declared unto the world, what difference and great odds there was. For they who so many years together had never seen Hiero, nor his son Calo, either in habit of apparel, or in any other ornaments and port, differing from all other Citizens, now beheld him in his purple robes, with his regall Crown and Diadem, attended with his guard and train of armed penitents: yea, and otherwhile, after the manner of Denis the Tyrant riding forth of his Court and Palace, in a Chariot drawn with four white steeds. This proud pomp and stately array was accompanied and suited with semblable qualities and conditions. He contemned and despised all men: he scorned most proudly to give audience to humble suppliants: and sent them away with reproachful terms and taunts. And not only strangers, but also his very guardians hardly might have access unto him: and to conclude, his lusts and delights whereunto he gave himself, were new and strange: his cruelty that he exercised outrageous and inhumane. So dread and terrible was he to all, that some of his Tutors, either by making themselves away, or by voluntary exile were driven to prevent and avoid the danger of cruell torments. Of whom three on'y, who alone had more familiar recourse into the Court, to wit, Andromodorus and Zellus, the sons in law of King Hiero, that had married his daughters, and one Thraso, had little or no care given unto them in other matters; but whilst two of them drew toward the Carthaginians, and Thraso to the Roman alliance: with their arguing, debaring, and dispute, they otherwhile turned the mind of the young King to hearken and give audience to their opinions. Now it hapned that there was a conspiracy intended against the life and person of the Tyrant, and the same detected by one Calo, the companion and playfellow of Hieronimus, and of the same age: one who ever from his childhood had been familiarly acquainted with him, and inward to all his secrets. This revealer of the conspiracy, could appeach and nominate all the conspirators, only Theodorus, by whom himself was made privy to the treason, and solicited to be a complice therein. The party was apprehended incontinently, and delivered unto Andromodorus to be tortured; Who at the first without delay, confessed himself to be guilty, but concealed all the rest that were accessaries. At the last, when he had been torn, mangled, and dismembred, with most dolorous torments, and intolerable for any man to endure: pretending and making semblance that he could abide no longer pains: disclosed not for all this the guilty persons indeed, but accused the innocent, and laid falsely, that Thraso was the first deviser of the whole plot: and unless they had born themselves, and relied upon so mighty an head, to set them on work, they would never have attempted so dangerous an enterprize. He appeached also some other of the Tyrant his guard and household servants and dailly waiters: even such as came into his mind during the time of his dolours and paines, and whom amidst his groans he imagined to be such, as whose lives might be best spared, and deaths least lamented. The naming of Thraso especially made the Tyrant to beleieve, that the detection sounded to be a very truth indeed: whereupon the man was immediately led to execution and put to death; and the other innocents, as clear as himself, tasted of the same cup, and suffered with him for company. As for the conspirators themselves, albeit one of their fellows was a long while put to bitter and extream torture, there was not one of them that either hid his head or made an escape: so assured confidence had they in the resolute constancy and faithfull promise of Theodorus: and such power and strength had Theodorus himself to keep close the secrets committed unto him. Now when Thraso was once dispatched out of the way, who only was the means to hold them in and to bind them to their alliance and alleagance to the Romans: then forthwith they began openly to incline to rebellion, and sent as Embassadors for the same purpose, two noble young Gentlemen, Hippocrates and Epicides unto Annibal; From whom also they were sent back again in Embassage. These were both born at Carthage, but descended in blood from the Syracusians by their grandfather, that was from thence banished: and were themselves by the mothers side meer Carthaginians. By intercourse of these two Embassadors, a League was concluded between Annibal and the Tyrant of Syracuse. And Annibal was content that they should abide still as Leigers in the Tyrants Court.

When Appius Claudius the Prætor and Lord Deputy of the Province of Sicily heard these news, he addressed straight waies Embassadors unto Hieronimus: who saying, that they were come to renew the alliance which they had with his grandfather, had scornful audience given them to deliver their message, and were dismissed and sent away by Hieronimus with a scump, demanding of them by way of a scoff, "How they had sped at the battel of Canna. For I can hardly beleieve" (quoth he) "that all is true which the Embassadors report of that field: and I would gladly know the certain truth & thereupon deliberate and take counsel, which side I were best to take. The Roman Embassadors said, they would repair again unto him when he could begin once to give audience with gravity and in good earnest to their embassage: and so after they had warned & admonished, rather than prayed and entreated him, nor to change, but to stand to the first covenant and promises, they departed. Then Hieronimus sent his Legates to Carthage, for to confirm the League with the Carthaginians, according to the alliance and amity made with Annibal. In which it was capitulate and covenanted, that when they had expelled the Romans out of Sicily (which would shortly come to pass, in case they sent thither ships and a power of men) the river Himera, which (as it were) divided the Island in the midst, should confine and limit, both the Syracusan kingdom and the dominion of the Carthaginians. After this, being puffed up with the fair flattering speeches of such as were about him, who suggested unto him, to remember and call to mind that not only King Hiero was his grandfather, but also King Pirrhus by the mothers side: he sent Embassadors unto the Carthaginians, to give them from him to understand, That he deemed med it right and meet, that all Sicily wholly should lie unto his dominion: and that the Empire of Italy only, belonged properly to the Carthaginian people to acquire and conquer. This levity and vain glorious humour they neither wondered at, as a stranger thing in a giddy-brained young man; nor yet greatly blamed and found fault with, so long as they might estrange him wholly and alienate him altogether from the friendship of the Romans. But all things in him turned to his overthrow and utter confusion. For whiles Hippocrates and Epicides were sent alone with two thousand souldiers, for to sound and solicit the Cities rebellion, that were held by the garrisons of the Romans: and himself in person entred the country of the Leontins, with all the rest of the forces, which amounted to fifteen thousand foot and horse together: certain conspirators, who chanced all to be his own souldiers, and bare arms under him, possessed themselves of a wake house, standing over a narrow lane, through which the King was wont to go down into the market place of the City: there when other stood armed and well appointed, and waiting when the King should pass by, one of the conspirators (whose name was Indigemines) had given him in charge, because he was one of the squires of the Kings body, when the King approached near unto the door of the said house, to find some occasion or other, in that straight passage, to stay the troop and train that followed behind. And so he effected indeed, and put in execution, as it was agreed and contrived. For Indigemines, lift up his foot, making as though he would loose and slack a straight knot of his sho-latchet, which hindring his going, whereby he staid the company that followed after, so long, that the King passing by alone without his guard of armed men about him, was assaulted mean while, and recieved sundry stabs and wounds, before they could come to rescue and save him. Hereupon arose an outcry and tumult, and divers of the guard let flie at Indigemines, who by this time was ready to oppose himself and to award all venues: howbeit he was hurt only in two places, and so escaped. The guard seeing the King there lying dead, fled away as they could. The murderers, some of them betook themselves into the market-place unto the multitude, that rejoiced for the recovery of their freedom: others repaired to Syracuse, to intercept and prevent the designments of Andronodorus, and other favourits and followers of the late King.

Whiles things flood in these uncertain and doubtful terms, Appius Claudius foreseeing war like to ensue, and that very shortly, addressed his letters unto the Senat of Rome, certifying them that Sicily enclined already, and was at hand to side with the people of Cartage and with Annibal. Himself in the mean time bent all his forces toward the frontiers of the Province and confines of that Kingdom, to withstand and hinder all the proceedings and enterprises of the Syracusians.

In the end of that year, Q. Fabius, by order from the Senate, fortified Puteoli, a town of merchandise, and which in time of wars began to be much resorted unto and frequented, and there he placed a garrison. From whence as he was in his journey toward Rome against the grand Election of Magistrates, he proclaimed the solemn assembly of the people for that purpose to be the next Comitiall day that followed upon his arrivall thither: and so it fell out, that he went along the City side immediatly upon his journey, and came down into Mars field before he entred the City. Upon which day, when it hapned that the Century of the younger sort was drawn out by lot, and had the prerogative, and by their voices nominated T. Otacilius, and M. Emilius Regillus for Consuls, then Q. Fabius after silence made, rose up, and delivered this or such like speech. "If either we had peace in Italy, or war at leastwise with those enemies, with whom if we dealt neither negligently or unadvisedly, the matter were not much, nor importing great hazard and danger: I would think, that whosoever disturbed and crossed your favours and free affections which ye bring hither with you into this solemn place of assembly, to bestow honours and dignities upon whom ye please had but small and no regard of your liberty and freedom. But since that in this war and with this enemy, never any General of ours faulterd in the managing of his affairs, but it cost us dear, and we had some great foil and overthrow: it behoveth you, that with what mind and carefull regard ye enter the field to combat in your armour, in the same ye should come hither into this Mars field in your gowns, and so proceed by your suffrages to elect your Consuls: and that every one of you should thus say to himself, I am to nominate a Consul to match with General Annibal. No longer since, than this very year, when as before Copua, Jubellius Taurca, the bravest horseman and Cavalier of all the Campans defied the Romans, and challenged them to fight man to man, Asellus Claudius, the noblest Knight of all the Romans, and best man at arms, was chosen to encounter him. In times past, against a Gaul that offered combat upon the bridge over Anio, our ancestors sent our Manlius, a courageous, resolute, and puissant Champion. Neither can I deny, but upon such another occasion, not many years after, the like trust was reposed in M. Valerius, who took arms likewise against another Gaul that challenged single fight. And even as we are desirous, & wish to have our foot and horiemen both, more valorous and hardy than our enemies, or if that will not be, at leastwise equall unto them, and able to countermatch them: even so let us be carefull to find out a General of our own comparable every way to the chief commander of our enemies. And when we have chosen the best warrior and Captain in the whole City, then presently without any longer delay, being elect and created for one whole year, he shall be sent to match with an old captain, that hath ever continued in the field, one who is not enclosed within compals of time, nor restrained & gaged within the straight bounds of law, but that he may order & manage every thing, according as the occasions and present occurrences of war do require: whereas, by that time

of Q. Fabius to the people of Rome.

A^c that we can make all ready and dispose every thing in order, and set in hand to begin our affairs, the year is come about and cleane gone. Now forasmuch as enough hath been said, what manner of Consuls ye ought to create: It remaineth to speak somewhat of them, whom the prerogative Century so highly favoureth, and is so much affected unto. As for M. Emilius Regillus, he is the Flamin of Quirinus, whom neither we may take from his ministry of Sacrifice, nor yet retain and keep him still, but we that neglect either the service of the gods, or the due care and regard of the wars. Octavius hath married my sisters daughter, and hath fair issue by her. But your favours and good turns shewed both to me, and also to my ancestors, are not of so small account and reckoning, but that I ought to prefer the Common-weal before all private regards and alliances whatsoever. Every mariner, yea, and any passenger is able to steer and rule a Ship in a calm water: but when a blustering tempest is up, and the vessel tossed in a troubled surging sea, and carried away with violent force of the winds, then there had need to be a man indeed, and a skilfull Pilot to sit at the stern, and to guide the helm. We sail not now in a still and quiet sea: but we have been drenched, and in a manner drowned, with some storms already: and therefore we ought to have exceeding great care and be well advised atorehand, whom we have to be the steers-man. In a matter of less consequence and importance, we have made triall, O T. Octavius, of your knowledge and service: and you have not given us yet so good proof of your vertue and prowess therein, that we should put you in trust with the managing of greater affairs. A Navy whereof you were Admiral, we rigged and trimmed to your hands this year for three causes: first, to annoy and spoil the sea-coast of Affrick: secondly to defend and keep to our behoof the ports and havens of Italy: last of all, and above all, to impeach and stay all supplies and new succours, together with money, munition, and victuall, for being transported unto Annibal from Carthage. If Octavius have performed, I say not all these things, but in any one quit himself well, to the good and benefit of the State, Elect him Consul hardly, and good leave have you. But if it appear, that while you had the rule of the Armada, all things (that a man would have) passed out of the country unto Annibal, with as great safety and security, as if the seas had been open and void of enemies: If, I say, the sea-coast of Italy hath all this year been more in danger, and subject to sustain harm, than that of Affrick: what reason can you alledge, wherefore the people of Rome should choose you above all others, to oppose as Captain, to confront their enemy Annibal. If you were Consul in place already, we would judge it requisite and good to nominate and create a Dictator, according to the example of our forefathers: neither could you take stuff or be offended, that there should be found in the City of Rome a better warrior, and more sufficient than your self. And surely it concerneth no man more than you, O Octavius, to see that there be not imposed a burden upon your shoulders, under which you should fall and fall down right. Wherefore I advise and exhort you all, as much as possibly I can, in electing of Consuls this day, to carry that mind, and use that careful providence, as ye would, in case ye were standing armed in battel array: and to choose out of hand two Generall Captains under whose conduct and government ye should presently fight a field: and make choice of such Consuls, unto whom our children were to take the oath of allegiance: at whose commandment, they should come and assemble together, and under whose whole charge and protection they might willingly serve as souldiers. The pool Thrasymenus, the plain before Cannae, are heavy examples for us to remember: but yet they serve for good precedents unto us, to teach us how to avoid the like mischief another time. So the prerogative Century of the younger and puny sort, was called again to a new scrutiny, and to give their voices again. Whereat when T. Octavius began to cry out aloud and say very stoutly, that Fabius his drift was to continue Consul still, and therewith grew to be clamorous and troublesome to the assembly: the Consul commanded the Lictors to go unto him, and to lay hold upon him. And forasmuch as yet he had not entred into the City, but came down straightwaies into the Mars field presently from his journey, he put them in mind, that the knitches of the rods together with the axes within them should be born before him. And in the mean time the prerogative Century began afresh to give their voices: and by it were nominated Consuls Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Marcellus the third time: and all the Centuries besides without any jarring and variance elected the very same. One of the former Prætors likewise was chosen again, namely Q. Fulvius Flaccus. And other new created, that is to say, T. Octavius Crassus the second time, Q. Fabius the Consul his son, who at that time was Ædile of the chair and P. Cornelius Lentulus. After the Election of the Prætors was ended and finished, there passed an Act and decree of the Senate that Q. Fulvius should extraordinarily have the charge of the City, and be Prætor there: and that he above all other, when the Consuls were gone forth to the wars should be President and Governour of the City of Rome. There fell great rain and much snow that year, whereby the Tiber overflowed the fields, overthrew many houses, and overwhelmed much cattel and people, so as they utterly perished.

Thus in the fifth year of the second Punic war, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time, when they entred their Consulship, set the City on thinking and musing of them more than usually had been known. For in many years there had not been the like couple of Consuls. And old men would talk and say, that even so were Max. Rullus and P. Decius declared Consuls against the Gauls war: and after them likewise, Papirius and Carvilius against the Samnites and Brutii: against the people also of Lucania and Tarentum. Marcellus cellus was created Consul in his absence, whilst he was with the Army abroad, and Fabius being himself present and president of the Election, was ordained to continue still in his Consulship. The occasion of the time, the necessity and occurrence of the wars, and the perill and hazard of the whole State were such, as no man looked nearly into the example and precedent to find fault with all, nor had the Consul in any jealousie of ambition and desire of rule: but rather every man commended his noble and haughty mind, who seeing that the Common-wealth stood in need of an excellent Captain, and knowing himself without all question to be the man, made less reckoning and account of the envy and ill will of men, that thereby haply might accrue, than of the good and profit of the Common-wealth. The same day that the Consuls began their office, they assembled the Senators in the Capitoll: and the first thing they did, was a decree, that the Consuls should either cast lots, or agree together between themselves, whether of them two should assemble the people for the election of Censors, before he set forward to the army. After this, all they had their authority prolonged and continued still, who were employed abroad with the forces: and their commissions were renewed and sealed again, for to abide in the government of their Provinces: to wit, T. Gracchus at Luceria, where he abode with the army of the Voluntaries: C. Terentius Varro in the Picene country: M. Pomponius in the Province of Gaul (on this side the Alps.) It was enacted also, that of the Prætors of the former year, Q. Minus as Vice-Prætor should govern Sardinia: that M. Valerius at Brundisium should course the river, look to the sea-coasts, and have an eye to all the attempts and enterprises of Philip King of the Macedonians: P. Corn. Scipio the new Prætor, was appointed to rule the Province of Sicily: and T. Octavius to be admiral of the same Navy, which the year before he had the charge of against the Carthaginians.

Many prodigious and strange signs were reported that year and so much the more as they were believed to be true of the simple and superstitious sort of people. Namely that within the hap-pel of Sabaz a Juno in Lanuvium, the Ravens builded their nests. In Apulia a green palm tree was on a light fire. At Mantua a pool maintained by the overflowing of the river Adriaticus, appeared red with blood. At Caeser it rained chalk, and at Rome in the beasts market it rained blond. In a village, called Istria, a spring under the ground, brake out and yielded such abundance of water, that it over-turned, tumbled up and down and carried away (as it had been the stream of a river) divers vessels as pipes, tin barrels and cerces that were in the place. The open and publicke hall within the Capitoll, the Temple of Vulcan in Mars field, a nut-tree in the Sabin country: the high street, the wall, and a gate at Capitol, were all blasted with lightning and fire from heaven. And by this time, other miraculous and monstrous signs were commonly blown abroad, to wit, that the spear of Mars in Prænest, of its own accord stirred and moved forward: that an ox was heard speak in Sicily: that the Infant within the mothers womb, in the Marrucian country was heard to cry, Io Triumphe, at Spole, a woman turned to be a man. At Hercules there appeared an Altar in the skie, and apparitions or shews of men discovered about the same, arrayed in white. At Rome also within the City was seen now the second time, a swarm of Bees in the very market-place: a thing wondrous at, because it was rare and seldom known. Some there were also, that avouched, how they descried armed Legions on the hill Janiculum: Whereupon the City rose up in arms and when they were come into the Janicle, they said plainly, that there were none there appeared but the ordinary inhabitants of the hill. These prodigious signs by direction from the Aruspices, [i.e. the Soothsayers] were expiate, and the gods pacified with greater sacrifices: and a solemn procession and supplication was proclaimed unto all the gods that were shrined at Rome, and had their chappels there.

After all complements performed, that belonged to the pacification of the gods, the Consuls proposed unto the Senat concerning State-matters, and especially about the managing of the wars, Namely what forces should be prepared, what numbers of souldiers levied, and where they should be bestowed severally. And agreed it was That there should be eighteen Legions employed in the wars, Whereof the Consuls were to take unto them two apiece: the Provinces likewise of Gaul, Sicily, and Sardinia should be guarded each of them with other twain. Q. Fabius the Lord Deputy of Apulia, was to have two Legions under his hand, to command the Province: and T. Gracchus other two of voluntaries to keep the country about Luceria: and C. Terentius the Pro-Consul to have the charge of one in the Picene country: and M. Valerius another, for the Navy about Brundisium: and last of all, twain were left behind for the guard and defence of the City of Rome. For to make out this full number of Legions, six of necessity were to be levied new. And the Consuls were appointed with all convenient speed to enroll them: and likewise to provide an Armada that year of 150 Gallies, together with those ships which ride in the river along the coasts of Calabria for the defence of that Country. When the muster was done, and the new ships haled and shot into sea, Q. Fabius assembled the Centuries for the election of Censors: wherein were created, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus.

The rumour still encreased, that Sicily was out, and up in arms. Whereupon T. Octavius was commanded to go thither with his fleet. And because there wanted sailers and mariners the Consuls, by verue of a decree of the Senat published an Edict. That as many as in the time of L. Aemilius, and C. Flaminius Censors, either themselves or their fathers were assessed in the Subsidy book, from 50000 As, unto 100000 in goods, or who afterwards grew to that worth should find one mariner, and six months pay. Item, That whosoever were rated above 100000 unto 300000 should

A should be charged with three mariners, and one years pay. Item, That whosoever were valued in the Censors book between 300000 and 1000000 should allow five mariners. Item, That those above that proportion should set out seven. And every Senat should provide eight mariners, and furnish them with a whole years pay. According to this Edict, the mariners were set out well armed and appointed by their Masters, and having with them aforehand meat dressed and sodden to serve them thirty daies, they were embarked. This is the first time that ever the Roman Navy was furnished with sailers and mariners, at the proper charges of private Citizens.

This extraordinary preparation more than usuall, terrified the Campanians most of all other, for fear lest the Romans would begin war that year, with laying siege to Capua. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors unto Annibal, requesting him to come nearer unto Capua with his forces. For why? at Rome there were new armies levied, for to assaile that City: and the Romans were not discontented more with the revolt of any than of them. And forasmuch as this message was delivered in such haste and fear, Annibal thinking it good to make speed, left the Romans prevented him, dislodged and removed from Arpi, and encamped upon Tifolia over Capua, in the fort, where he kept of old. Then, leaving the Numidians and Spaniards behind him both to guard the Camp, and also to defend Capua, he went down with the rest of his army to the Lake Avernus, pretending in shew there to sacrifice, but in very deed to lound and sollicit Puteoli and the garrison there for to rebell. Maximus was no sooner advertized, that Annibal was departed from Arpi, and in his return to Campania; but he journeyed night and day, and never staid, untill he was come again, and repaired to his army. And withall, he gave order and direction unto T. Gracchus, to remove with his power from Luceria, and to draw near to Beneventum: likewise unto Q. Fabius the Prætor, (who was the Consul his son) to supply the room of Gracchus at Luceria. At the same time the two Prætors took their journey, and went into Sicily, P. Cornelius to the army there on land, and Octavius to keep the sea-coast, and to be admiral of the Navy: and the rest spred them every one into their severall Provinces. They also who had their authority and government continued, ruled the same countries that they did before.

Whiles Annibal abode at the Lake Avernus, there came unto him from Tarentum, five noble young Gentlemen (Roman associates) which had been taken prisoners, some at the pool Thrasymenus, others at Canna, whom he had sent home in the same manner of curtesie, as he had shewed ever to all the Allies of the Romans. These Gentlemen, in remembrance of his favours and benefits, made report unto him, "That they had perswaded and induced a great part of the youth of Tarentum, to entertain rather the amity and alliance of Annibal, than of the people of Rome: "and for this intent they were sent Embassadors from them, to request in their name, that it "might please him to come nearer with his forces to Tarentum. For say they, if they might but "once see from out of Tarentum his standard and ensigns, and himself near encamped, the City "would without delay be surrendered up into his hands. For the younger people had the commons at their beck and commandment, and the commons ruled the whole state of Tarentum "at their pleasure. Annibal after he had commended and thanked them, and withall loaden them with many fair and great promises, willed them to return home, to hasten and set forward, and effect these intended designments, saying, that he would be there in good and convenient time. With these hopes the Tarentines took their leave, and departed. Annibal himself was wonderfully desirous to be Master of Tarentum. He saw it was a noble City and a wealthy, seated also by the sea-side, and a very commodious Port, looking and lying toward Macedonia: and well he wist that King Philp (if he should pass over into Italy, seeing the Romans were possessed of Brundisium) would arrive at this haven. When he had performed the Sacrifice for which he thither came, and (whiles he made his abode there) foraged all the Territory of Cumes, even as far as the Cape of the Promontory Misenum: suddenly he turned his army and marched to Puteoli, for to surprise and give a camifado to the fort and garrison there. There were six thousand of them within the town: and the place not only by naturall situation strong, but also surely fortified by industry of man. Annibal having staid there three daies, and assailed the fort and the garrison on every side, seeing he could not prevail nor effect any thing, went forward from thence, and proceeded to the walling of the Territory of Naples, upon anger, rather than any hope of gaining the City. The Commons of Nola, who long time were discontented with the Romans, and at deadly feud with their own Senators: upon his coming into the territory and confines so near unto them, began to rise in a commotion. Whereupon there came Embassadors unto Annibal, requiring him to advance to Nola, upon assured promise, that the town should be delivered into his hands. But Marcellus, who was sent unto by the Nobles, prevented this their plot and designment: and in one day he reached to Suessula from Cales, notwithstanding he made some stay to ferry over the river Vulturnus. And to the next night he sent into Nola 6000 footmen, and 300 horse, for to aid and defend the Senat. And like as the Consul bestirred himself with all speed and diligence, to make Nola sure to him aforehand, so Annibal contrariwise temporized, being not so ready now to credit the Nolans: as having twice before given the like attempt, and to no purpose in the end, and therefore he trifled out the time, and made small haste.

At the same time also, Q. Fabius the Consul came against Casertum, which was kept by the garrison of the Carthaginians, to see if he could surprise it. And to Beneventum at one time (as if they had been so agreed) came on the one side, Hannibal from the Bruttii, with a great power of foot and horse; and on another side, Gracchus from Luceria: who entered the town first. From whence so soon soon as he heard that Hanno lay encamped within three miles of the City, by the river Calores, and there waited the Country, he himself issued, and pitched his tents within a mile of the enemy: where he assembled all his souldiers together, purposing to make a speech unto them. He had with him the Legions that consisted most of voluntaries, who already two years before, had been more willing to deserve their freedom in silent manner, than to challenge and demand it with open mouth. Howbeit, he perceived when he departed out of the winter harbors, that they began to murmur and grumble in the army when they marched: and to complain in this wise. What? shall we never serve in the quality and condition of freemen? Whereupon he had written unto the Senat, and shewed unto them not so much what they desired, as what they deserved to have: certifying them, that unto that day they had done him good and valiant service: and wanted nothing save only their freedom, but they might go for true and lawful souldiers. Whereupon the Lords of the Senat had put it unto his discretion for to do by them what he thought was expedient for the Common-weal. Thereupon, before that he should join battell with the enemy, he pronounced these words before them all, and said: "That now the time was come, of obtaining and acquiring that liberty, which so long they hoped after. For the next morrow they were to affront their enemies with banner displayed, and to fight in a plain and open ground, where without fear of any ambush the triall might be made with meer force and true valour: Whosoever therefore can bring me the head of an enemy, him my pleasure & will is, to make free immediately; and who so loseth ground and retreateth, him will I chastise as a bondslave ought to be punished. Now every man hath his state and condition lying in his own hands: and of your freedom, not only myself will assure you, but for further warrant ye have the allowance of M. Marcellus the Cos, and generally of all the LL. of the Council, whole advice I sought, and who committed unto my hands the ordering of your liberty. And withall he read the Consuls letters, and the decree of the Senat in that behalf. Whereat they set up a mighty cry, in token of their assent and approbation, and called for battell, and earnestly urged to give the signal out of hand. Then Gracchus having pronounced the next day for battell, dismissed the assembly. The souldiers were joyous, especially such as were to have their freedom in reward of one daies service, and bestowed the rest of that day in making their armor and weapons ready. The morrow after, so soon as the trumpets began to sound: they were the first of all other that presented themselves before the General his pavilion, well appointed and ready to fight: and by the sun rising Gracchus led forth his men into the field in order of battell. The enemies for their parts were nothing behind, but forward to encounter them. They were in number seventeen thousand of footmen, most of them Brutii and Lucans: of horsemen, twelve hundred: among whom there were very few Italians, the rest were in manner all Numidians and Moors. The fight was sharp, and continued long, and for four hours it was not seen which side had the better. No one thing else troubled the Romans more, than their enemies heads, which were the prizes to redeem the souldiers liberty. For as any had killed their enemies lustily, they were fain first, with much ado, to cut off their heads, within the troublesome press and tumult, and so to lose time: and after that, by reason that their right hands were employed and occupied with holding the same heads, it fell out, that the best souldiers gave over fighting, and the feeble dastards and fearfull cowards only were to maintain the conflict. Which when the Marshalls of the field and Colonels reported unto Gracchus, and namely, that there was not a souldier of the enemies standing that was wounded and hurt any more: but they that lay along were hacked and hewed as it were by butchers: and that his own souldiers instead of swords, held their enemies heads in their hands: he commanded in all haste, that upon a signal given, they should fling away their heads from them, and charge afresh upon the enemies. For their valour and prowess (saith he) was well enough seen already, and evidently testified, and so long as they were so hardy men, and bare themselves so manfully, they should not need to doubt of their liberty. Then the conflict began to be renewed and withall, the horsemen charged the enemies: whom the Numidians received with equall valour: inso much as the fight of the Cavalry was as bravely performed, as the other of the Infantry: whereupon once again the victory seemed doubtful, to which part it would encline: whiles in both hosts the Generals reproached and debated the adverse part. Gracchus said that the Brutii and Lucans were so often vanquished and subdued by the Roman ancestors: and Hanno again girded at the Romans, calling them bondslaves, and souldiers let loose out of prison and houses of correction. At the last, Gracchus declared aloud, and said, They were not to hope at all for their liberty, unless that day their enemies were discomfited and put to flight. This one word of his at length set their blood in such an heat, that they raised a fresh shout, & as if they had been cast again in a new mould, they charged upon the enemies, so violently, that they could no longer be resisted and withstood. First, they that fought in the vanguard of the Carthaginians were put out of order: then they about their standards and ensignes: and last of all, the whole battell was driven back and gave ground. Whereupon they fairly turned their backs, and fled so fast one upon another into their Camp, in such fear and fright, that not so much as at the very gates, nor upon the rampier, they staid once, and turned again to make head: so as the Romans following them hard at the heels into their camp as it were in one train pell-mell made a new skirmish even within the rampier of their enemies. Where the fight was not so lumberome, by reason of the straightness of the room wherein they were pent, but the massacre and execution was as cruell and bloody. The prisoners also that were among the enemies, in this confused conflict and tumult joyhed themselves and stuck close together: and having caught up some weapons, helped

A helped forward the victory: and either charging upon the backs of the Carthaginians slew them, or else hindred them in their flight and running away. So of that great army, there were not all out two thousand (and the most part of them horsemen) that escaped with the Generall himself: all the rest were either slain or taken prisoners: and of military ensignes were carried away forty save twain. Of the Victors, there died fast upon two thousand. All the spoil, but only the prisoners, was granted to the souldiers. The cattell also was reserved, as many as within thirty daies the right owners could justly make claim unto for their own. When they were returned laden with booties and pillage into the Camp there were almost 4000 of the voluntary souldiers, who had fought but faintly, and brake not into the Camp with the rest: who for fear of punishment seized B a little hill not far from the Camp, and kept it for their hold. But the morrow after, being set from thence by the Colonels, they repaired again to the camp, at what time as Gracchus had summoned his souldiers to an assembly. Where, after that the Pro-Consul first had rewarded his old souldiers with military gifts, according to each one his prowels and good service in that battell: then as concerning the voluntaries, he said thus much, That he had rather they were all commended by him, good and bad, one with another, than that one of them that day should taste of any punishment: and therefore he pronounced them all free in the name of God, to the benefit, happiness, and felicity, both of Common-weal, and also of themselves. At which word, they lifted up their voices aloud with exceeding cheerfulness and alacrity: and one while they clipped and embraced one another in their arms, with gratulation and great joy: another while again, they held their C hands toward heaven, wishing and praying at the gods hands, all good blessing for the people of Rome, and for Gracchus especially. "Then (quoth Gracchus) Before that I had made you all alike, and to have equall part in the right and priviledge of freedom, I would not let upon any of you, either the mark of a stout and hardy souldier, or the note of a faint-hearted and beastly coward. But now that I have discharged my self of the trust committed unto me by the Common-weal, to the end, that all difference between prowels & cowardise, should not be forgotten altogether and perishe; I will take expresse order, that the names of them, whose conscience accused them of faint fighting, and avoiding the hazard of battell, and therefore ere while withdrew themselves apart, be brought unto me. And when they are cited and called forth every one by his name, I will compell them to take a corporall oath (quoth he) that unless it be upon sickness, so
 D long as they shall continue in souldiery, they neither eat nor drink but standing upon their feet. And this punishment (I am sure) you will willingly take in good part: when ye shall consider better of it, and see that you could not have had an easier note of disgrace and shame, for your false hearts and slender service. Then he gave the signall to truss up bag and baggage, and sounded the remove, and so dislodged: and thus the souldiers carrying and driving before them their booties, all the way disporting themselves so merily and jocund, returned to Beneventum: as if they had come from some great dinner, upon a solemn and festival day, and not from fighting a bloody battell. All the people of Beneventum came forth in great numbers to meet them at the gates, welcomed the souldiers, bad them joy, embraced them, and invited them to their houses, to give them entertainment and lodging. The boords were spread in every mans court-yard, and furnished E with store of viands: they willed them to come and make merry with them, and requested Gracchus to give his souldiers leave to feast and make good chear. And Gracchus was content, but upon this condition, that they should all eat their meals abroad in the open street. Then all things were brought forth, and set upon the tables at every mans door. The voluntaries took their repast and refection either with their caps on their heads, or else covered their crown with white wooll, some sitting, some standing: waiting and serving one another at the table, and eat their meat, and fed with them together. This was such a worthy sight and solemnity, that Gracchus after he was returned to Rome, caused the representation and resemblance of the celebration of this day, to be drawn and portraied in colours, and the picture to remain in the Temple of the goddess Liberty, which his father caused to build in the mount Aventine, of certain fines and forfeits, and F afterwards there dedicated it.

Whiles these matters thus passed at Beneventum, Annibal having spoiled and harried the territory about Naples, removed toward Nola, and there encamped before the town. Whom when the Consul understood to be coming, he sent for Pomponius the Pro-Prætor, together with that army which lay encamped above above Suessula, and provided to meet with the enemy, minding presently to bid him battell. He sent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his horsemen in the dead time of the night at a back gate, that was farthest from the enemy, giving him in charge to cast about closely, and fetch a compass, and fair and softly to follow the enemy, as he marched: and when he perceived the battell was begun, then to come forward, and set upon him behind on his back. But whether it were that Nero missed of the way, or having not time enough, could G not put this policy in execution, I know not. In his absence the armies joyned battell, wherein (no doubt) the Romans had the better hand. Howbeit, for default that the horsemen were not there in due time, the order of the direction failed, and took not effect. And notwithstanding that the enemies gave ground and retreated, yet Marcellus durst not follow hot upon them, but sounded the retreat to his own men, being in a good way of victory. Yet were there by report above 2000 of the enemies slain that day, but of Romans under 400. And about the sun set, Nero who all the day and night past, had tired horse and man, and done no good, and now returned, without so much as a sight of the enemy, was sharply rebuked of the Consul, in so much, that he gave him this check to choke him, That it was long of him and none else, that they had not cried quittance with the enemy, for the overthrow & loss received at Canna. The day following Marcellus came down again into the field, ready to give battel. But Annibal, as one that secretly confessed himself to be overcome, held himself close within the strength of his Camp: And on the third day, giving over all hope to get Nola, (an enterprize that never sped well) he departed in the still time of the night toward Tarentum, upon a better and more assured hope to gain it by treason.

The civill affairs at Rome were managed with no less courage at home, than the wars in the field abroad. For the Censors, who by reason that the City treasure waxed low, were eased of their care of setting out the publike works of the City by the great: and having nothing else to do, employed themselves in reformation of mens manners and chastising of vices and enormities, which sprung upon war: like as mens bodies, which by long and lingering sickness grown weak, ever and anon breed new diseases. And first they convented before them those Citizens, who after the battel at Canna, were (by report) minded and disposed to leave the Common-weal, and to depart out of Italy. The ring-leader of them all was L. Cecilius Metellus, who hapned then to be Treasurer of the City. He, with the rest of that crew, who were culpable in the same crime, were commanded to make their answer, and plead their causes: but when they were not able to clear and quit themselves, the Censors charged them openly, that they had given out certain words, and made speeches against the State, tending to a sedition and conspiracy, for to abandon Italy. Next after them were cited to appear those cunning and crafty companions aforesaid, who with their over-subtill interpretation and construing of words, would seem to avoid their oath: those captives, I mean, who being on their way to Rome, came back secretly into the Camp of Annibal, and took themselves freed and discharged, because they had sworn to return again. But these and the others aforesaid, as many as served upon the City horses, had their horses taken from them, were displaced out of their Tribe, and condemned all to lose their voices, and to serve without City pay. Neither were the Censors carefull to correct the Senat, and reform the degree of the Knights only, but also they proceeded to rase out of the publike checkroll of the younger Citizens, the names of all those, who for four years space had not served in wars, as many, I say of them, as could not justly plead and alledge, either ordinary immunity by law, or sickness for their excuse. And of these were found guilty above 2000: who were awarded to be Ærarii, and all of them to be removed out of their tribe. And besides this shamefull disgrace and note of ignominy awarded by the Censors, there passed a heavy decree of the Senat against them, to wit, That all they whom the Censors had thus scored and noted, should be bound to serve on foot in the wars, and be confined and sent over into Sicily, to the residue there of the army that remained at Canna. And no other time of service and warfare was limited unto this sort of the souldiers, but untill the enemy were driven clean out of Italy.

Whiles the Censors, as is aforesaid, upon occasion that the Cities stock was so decayed, gave over and forbore to bargain for the repairing and maintenance of the Churches and holy Temples, and for the finding and provision of chariot horses for the State, and such like: there resorted unto them a great number of those that were wont at the spear to take these bargains at their hands by the great, and for a gross sum of money: who exhorted the Censors to deal in those matters still, and to set, let, and enter into bargain with them, as if the City Chamber wanted no money: making this offer that none of them all would demand payment out of the common Chest, before the wars were fully ended.

Then repaired unto the Censors the Masters of those bondmen, whom T. Sempronius had manumitted and let free at Beneventum, saying, that they were sent by the Triumvirs, out of the office of the Bankers, called Mensarii, for to receive again their monies, according as they prized and valued their slaves: howbeit, they would not, before the war was finished. And as the hearts of the Commons were thus favourably affected, to sustain and support the poverty of the treasure-house: so the stocks of money also that belonged first to Orphans, and afterwards to widows, began now to be bestowed in the Chamber of the City: and they that presented and brought in those moneys, beleaved assuredly, that they could not lay them up more sure and safe, than in the publike credit and security of the City. And whatsoever out of these stocks was disbursed and defraied, for to buy and provide any thing for the Orphans or widows aforesaid, the treasurers kept a book thereof, and noted it down in a register. This kindness and benevolence of private persons unto their country, extended it self from the City, even as far as to the Camp: insomuch, that neither horseman nor Centurion would take their wages, but rebuke and rate them, that could find in their hearts to receive their pay, terming them no better than mercenaries and hirelings.

Now Q. Fabius the Consul lay in Camp before Caplinum, which City was kept with a garrison of two thousand Campans, and seven hundred of Annibal's souldiers. They had for their Captain and Commander, one Statius Metius, sent thither by Cn. Magius Arretianus: who for that year was Mediftricus of Capua. He put the bondslaves and Commons in arms, intermingled one with another, for to enter upon the Camp of the Romans, whiles the Consul was busie in assaulting Caplinum. Fabius was nothing ignorant of all these things, and therefore he sent unto Nola to his Colleague there, signifying unto him, that there was need of a second army to make head against the Campans, whiles the other was employed about the assault of Caplinum: and telling him besides, that either he must himself come in person, leaving a mean garrison behind him at Nola: or else if he might not be spared from thence, for fear of danger from

Annibal,

* The head Magistrat, is Lord Maior.

A Annibal, he would send for T. Gracchus the Pro-Consul, from Beneventum. Upon this message, Marcellus having left in Nola a guard of two thousand souldiers, with the rest of his forces, presented himself before Caslinum: upon whose coming, the Campans who were ready to set forward, staid themselves and were quiet. So both Consuls together jointly began to assault Caslinum: where the Roman souldiers that rashly came under the walls received much hurt: and Fabius seeing little good done, judged it best to surcease and give over the enterprise, being a service of small consequence, and nevertheless very dangerous: and to depart from thence, seeing there was business toward of greater importance. But Marcellus contrariwise was of opinion and said, that as there were many things which great warriors were not to attempt: so if they were once
B taken in hand, and the adventure given, they were not lightly to be given over and laid aside: forasmuch as in it lay matter of great consequence, for fame and reputation, both waies: and so he prevailed, that the enterprise was not neglected and abandoned. Whereupon, there were mantlers, and all other kinds of fabricks and engines of battery and assault, bent against the City: so as the Campans besought Fabius, that they might depart to Capua in safety. And when some few were gone forth, Marcellus possessed himself of that gate whereout they went: & then they fell to kill and slay one with another, first about the gate: and after they had rushed once in, they put to like execution those also within the City. Fifty there were or thereabout of the Campans that first got out of the town, and fled for mercy to Fabius: and they by his guard and safe conduct arrived at Capua. But see Caslinum, through the lingring slacknets of the Inhabitants that craved
C protection, was (by advantage taken of their long parley, and temporizing) won by the enemies. The captives, so many as were either Campans, or Annibal his souldiers, were sent to Rome, and there clapt up fast in prisons. But the multitude of the townsmen were distributed into sundry Cities adjoining, and there kept in ward.

At the very same time that the Consuls after their conquest, retired from Caslinum, Gracchus being in the country of the Lucans, and having gathered and enrolled certain cohorts and companies of souldiers out of those parts, sent them out a foraging, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies, into the territories of the enemies. Hanno encountered them as they stragled in scattering wife out of order, and set upon them, and paid his enemies again with the like defeat and loss, or not much less than that which he had received at Beneventum: and in great hast withdrew himself into the country of the Bruttii, for fear lest Gracchus should overtake him.

D The Consul Marcellus returned back to Nola, from whence he came, and Fabius went forward into Samnium, to spoil and waste the country, and to recover by force of arms the Cities which had revolted. The Samnites about Caudium were pitiously and grievously damnified: their villages in all places set on fire, their fields laid waste and destroyed, and great booties both of cattle and people driven away. Six towns forced by assault, namely, Completaria, * Telefia, Cossa, Mela, Fufula, and Orbitanum. In the Lucans country, the town of * Blanda: and in Apulia, the City * Ance was assaulted. In these towns and Cities, there were taken prisoners and slain 25000 of the enemies: of fugitives and runagate traitors there were recovered 370, whom the Consul sent home again to Rome, and being thither come, they were all beaten and scourged with E rods in the Comitium, and then pitched down headlong to the earth, from the rock Tarpeia. These exploits were achieved by Q. Fabius, within the compass of a few daies. But Marcellus by occasion that he lay sick at Nola, was hindered from performing any feats of arms. The Praetor likewise Q. Fabius, who had the charge and jurisdiction of the province about Luceria, won by force about the same time the town Accus, and fortified a standing camp planted before Arundonia.

* Telefia.
* Belvedere.
* Callipoli.

Whiles the Romans were thus employed about these affairs in divers other places, Annibal was come unto Tarentum, to the exceeding great damage and detriment of all places where he journeyed: but being once arrived in the territory of Tarentum, he began to march and lead his army most peaceably. There he did no harm at all, made no havock, nor once went out of the F high way. And it was evidently seen, that all this was done not upon any modesty that appeared either in souldier or Captain, but only to win unto him the hearts of the Tarentins. But when he approached the walls of the City, and saw no commotion, nor insurrection from thence upon the discovery of his Vanguard, as he thought he should, he pitched his Camp almost a mile from the town. Now had M. Valerius the Vice-Praetor, who was Admirall of the Fleet at Brundisium, sent T. Valerius his Lieutenant unto Tarentum, three daies before that Annibal shewed himself before the walls. He had mustred and enrolled the flower of the Nobility, and so bestowed at every gate, and about the walls where need required, good guards for defence: with such vigilant diligence both day and night, that he gave no opportunity and advantage either to the enemies to adventure any assault, or to the doubtful and untrusty friends to practice any treason. So Annibal, having spent there certain daies in vain, and seeing none of them who repaired unto him at the Lake Avernus either to come themselves, or to send messenger or letters, and G perceiving now that he had rashly and foolishly followed vain promises, and so was deluded; dislodged and removed from thence. And even then also he spared the territory of Tarentum, and did no hurt at all: and albeit his fained and counterfeit lenity and mildness hitherto took no effect: yet he hoped still thereby to corrupt their faithfull allegiance to the Romans: and so he went to Salapia. And (by reason that midsummer was past, and he liked well of that place for a winter harbour) he conveyed thither all the corn from out of the Territory of Metapontum

and Heraclea. Then he sent out the Numidians and Moors, to fetch booties and prizes from out of the Salentine country, and all the woods and chafes next unto Apulia from whence they drave of other cattell small store: but of horses especially they brought away great numbers, of which there were four thousand divided amongst the horlemen to be handled, broken, and made gentle.

The Romans seeing there was like to be war in Sicily, & the same not lightly to be regarded; & that the death of the Tyrant there, rather gave the Syracusians good Captains, than wrought any change in their minds, or alteration in the cause: assigned unto M. Marcellus, one of the Consuls, that Province to govern. Presently upon the murder of Hieronymus, first the souldiers in the Leontin country, began to mutine and make an uprore, and boldly spake and said, That the Kings death should be expiate, and his obsequies solemnized with sacrificing the blood of conspirators. But afterwards, when they heard often iterated the sweet name of liberty and freedom restored unto them: and that there was good hope that the souldiers should have a largess dealt amongst them out of the Kings Treasure, and be under the command of Captains of better quality, and having besides all this, a bedroll rehearsed unto them of the Tyrant his cruelty and foul facts, and of more filthy and loathsome lusts: their affections were so altered, that they suffered the body of their King to lie above ground unburied, whom a little before, they so greatly desired and wished for. Now as concerning the conspirators, whiles the rest of them remained behind to assure and possess themselves of the army, Theodorus and Sosis took the Kings horses and rode post, as hard as ever they could to Syracusa, for to surprize upon a sudden all his followers and favourites (who knew nothing of that which was done) and fall upon them at unawares: but they were prevented not only by the same (which above all other things in such cases is most swift) but also by a courier one of the Kings servants. Whereupon Andronodorus had seized beforehand of that part of the City which is called the Island, together with the Castle, and all other places that he could come at which were thought of any good importance; and them he fortified with good guards.

* The City of Syracuse was divided into four parts, Hexapylus, Tiche, Acradina and Insula.
 * In other authors called, Tyche, or Tuke Fortuna, where the Temple there stood.
 * Acradina of others.

Theodorus and Sosis being entered within the City at * Hexapylus after sun-setting, in the twy-light and shutting in of the evening: and shewing the Kings royall robes all embred with blood, and the ornament and attire likewise of his head, he passed through * Thica, and called aloud unto the people to fight all at once for their liberty, and to arm themselves, and willed them to repair into * Acradina. The people some of them ran out into the streets, others stood in their entries and porches, divers looked out at the windows from within their houses, and asked what the matter might be? Every place shone with torch and cresset-light, and was filled with sundry garboils and hurlyburries. As many as were in arms gathered together in the open places of the City: those that were unarmed, took down off the Temple of Jup. Olympius the spoils of the Gauls & the Illyrians, which the people of Rome had given as a present to K. Hiero, and which he set aloft for a memorial: praying unto Jupiter that he would vouchsafe them this gracious favour, as to bestow those sacred weapons & harness upon them that meant to arm themselves therewith, for the defence of their country, for the maintenance of the Churches and shrines of the gods, & for the recovery of their liberty. This multitude also joyned with the corps de guards, that in the principal quarters of the City, were bestowed in places convenient. But Andronodorus amongst other places that he fortified, made sure also with strong guards of armed men the publike garners of the City within the Island. There was a place enclosed round about with four-square stone, and built strongly like a fortress: this was possessed by the youth that had been appointed for to guard and defend that quarter: and they sent messengers into Acradina, to signifie that the garners and the corn were kept by them to the behoof of the Senat. And on the morrow at the break of day, the whole people, as well armed as unarmed, assembled together in Acradina, within the Palace. And there before the altar of Concordia, which in that place stood erected, one of the principal and chief Citizens, named Polyneus, made an Oration unto them all, with frankness of speech enough, tending unto liberty and yet seasoned with modesty & moderation, in this wise: "Men (quoth he) that have experience of servitude and other indignities, fall to abhor the same, and their stomachs rise against them as known evils. But as for civill discord, what calamities & miseries it bringeth with it, the Citizens of Syracuse have heard their fathers tell, and not seen and tasted themselves. That ye have been so ready to take up arms and weapons in hand I commend you for it: but I would con you more thank, if ye used them not, unless ye be driven thereto by extream necessity. For the present, I hold it good, and my counsel is, that Embassadors be sent unto Andronodorus, to intimate unto him, yea, and to require and charge him, to submit himself unto the Senat and people, and by them to be ordered: to set open the gates of the Island, to put away from about him his guard, and deliver up the castle and garrison. But in case he intend under the pretence of being guardian or protector to the kingdom of another, thereby to usurp it to his own use; he must be given to understand, by mine advice, that we will seek to recover our liberty out of the hands of Andronodorus, more fiercely and forcibly than from Hieronymus. And so presently upon this assembly, embassadors were sent. Then the Senat went together and sat in Council: for, as during the reign of Hiero, there was set an ordinary publike Council of State: so after his death unto that day, the Senators were neither called together, nor their advice taken or sought in any matter. When the Embassadors were come unto Andronodorus, and had delivered their message, he was himself (verily) for his own part, moved with the generall consent of the Citizens: but especially when he considered, that among other quarters of the City possessed by the ad-

A verse side, that one part also of the Island, which was the strongest, was betrayed (as it were) and held out against him. But when the Embassadors called still upon him to come forth, his wife Demarata, daughter of King Hiero, puffed up still with the proud mind and haughty stomach of a Prince, and full of the vain humour and spirit of a woman, put him oftentimes in mind of a saying, that Dentis the Tyrant had evermore in his mouth, namely, "That a man should not ride on horse-back to be deposed from his royall dignity and estate of tyranny, but be led fair and softly a foot-pace, and go to that as a bear to the stake. An easie matter (quoth she) it is for one to yield and forgo the possession of high place and honour, and a thing that may be done in the turning of a hand; whensoever one will: but to compass and attain thereto is a right hard matter, and of all other most difficult. You were best therefore to borrow some respite of time of the Embassadors, for to take farther deliberation of this main point, and in the mean while, to use the advantage thereof, to send for the Souldiers out of the Leontin country: unto whom, no doubt, if you would promise a reward out of the Princes treasure, you shall be Lord of all. This perillous unhappy counsel of a woman Andronodorus neither despised and rejected altogether, nor yet presently accepted and embraced: supposing it a better and safer course, if he meant to aspire unto high dignity and great puissance, for the present to temporize and give place unto the necessity of the time. And therefore he willed them to carry back unto the Senat this answer from him, That he submitted himself, and would be ordered & set down by the Senat and the people. The morrow after, so soon as it was day-light, he caused the gates of the Island to be set open, & shewed himself in the market-place of Acradina: where he ascended up unto the altar of Concord (from which the day before, Polynus had made a speech unto the people. He began his Oration with an excuse of his late coming and long stay behind, and craved pardon therefore: alledging, "That he had kept the gates shut, not because he meant to separate his own affairs from the State, and not to take such part as the City took: but when swords were once drawn he feared what would be the end and issue of murders and massacres; and whether men would stay their hands, when there was assurance of liberty effected (as being contented with the death only of the Tyrant) or whether, as many as either in blood and kindred, or in affinity and alliance, or in other offices or service, were toward the King and his Court, should be counted culpable in the fault of another & so likewise have their throats cut. For after that (quoth he) I understood once, that they who had delivered and set free their country, were minded and willing to save & preserve it, thus enfranchised: and that there was consulting on all hands indifferently, for the good of the state, I made no longer doubt of the matter, but to yield both mine own person and also all that ever was under my hand (as committed unto me upon trust and fidelity) unto my native country: now that he, who put all into my hand, is through his own folly & outrage overthrown and brought to confusion. Then turning to the murderers of the tyrant, and by name calling unto Theodorus and Sofis. A noble and memorable piece of service ye have already done, (quoth he) but trust me truly, your glory in this behalf is begun only, and not thoroughly finished and performed: nay, a great danger is yet behind, unless ye see to the generall concord and unity of all parts, that the common liberty of the City, turn not into pride and insolency beyond all measure.

E After this speech ended, he laid down the keys of the gates, and of the Kings treasure, at their feet. And so for that day, when the people were dismissed from the assembly, with joy and mirth they went in procession and supplication with their wives and children, round about all the Churches & Chappels of their gods. The day following, the solemn election was held for the creation of Prators. And first, before all others, Andronodorus was chosen, and the rest for the most part, the very murderers of the Tyrant. They elected also two that were absent, to wit, Sopater and Deomenes. Who being advertized of all matters that passed at Syracuse, delivered up the Kings treasure which lay in the Leontins country, and was now brought unto Syracuse, into the hands of the Treasurers; who for the same purpose were created. Likewise that which was in the Island, and in Acradina, was committed over unto their custody. That part also of the wall, which divided the Island from the rest of the City, and was supposed too strong a bar between, was by common consent cast down and rased. And as their minds were thus affected and enclined to procure and maintain liberty, so all other matters sorted sutable, and followed after accordingly.

The Oration
of Andronodorus.

Hippocrates and Epitidas, when tidings came of the Tyrants death (which Hippocrates would fain have had concealed; and therefore slew the messenger that brought news thereof) being forsaken of the souldiers, returned to Syracusa: supposing for the present, that to be the safest course they could take. Where, because they would grow into no suspicion, nor to be noted to seek for some opportunity and occasion of change and alteration in the State, first they presented themselves before the Prators and Governors of the City, and so by their mediation, they had access to the Senat. They gave out, "That they had been sent from Annibal unto Hieronymus as unto a friend and confederate, and had yielded obedience unto him, as they were willed by their own Generall and Commander. Now their desire was, to return again unto Annibal. But so far as they might not travell in safety, for the Roman forces, that ranged all over Sicily, they craved a convoy and sufficient guard to conduct them, as far as to Locri in Sicily: shewing them, that by this small courtesy and desert of theirs, they should reap great thanks of Annibal, and come into high favour with him. The suit was soon obtained. For desirous they were, that those Cavaliers that used to lead the King, and were expert and skillfull besides in war, and the few with needy and audacious, should be sent away: but they made not so good speed to put this their desire in execution as they should have done. For in the mean season these young and lusty martiall men, and such as ever had conversed with the souldiers, went up and down one while to them, another whiles to the fugitive strangers that were revolted, (who for the most part were sailers and sea men that came from the Romans) yea, and lorted themselves with the basest and most abject persons of the Commoners, spreading tales, and whispering into their ears sundry suspicious matters of crime against the Senators and great men of the Nobility, saying, that they plotted and practised closely under hand nothing else, but that Syracusa, under a colour of reconciliation and accord, should be reduced to the obedience of the Romans: and then, the title and faction, and some few with them that are of counsell to renew the association, might be Lords, and tyrannize over the rest. By this means there flocked multitudes, every day more than other to Syracusa: whose ears were tickled, and itched still to hear such surmises, and were apt enough to give credit thereto. And they gave not only Hippocrates and Epicles, but Andronodorus also good hope of an alteration, and a new world. For he (being at length overcome with the importunate suggestions of his wife, who ever put into his head, That now was the only time to stir up and take upon him the rule of the State, whiles all things were troubled, and in a confusion, upon their new and unknown liberty: whiles the souldiers were presented in their way, to be dealt withall, and daily maintained and fed out of the Kings Exchequer, and whiles those captains sent from Annibal, by reason of their acquaintance with the souldiers, were present to set on word, and further his designments) first therefore acquainted Themistius, who had married Gelo his daughter, with his complor: and after a few daies (full unadvisedly) imparted his mind also, unto one Aristo, an Actor of Tragedies, whom he used aforetime to make privy unto his other secrets. This Aristo was well born, and descended of a worshipful house, a man in good place, and of honest reputation: and his profession (for among the Greeks it is reputed no matter of shame, to play either in Tragedies or Comedies) was no blot either to his birth, or disgrace to his calling: and therefore as one who made more reckoning of his duty to his country, than of private friendship, bewrayed & disclosed all the treason unto the Prætors. Who finding by good proofs and certain evidences that this was no forged and counterfeit information, after consultation had with the Ancients of the Council, by their warrant and direction, set a guard of armed men about the door of the Senat House, and so soon as Themistius and Andronodorus were entred in place, slew them outright. And when there began some uprore upon this fact, which in shew seemed very horrible and hainous (especially to all the rest that knew not the cause:) at length they appeased the tumult and caused silence, and brought the informer into the Council House, that had detected the intended treason: who declared all things orderly in particular: namely, that this conspiracy was devised and sprung first from the marriage of Harmonia the daughter of Gelo, who was wedded unto Themistius: that divers auxiliary souldiers of Africans and Spaniards were appointed and provided to massacre the Prætors, and other principal Citizens: that their goods were promised unto the murderers to be ransacked and rifled: that besides, there was a hand of mercenary souldiers (such as were wont to be at a beck, and ready to execute the commandment of Andronodorus) set in a readinesse to seize the Island again, and keep it to his use. And when he had laid every thing abroad in order, with all circumstances, what the practises were and by whom they were to be performed and executed, and shewed before their eyes most plainly the whole conspiracy: & namely, what persons and what forces should have been employed. Then the whole body of the Senat were likewise verily perswaded, that they had deserved such an end, and were as justly murdered as Hieronymus. But without the Council House door, the confused multitude, composed of all sorts of people, who were doubtfull of the matter, and knew not what to make thereof, cried out. And albeit they menaced and threatned before the entry and porch of the Senat, yet at the sight of the dead bodies of the Conspirators, lying before their face, they were affrighted and soon hushd so as with great silence they followed the whole body of the Commons to the publike place of assembly. Unto whom, Sopater, by order from the Senat, and his fellow Prætors, was commanded to make an Oration.

speech to the people of Syracusa.

He began formally to inveigh against Andronodorus and Themistius, (as they that accuse men at the bar) and ripped up their former life past, charging them with all the wicked deeds and impious facts, committed since the death of Hiero: "For what (quoth he) did Hieronymus, nay, what could he do of himself, so long as he was but a child and stripling, and scarcely come all the while he lived to have any hair on his face? His officers and guardians, were they that ruled all, and managed the kingdom at their pleasures, but so, as the blame and heavy load lay upon him. Who if they had perished either before Hieronymus, or at least wise together with him, they had been but well enough served. But they, who long ago had deserved to die, and for whom the gallows had already groined, ceased not still, after the death of the tyrant, to devise and plot new mischiefs, one in the neck of another. At the first, openly in the sight of the world, Andronodorus by shutting the gates of the Island, entred by way of inheritance upon the kingdom, and sought to seize in his own right, and immediat heir apparant, upon those things that he held under the Prince, only during his nonage. Afterwards, being betrayed by them that were in the Island, & besieged round about by the whole City (which was possessed fully of the Acradiri) seeing that in vain he had attempted to be King by apert and open force: he sought means to aspire thereto secretly, and by cunning sleights. Neither could he be so much as re-aimed and won by any favours and honours done unto him: who being himself a traitor to the re-

A dom of the state, was notwithstanding advanced to be Prator, among other redemers of the liberty of their country. But no marvel it was (quoth he) that these men were of this hangry spirit, and longed to be Kings: for they had to their wives two princely dames, the daughters, one of King Hiero, and the other of his son Gelo.

As these words, the people from all parts of the assembly began to cry out with one voice, that neither of them both were worthy to live, nor any one besides of the Kings stock and lineage ought to remain upon the face of the earth. See the nature and disposition of the multitudes, whether they serve safely, or rule proudly. Liberty that is the mean between, they have neither the skill to despise with reason, or the grace to entertain in measure. Now, there wanted not (ye may be sure, as at all times else) ready instruments and firebrands, to help forward, and kindle more anger, such as seeing the Commoners, disempowered already, and bloudily minded of themselves, put them forward to murder and massacre. As it appeared then: For immediately, as the Prators put up a bill, that all the Kings stock should be rooted out, and the whole line utterly extinguished: before in manner that it was all read out and published, it passed clear, and was granted. And presently there were sent unto certain persons from the Prators, that murdered Demetrius and Hieronymia the daughters of King Hiero and Gelo, the two wives of Andronotus and Themistius.

Now there was another daughter of Hiero, named Heracles, wife to Sosippus, who having been sent as Embassador from Hieronymus to King Ptolemus, chose a life in voluntary exile, and lived not with his wife. She having an inkling given her aforehand, and knowing that the murderers were coming also toward her, took her two daughters, virgins: and together, with their hair loose hanging down their shoulders, and in other most poor array and ruffall habit, able to have moved pity and compassion, they were fled into a privat Oratory or Chappell unto their house-gods, to save themselves. The mother seeing the murderers fell to entreating them most pitiouly, and recommended unto them the late remembrance of her father Hiero, and her brother Gelo: "Beseech-ing them not to suffer her (an innocent and guiltless person) to fare the worse, and be punished upon hatred that was born unto her nephew Hieronymus. As for me (quoth she) I reaped no good by his Reign and Kingdom, unless it were the banishment and absence of my husband: and as by the life of Hieronymus, my fortune was not so good as my sisters: so after he was murdered and dead, my cause is not so bad, nor like unto hers. Moreover, and besides, in case Andronotus had effected his designments, my sister should have been a Queen, and reigned together with her husband: but as for me, I must have been a subject and servant with the rest. Again, if there were any messengers sent unto Sosippus, to report the death of Hieronymus, and the restoration of Syracuse to liberty: who can make doubt, but that forthwith he would be embarked and take the seas, and return again into his country? But how much are men put besides their hope, and deceived of their expectation? And who would ever have thought to have seen in a freed state his wife and children in danger to lose their lives? For wherein do we hinder the common liberty, or the course of laws? What danger can come to any person from us, one desolate lone woman, and in manner a widow, and two young maidens livings as Orphans fatherless? And if it be said again that there was indeed no fear of hurt to be imagined from us:

E but only the Kings blood and kindred was odious in the eyes of the people: Then, quoth she, let us be sent away far from Syracuse and Sicily, and confined over to Alexandria, the wife to her husband, the daughters to their own father. But when they would neither give ear to her words, nor endue their hearts to pity and compassion: then because she would not spend longer time in vain: (for now the saw some of them drawing their swords forth) she gave over all entreating for her self, and besought them instantly to be good yet, to the young filly girls, and spare their lives, unto whom being of that age, even the very enemies in their heat of anger forbore to offer violence: and thus seeing they were to be revenged of tyrants, they would not play the tyrants themselves, and commit that wickedness, which they seemed to hate in others.

Amidst these words the murderers (sent from the Prators) pulled her forth of the inward and most secret place of the chappell, and cut her throat: and when they had so done, they assailed and fell upon the the maidens, bespattered with the blood of their mother: who for sorrow of heart and fear together, being past themselves and out of their wits, and as it were in a furious fit of frenzy, ran against them, and got out of the Chappell: minding, if they could have escaped forth, and recovered the street, to set the whole City on an uprore. And so shifted for themselves, poor wenches, by running to and fro within the house, (which was not large and spacious) that for a good while they escaped amongst the thickest of so many armed men, and oftentimes avoided their reaches, and caught no hurt: yet, and when they had caught hold of them, notwithstanding they were to struggle with so many hands, and chose so strong, yet they wound away from them all: untill at length after they had received many a wound, and filled every place with blood, they fainted and

G sunk down, and yielded up their innocent spirits: This murder, be don't, was of it self pitiouly: but much more lamentable, by occasion of a present accident. For straight after came a messenger with express commandment, to spare the women, and not to kill them: for that upon a sudden the hearts of the people relented, and inclined to mercy. But when they heard there was so quick dispatch made of execution, that neither they had time to bethink themselves and repent, nor space to cool upon their heat, they fell pity and compassion into an extreme fit of anger and choler. The multitude thereupon began to murmur and murmur, and called to have an election of Prators in the room of Andronotus and Themistius (for they were both of them Prators) which new election was not like to fall out in the end to the good liking and contentment of the other Prætors in place. So a day was set down, and proclaimed for this election. At which time, it happened that beyond all mens expectation, one from the farthest part of the assembly nominated Epicides: and then another from thence named Hippocrates. After which, the same voices came thick and threefold still, so as it seemed the multitude would wholly go that way. The people there assembled, were a confused sort intermingled, as well with a number of souldiers, as of a company of Citizens and Commoners: yea, and many of them were strangers fugitive, thrust among, such as rather than their life desired a generall change and alteration. The Prætors at first dissembled all, and would seem to take no knowledge thereof: but thought it best to put off the matter to a farther day: yet overcome at last with the common accord and consent of the people: and fearing withall a mutiny and sedition, pronounced and declared the men aforesaid for Prætors. Neither would they, at first hand so soon as they were created, let that abroach which was in their mind and desire to effect: notwithstanding they were displeased and discontented much; both for that there had been Embassadors dispatched unto Appius Claudius, about a truce for ten daies: and also when it was obtained, that there were others addressed to treat for the renewing of the ancient league with the Romans.

At the same time (Ap. Claudius) the Roman General lay at Murgantia with an Armada of 100 gallies, waiting there to hear what was the event of the troubles which arose upon the murder of the tyrants: and how far forth men would proceed upon this their new and unwonted liberty. And much about those daies, when as the Syracusan Embassadors were sent from Appius unto K. Marcellus now coming into Sicilia, Marcellus himself after he heard the conditions of peace, thought they would grow to some good agreement and conclusion in the end: and therefore sent other Embassadors to Syracuse, personally to debate and confer in the presence of the Prætors, concerning the renewing of the League aforesaid. But by that time, they found not the City in the same quiet tune and peaceable state. For Hippocrates and Epicides, after news came that the Carthaginian Navy was arrived and rid at anchor under the bay of  Pachinus*, confidently, and without all fear buzzed in the eare one while of the mercenary souldiers, another while of the fugitive traitors, many false surmises against their brethren in Office, and namely, that they went about to betray Syracuse to the Romans. But Appius began to keep his Armada at anchor in the very mouth of the river, listning to know what heart and hope they of the contrary faction had, to effect that which they intended. Much credit was given (as it should seem) unto those slanders and lewd suggestions: in so much as at the first, the multitude ran to the waters side in a great hurry and tumultuous manner to hinder their landing, if haply they attempted it. In this trouble some confusion of all things, it was thought good, that the people should meet together to deliberate what was best to be done. In which assembly, while some drew one way, others haied and pulled another way, and were at the point to mutine and grow to a sedition, Apollonides, one of the principall and chief Citizens, made a speech to very good purpose for preservation of the publike peace, and thus he said: "Never was there any City nearer, either to hope of assured safety: or to fear of utter destruction, than this of ours at this present. For if all would go one way together, and wish one accord either encline to the Romans, or bend to the Carthaginians, there were M not a City under the cope of heaven; whose state were more happy and fortunate than ours. "But in case we be distracted, and the Common-weal go divers waies, there would not be more bitter and cruell war between the Syracusians and the Romans, than among the Syracusians themselves: when within one and the same walls, there should be banding one against another, and each side have their forces, their armor, and their Captains of their own. And therefore we ought of all hands to endeavour what we can, that all may be of one mind and draw in the same line. As for the main point now in question, Whether society and alliance be the better and more commodious, the Romans or the Carthaginians, is a matter of far less moment and importance than to be consulted and studied long upon. Howbeit, in choosing our friends and allies, we are to be directed by the authority and act of Hiero, rather than of Hieronymus: and N to prefer that amity which we have tried for fifty years in much felicity, above a friendship for the present unknown, and sometime heretofore found unfaithfull. It maketh somewhat also, to resolve upon this course, that in case we should deny peace and alliance to the Carthaginians, we need not presently go to war with them: but with the Romans we must out of hand make account either of peace, or else of hot wars. This speech of his the less that it favoured of factionous partiality and affection, the more authority and sway it carried with it. And besides the deliberation of the Prætors and choice Senators, the advice also of the martiall men were taken. And therefore the Captains of all their own ensignes and companies, yea, and the great Commanders of the auxiliary forces of their allies were willing to sit in Council together with them. When the matter had been often debated, and much contention and hot words passed between, at the last, because there appeared no colourable reason or cause to make war with the Romans, they agreed that a peace should be concluded, and that together with their Embassadors, there should be others also from them to ratifie and confirm the thing.

There passed not many daies between, when out of the Leontins country there arrived certain Orators, to crave help and succour for the guard and defence of their marches. This Embassage seemed to come very fitly and in good time, for to exonerate and rid the City of the unruly and disordered multitude, & likewise to send out of the way their Captains and ringleaders.

The Oration
of Apollonides, to the people of Syracuse.

^A So Hippocrates the Prætor was commanded to lead thither the fugitive strangers. Many also of the mercenary souldiers, that were waged to help them in their wars, accompanied them: so as in all, the number amounted to four thousand. This expedition and journey contented greatly as well the senders and feters of it out, as also the parties themselves that were sent forth. For these of the one side had a good occasion and opportunity now offered them, to contrive a change in State (the only thing that so long they had desired) and those of the other, were right glad, that the sink (as it were) of the City was now well scoured and voided away. But this was like the palliative cure of a sore, and a lightning for the present of a sick body: whereby it might soon after by relapse fall back, as it were, into a recidive, and a worse disease and more dangerous than the other. For Hippocrates began at first to make rodes by stealth into the confines bordering upon the Roman Province, and there to waste & spoil: afterwards when Appius had sent a power of men to defend the frontiers of his confederats, he charged with his whole power upon that guard that was opposed against him, and slew many of them. Whereof, when Marcellus was advertized, he dispatched Embassadors incontinently to Syracuse, to charge them with the breach of peace: and to give them to understand, that there would never be wanting some occasion or other of quarrell and war, unless Hippocrates and Epicides were removed, and sent far enough out of the way, not only from Syracuse, but also quite out of Sicily. Epicides for fear lest if he remained present in the City, he might be charged and brought in question, for the fault and trespass of his brother absent, or be wanting for his part, in the raising of new war: went himself also in person into the Leontins country: and seeing them there forward enough of themselves, and provoked already against the Romans, began also to alienate and turn their hearts from Syracuse. For in these terms he suggested and informed against the Syracusians: namely, "how they had capitulated with the Romans, that all the Cities and Nations which were under the Kings, should be subject unto them, and within their jurisdiction: so as now they cannot be content (quoth he) with their liberty, unless they rule also like Lords and Kings. I would advise and counsell you therefore, to send word unto them and give them to understand, that the Leontins likewise deem it good reason, that they should themselves be free: in regard either that the tyrant was killed within the ground of their City, or because the first alarm for liberty began there. For they leaving and abandoning the Captains there that followed the King ran at once from thence to Syracuse. And therefore they are (saith he) to rase that aforesaid article out of the instrument of the covenants, or not to accept at all of peace with that condition. Soon were the multitude perswaded hereunto. And therefore when the Embassadors of the Syracusians came to the Leontins, both to make complaint for killing of the Roman Corps de guard, and also to command peremptorily, that Hippocrates and Epicides should depart either to Locri, or to what other place they would rather chuse, so they went their waies and voided clean out of Sicily: they returned unto them this stout answer again: that neither the Syracusians had any commission and warrant from them, to make peace with the Romans in their name, neither would they be tied and obliged to any confederacy made by others than their own selves. This answer the Syracusians made report of to the Romans, and said plainly, "That the Leontins were not under their jurisdiction, to be ordered and censured by them: and therefore, any thing comprised in the league with them notwithstanding, the Romans might war against them without breach of any covenant: and in that war they would not for their parts fail them, but do their best upon condition, that when they were once subdued, they might be reduced again under their obedience, according to the covenant comprehended in the League. Whereupon Marcellus with his whole power went forth against the Leontins, and sent for Appius also, to assail them on the other side: and so hot were his souldiers in this service, and bare themselves so resolute, for anger that the guard was slain, during the time that there was treaty of peace between: that at the very first assault they won the City. Hippocrates and Epicides, after they saw the wals scaled, and the gates of the City broken open, betook themselves for their safety, with some few into the Castle, from whence by night they made a secret escape, and fled to Herbesus.

^E As the Syracusians marched from home with a power of eight thousand armed men, and were come forward, as far as to the river Myla, they met with a messenger, who told them that the City Leontium was forced. They reported other news besides, as well lies as truths, one with another, namely, that townsmen and souldiers indifferently without respect were put to the sword: that he thought verily, there was not left one alive of fourteen years of age and upwards: that the City was put to the sack, and all the rich mens goods were given away. At this so fearful and horrible news, the army staid and went not forward. And when they all were greatly troubled, their Leaders Sofis and Diomenes, consulted what to do. This loud lie arose not upon nothing, but was occasioned by mistaking of a matter. For there were scourged and beheaded of fugitive traitors, to the number of two thousand. But of Leontins and other souldiers, there was not one hurt after the City was lost. And every man had all his own goods restored unto him again: saving that only which in the first hurlyburly of a City newly won, happed to miscarry and perish. Howbeit upon this bare report, they neither could be induced to go forward to the Leontins, complaining and grieving that their fellow souldiers were so betrayed and murdered, nor yet to abide there still for to expect and hear more certain tidings. The Prætors perceiving their minds disposed to revolt, and yet hoping that this mutinous fit of theirs would not continue long, in case the Captains and heads of their fury and folly were once rid out of the way led the army to Megara: and went them.

themselves in person with a few horsemen toward Herbesus, hoping to gain the City by treason, H while they all there were affrighted. But seeing that enterprise would not prevail, they minded to use forcible means. The morrow after they dislodged and raised their Camp from Megara, purposing with all their forces to assail Herbesus. Hippocrates and Epicides supposing this to be the only way for them, although at the first sight not the safest, (considering all hopes besides were cut off) namely, to put themselves into the hands of the souldiers, who were for the most part acquainted with them, and besides, upon the bruit of the execution and massacre of their fellow souldiers, throughly chafed, went out to meet the army. The foremost ensigns in the forefront, hapned to consist of those six hundred Cretensians, who in the wars of Hieronymus had served under them, and received a favour and benefit at Annibal his hands. For being taken prisoners at Thrasymenus, I among other auxiliaries that came to aid the Romans, they were set at large and sent away without ransom. Whom when Hippocrates and Epicides knew by their colours, habit, and fashion of their armour, they held out branches of olives and other vails and tokens of suppliants, beseeching them humbly to receive them, and being once received, to vouchsafe to protect them, and not to deliver them into the hands of the Syracusians: by whom they should soon be yielded unto the people of Rome, for to be murdered and cut in peeces. At this they all cryed aloud with one voice, and willed them to be of good cheer, for they should fare no worse than their own selves. Upon this communication the ensigns staid, and the army stood still and marched not forward: but the generall Captains wist not as yet what the cause might be of this stay. After the rumour was spread that Hippocrates and Epicides were come, and that all the host throughout by a generall applause K seemed to like well of their coming: the Prætors incontinently set spurs to horse, and rode forward apace to the forefront of the vanguard, demanding of the Cretensians, what manner and fashion this was of theirs? and how they durst be so bold, as to parle and talk with enemies? and without license of their Prætors, to entertain them within their companies? And herewith they gave commandment, that Hippocrates should be apprehended and bound sure with chains. At which word the Cretensians set up such a cry, and the rest so answered it again with the like, that it was well seen, in case they had proceeded forward as they began, they should have incurred themselves no small danger. And thus in great perplexity, and fear of their own lives, they commanded to turn ensigns, and retire unto Megara, from whence they came: and dispatched messengers presently to Syracuse, to signify in what terms they stood. Hippocrates seeing the souldiers given to be suspicious and ready to beleieve every thing, devised a cunning shift besides, in this manner. After he had sent out certain of the Cretensians, to beset the waies between them and Syracuse, he pretended that they had intercepted some letters from thence, which he read unto the souldiers, and were indeed framed and indited by himself. The tenor of the letters ran in this form: "The Prætors of Syracuse, to M. Marcellus their friend, greeting. After these salutations and commendations premised, as the manner is, it followed written thus: you have done well and orderly in sparing none at all of the Leontins. But all other mercenary souldiers besides are in the same Predicament: neither will Syracuse be ever in quiet, so long as any forraign aid be either in the City, or in your army. And therefore our advice and counsell is, that you would endeavour "to get them into your hands, who with our Prætors are encamped before Megara, and by execution of them to deliver and let Syracuse free in the end. M

The contents of these letters were not so soon read, but with such an outcry and alarm they ran to their weapons on all hands, that the Prætors amidst this garboil were faine to ride away as fast as they could gallop, toward Syracuse. But although they were fled, the mutiny nevertheless continued and was not appeased: for the souldiers fell upon the Syracusians that were in the camp amongst them, and they had all drank of the same cup, and not one escaped, but that Epicides and Hippocrates came between, and opposed themselves against the multitude in this their furious rage not upon any pitifull compassion that was in them, or regard of common humanity, but because they would not cut themselves from all hope of return: and besides, they were not only desirous to have the souldiers themselves affectionate unto them and faithfull, and withall instead N of hostages: but also purposed, by this so great desert, first to gain and win unto them the kinsfolk and friends of those souldiers, and afterwards to oblige and bind them fast by so good a pawn and gage, remaining still among them. And having good experience, with how small a puff and gale of wind the common people turneth every way, they suborned a souldier, one of them who was besieged within the City of Leontium, to carry news to Syracuse, saying with those false tidings that were reported at the river Myla: yea, and to aver the same confidently upon his own knowledge, and tell things that were doubtfull, as if they were most certain, and by himself seen and known: thereby to stir up men to anger and indignation. This fellow was not only credited of the common multitude, but also being brought into the Council-House, he greatly moved the Senat: insomuch as some of them, more light of believe than others, gave it out openly and said, O "That it was happy, that the avarice and cruelty of the Romans was thus discovered among the "Leontins. And god blese us from them here. For if they set foot once within Syracuse, they "would commit the like outrages, yea, and worse too a great deal, and more horrible: as they "should find there greater matter to work upon, and to satisfie their covetous and greedy appetite to the full. Whereupon they agreed in generall, to shut the gates, and to stand upon their guard, and defend the City. But they all feared not alike, nor hated the same persons. For the martiall men, in a manner every one, and a great part of the common people abhorred the name of the Romans:

A Romans: the Prætors, and some few of the principal Citizens, albeit they were in the huff, and possessed with the false report aforesaid, yet they had more regard to provide for a mischief that was more imminent and near, and ready presently to fall upon their heads. And now by this time Hippocrates and Epicides were come before Hexapylus. Within the City, the kinsfolk and friends of those Citizens which were in the army, drew together in conventicles, conferred among themselves to set the gates open, and agreed to have the common country of them all, to be defended against the violence of the Romans. Now, when one only wicket of Hexapylus was opened, and they ready to enter in thereat, the Prætors came upon them in the manner. And first they commanded by word of mouth, and threatened them; after that, by vertue of their place and authority, they seemed to fright and terrifie them: and last of all, seeing nothing could prevail, forgetting their own dignity and majesty of their calling, they fell to pray and entreat them not to betray their country to those, who aforesaid were the instruments and supports of the Tyrant, and now the corrupters of the army. But so deaf ear gave all the multitude in this their rage and furious fit unto the Prætors, that they within, as well as without, set their hands to, by all forcible means, to burst down the gates, and so when they were all broken open, the army was let in safe, and received within the Hexapylus. The Prætors fled for refuge with the youth and strength of the Citizens into Acradina. The mercenaries, the fugitives, and all the souldiers that were left in Syracusa (of them who served the King) joyned to the army, and augmented their forces. And so Acradina also, was upon the first assault won. All the Prætors, but those that escaped by flight, and saved themselves in the midst of this hurry, were slain: and the night coming upon them, staid the massacre. The day following, all bondslaves were called to receive the cap, and made free: the prisons were set open, and the prisoners let go at large. And this confused rabble and multitude of all sorts created Hippocrates and Epicides Prætors. And thus Syracusa, having for a short time liberty shining favourably upon it, fell again into her old servitude.

When news hereof came to the Romans, incontinently they dislodged and removed the camp from Leontium, and marched directly towards Syracusa. It hapned the same time that the Embassadors sent from Appius by the way of the haven, were embarked in a galleace of five banks of oars: but another galley of four banks which was sent before, was not so soon entered into the mouth of the harbour, but it was taken: and the Embassadors hardly, and with much ado escaped in the other. And now, the world there was grown to this pass, that no laws of peace, no, nor so much as the very laws of arms were observed, but broken clean: at what time as the Roman army lay in camp a mile and an half from the City, at Olympium, the Temple of Jupiter. For when it was thought meet to send Embassadors from thence, Hippocrates and Epicides with their followers encountered them without the gate, and charged them upon their perill not to enter the City. The Roman Orator alledged, and said, "That he came not to proclaim war against the Syracusians, but to bring aid and help, as well unto those, who having escaped out of the midst of the slaughter fled unto the Roman Camp, as also unto them, who being kept under with fear, endure bondage and thralldom more miserable than banishment, yea, and death it self. Neither will the Romans (saith he) put up that shamefull and cruell murder of their Allies without due revenge. And therefore, if those persons who were fled for succour unto them, may return home safely into their country: if the authors of that massacre aforesaid, be delivered into their hands: and if the Syracusians may enjoy again their liberty, together with their laws, there shall not need any hostility or war. But in case these conditions be not performed, they would persecute with fire and sword, all such as shall hinder and stand against the same, whosoever."

To this Epicides framed his words in this wise: "If (saith he) ye had any message and commission to parl with my brother and me, we would return you an answer accordingly. In the mean while ye were best be gone for this time, and return again when the City and state of Syracusa shall be under their governance, unto whom ye were sent. As for war, if the Romans think it good to deal that way, they shall find and know by experience, try when they would, that it is one thing to assail Syracusa, and another to set upon Leontium. And so leaving the Embassadors, he made the gates fast against them."

From this time forward, the Romans laid siege unto Syracusa, and began to beleaguer it both by sea and land at once. On the land side at Hexapylus, by water at Acradina, upon the walls whereof the sea beateth. And like as they won the City of the Leontins, by terrifying them at the first assault, and therefore distrusted not, but that they should force and enter this also, one side or other, being so large and vast as it was, not compact, but built so scattering, one part far asunder from another, they approached with all their fabricks, engines, and ordnance of battery against the walls. Which enterprise of theirs, so resolutely begun, and so hotly and forcibly followed, had sped well and taken effect, if one man at that time had not been in Syracusa, Archimedes was he, a singular Astronomer. A rare man for contemplation and behold the sky with the Planets, and other stars therein fixed: but a more wonderfull engineer for devising and framing of artillery, ordnance, fabricks, and instruments of war, whereby he would with very little ado, and at ease, check and frustrate all the inventions which the enemies with so great difficulty had prepared for to give the assault. This cunning artificer and admirable workman had planted engines of all sorts upon the curtain of the wall, which stood on certain hills, and those not of even height: and having for the most part high places that yielded hard access, and some other low again, whereunto men might come on even & plain ground, he fixed and furnished every place accordingly. Now Mar- cellus

cellus from out his gallies of five ranks of oars, assaulted the wall of Acradina, which (as is abovesaid) is washed and dashed upon, with the sea. And from the other gallies, the archers, slingers, yea, and the light armed darters (called Velites) whose javelins are of that fashion, that they be unhandsome to be lanced back again (by those that have not the cast and skill of it) so assailed the defendants, that they hardly suffered any one to stand upon the walls without hurt and danger; These, I say kept their gallies far distant from the wall, because archers and darters had need of some space and compass to lance and let drive their shot. But unto the gallies of five course of oars, there were adjoynd other two of either side: for which purpose the oars within were taken away, that they might close larboard to starboard, and so be coupled one unto the other. And thus being rowed as one entire gally, by the help of the utmost oars without, they carried upon them platforms of timber, framed with floores and lofts of planks, and other engins and instruments within them to batter and shake the walls. Against this artillery from the gallies, Archimedes bestowed and disposed upon the walls counter-engins of sundry sizes, some greater, some smaller. Against those gallies that were furthest off he weighed and discharged stones of exceeding main weight, and those that were nearer, he annoyed with lighter bullets, but those he shot far thicker upon them. And last of all, to the end that his own Citizens might, without taking harm, make a counter-battery against the enemies, and so annoy them, he caused certain barbacans or loop-holes, almost a cubit deep, to be pierced through the walls, and to stand thick from the foot thereof, to the parapet; and all to flank the enemy, through which overtures, they within shot closely against the enemies, some arrows out of bows, some quarrels out of scorpions and brakes of mean and indifferent bigneis. And against those gallies, which approached more close and near under the wals (because they would be within the shot, and that they within might carry and levell over them) he devised a crane or swipe to be planted aloft upon the walls, having at the one end, which hung over the sea, a drag or grappling hook of iron like an hand, fastned thereto with a strong chain: which took hold upon the prow of a galley, and when the heavy counter-poise of lead at the other end weighed it down to the ground, and therewith drew with it the prow up on high, while it hung thus aloft in the air, the galley stood in a manner endlong upon the poop. And then the swipe being let go again all at once suddenly with a sway, dashed the galley, tumbling (as it were) down from the top of the wall, with such a swinge and violence against the water (to the exceeding fear of the mariners) that if it had fallen directly down right upon the keel, yet needs it must have received good store of water into it. Thus all their provision for assault by the sea-side, was deluded and made void: and then they turned their whole forces from thence, to give assault by land. But even that part of the wall likewise, was as well furnished with all manner of engins and ordnance, provided at the great charge of Hiero, and by his carefull forecast for many years together: but devised and framed by the artificial cunning and skill only of Archimedes. Besides, the naturall situation of the ground was a great help: for that the rock, upon which the foundations of the wall stand, is for the most part so steep and bending forward, that not only the shot levelled out of an engine, but also whatsoever was but rolled & tumbled down, with the very own weight and poise, came with a great force & violence upon the enemy. Which foresaid cause, made the assailants to have difficult climbing up, and as unstedfast footing and keeping of their hold. Whereupon they went to counsel. And considering well, that all their attempts and enterprizes were thus deluded and mocked by the enemy: it was thought good to give over assault, and only by long and continuall siege, to cut them off from all victuals both by land and sea. In the mean while Marcellus with one third part (well near) of the army, went forth in expedition, to recover again those Cities, which taking occasion upon these troubles, were revolted to the Carthaginians. And he gained Pelorus and Herbesus, which yielded on their own accord. As for Megara, which he won by assault, he rased it down to the ground, and sacked it, to the fearful example of the rest and especially of the Syracusians.

And much about that time, Himilco also, who had a long time rid in the Bay of the Cape Pachynus with his Armado, disembarked and set aland at Heraclea (which they call Minoa) 25000 footmen, 3000 horsemen, and twelve Elephants. He had not all this power of men when he lay with his fleet under Pachinus. For after that Hippocrates had taken and held the possession of Syracusa, he went to Carthage, where, being sent unto both by Embassadors from Hippocrates; and also by letters from Annibal (who moved him and remonstrances, That now the time was come to recover Sicily again with much honour and glory: and being himself there present in person no bad solicitor by word of mouth to further and follow the cause) he easily perswaded the Carthaginians and prevailed that as great a power both of horse and foot as might possibly be raised, should pass over into Sicily. Being arrived at Heraclea, within few daies after Agrigentum was delivered up into his hands. And all other Cities, which had banded and taken part with the Carthaginians, were put in so good hope to drive the Romans out of Sicily: that even they who were besieged within Syracuse, to take heart unto them; and were so in their ruff, that supposing part of their forces sufficient enough to defend their City, they parted between them the charge and managing of the whole war in this manner: That Epicides should remain behind for the guard and defence of the City, and Hippocrates joynt with Himilco, and war joyntly against the Romans. He with 10000 foot, and 500 horse, set out by night: and passed between the Corps de guard, where none at all warded, and encamped about the Acerre. As they were fortifying their Camp, Marcellus came upon them as he retired back from Agrigentum, possessed now by the adverse part: whither he

A he had made great haste, but in vain, in hope to prevent his enemies, and get thither afore: but little thought he (and nothing less) than in his return from thence, at that time and in that place, to meet with an army of Syracusians that should make head against him. Howbeit, for fear of Himilco and the Carthaginians, whom he knew to be abroad, and with whom he was not able to make his part good with that power which he had about him, he marched as circumspectly as he could, having his eye on every side, and led his army in good order of battell against all occurrences whatsoever might happen by the way. And so as good hap was, that carefull forecast and diligence, which he was provided with against the Carthaginians, served him in very good stead against the Sicilians. Finding them therefore busie in pitching their tents, without order, and scattered a sunder, and most of them unarmed, he environed soon all the Infantry that they had, and put them to the sword. But the Cavalry after a slight skirmish begun, fled with their leader Hippocrates to Acte. Marcellus after he had by his flight repressed and kept in the Sicilians, who were at hand to fall away and revolt unto the Romans, returned to Syracuse: and after some few daies, Himilco joyned with Hippocrates, and encamped about eight miles from thence, upon the river Anaris.

Likewise about the same time, or very near, it happed that 55 war-ships of the Carthaginians, under the conduct of Bomilcar, Admirall of the Armado, put into the great haven of Syracuse out of the deep and main sea: and also the Roman fleet of thirty Gallies, with five ranks of oars, arrived at Panormus, and landed the first Legion there: and thus the war was turned and diverted from Italy. So wholly seemed both nations, as well Romans as Carthaginians, assused upon nothing now but Sicily. Himilco making full account to prey upon the Roman Legion which was set a land at Panormus, as they should come to Syracuse: missed of the right way to meet with them: for he marched and led his power far within land higher in the country, but the Legion coasted along by the sea side, accompanied as it were with the fleet which flanked them: and came to Pachinus unto Appius Claudius, who with part of his forces went out to meet them on the way. But the Carthaginians made no long stay about Syracuse. For Bomilcar having small trust and confidence in his ships, considering that the Romans were coming toward him with a fleet, and were twice as many in number: and withall seeing, that by sojourning there, he did no other good but with his company impoverish and eat out his friends, speed and hoisted up sail, and with a merry wind passed over into Africk. Himilco also, who had dogged and followed after Marcellus in vain as far as Syracuse, to espy some good opportunity and vantage to bid him battell, before he joyned with a greater power: seeing that he was hereof disappointed, and the enemy lying about Syracuse safe and secure, as well in regard of their fortifications, as their forces: because he would not spend any longer time to no purpose in sitting there still, to look upon their Allies how they were besieged, he dislodged and removed from thence: attending, wheresoever there were any hope and likelihood of revolt from the Romans, thither to come with his army, and shew himself in person, to encourage and animate by his presence those that favoured his part. And first he recovered Morgantia, where the Roman garrison was betrayed by the inhabitants, and delivered unto his hands. Into which City the Romans had conveyed great store of corn, victuall, and provision of all sorts. Upon this revolt, other Cities also took heart unto them, and the Roman garrisons were either thrust and driven out of the Castles and Fortresses, or else were treacherously betrayed, surprised, and destroyed.

The City Enna, seated upon an high hill, and on every side inaccessible, as it was by naturall situation of the ground impregnable, so it had a strong garrison within the Castle, and a Captain of that garrison, one, that was not so easie to be compassed and over-raught by deceitfull trains. His name was Pinarus, a witty man, and hardy withall, who reposed more trust in his own diligence to prevent, that he might not possibly be deceived, than in the truth and faith of the Sicilians. And at this time more than ever before, he stood upon his guard, and took heedfull care of himself and his charge, by occasion that he heard of so many treacheries and treasons, so many revolts of Cities, and massacres of garrisons: and therefore as well by day as night, he looked that the Castle was well provided and furnished of good watch and ward continually. & the souldiers never departed from their armour nor their appointed place. Which when the chief Citizens of Enna perceived, who already had covenanted with Himilco, and promised to betray the fort and the garrison: and saw that the Roman Captain was so wary, that he lay not open unto the opportunity of any fraudulent and guilefull course, they resolved by open and open means to effect this their designed enterprise. They alledged therefore unto Pinarus, "That the City and Castle both ought to be in their power, since that they entered into league and amity with the Romans as freemen, and were not yielded as slaves to be kept in dures and prison. Reason would therefore, and meet it was (as they thought) that all the keys of the gates were delivered unto them." With good and trusty allies, their own faith and truth is the surest bond. And no doubt, the people and Senate of Rome would con them greater thank, and esteem more dearly of them, if so be they of themselves, not by constraint, but of willing mind, would abide and continue in their sound allegiance and fast friendship. Pinarus made answer again, "That he was by his General placed there Captain of the garrison: at his hands he received the keys of the gates, and the Countership of the Castle, and the same to hold and keep neither at his own will, nor at the pleasure of the men of Enna, but at his disposition, who sealed him his Commission. Now for a Captain to abandon his fort (quoth he) is a capital crime among the Romans, by vertue of speech to his

“ a law, which our fathers themselves have confirmed, even by the exemplary punishment & death “ of their own children, who have transgressed the same. And seeing the Consul Agrippa is not “ far off, ye may, if it please you, send your Embassadors unto him, of whom you may be certified, “ under whose power, commandment, and government I am. Tush, say they, we will never send “ unto him. But if words and reasons may not prevail, we will work some other means to recover “ ver our liberty again. Then quoth Pinarium to them, If ye think much to address your messen“ gers to the Consul, yet do me this favour, as to call a Common Councill of the people to my “ sake, that I may know whether these demands proceed from some few, or from the whole “ body of the City. So it was accorded and agreed, that a generall assembly should be proclaimed “ against the morrow. Then Pinarium after that he was departed from this party, returned into the “ fortres, and calling his souldiers together, spake unto them in this wise: I suppose ye have heard “ already (my souldiers) in what sort the Roman garrisons have, these daies past, been betrayed “ and murdered by the Sicilians. That treachery hitherto ye have avoided and escaped, first & prin“ cipally through the goodnes of the gods: next and immediately by your own valour and pro“ wess, & by continuall watch & ward, standing in your armor both day & night. And I would to “ God ye might pass as well the time to come, without falling into this hard choice either to en“ dure and suffer such horrible mischief: or to execute and commit a fearfull example of cruelty.
“ This intended treason of theirs hath been carried and conveyed closely and cautelously all this “ while, & seeing they cannot as yet meet with any advantage to surprise us, they would seem now “ openly and without dissimulation, to demand for to have all the keys of the gates under their “ hands. Which we should not so soon part with & render unto them, but presently Enna would “ turn to the Carthaginians, and more cruelly should we here be murdered and bewo in pee“ ces, than the garrison was at Murgantia. Much ado I had to obtain of them respite of this one “ night, to take further counsel: that I might advertise you of the present danger, wherein both I & “ you stand. To morrow morning by day-light, they purpose to hold a solemn assembly of the “ people, and to make a speech unto them, to accuse me, and to stir them up against you. And “ to morrow is the day that the City Enna shall overflow either with the blood of you, or of the “ Inhabitants. And be ye well assured, that as ye shall lose all that you have, if they surprise you: “ so in case you prevent them and begin the fray, there shall no peril at all betide you. Look who “ first lieth hand on his sword and draweth it, he shall carry away the victory clear. Therefore ye “ must be there prest in your armor, and attentive to expect a signal from me. I my self will be “ present in the assembly, and with parling and debating, temporise: and draw out the time, untill “ ye be all in readines and every thing in order. And to soon as I shall give you a sign with my “ gown, then let me hear you set up an outcry, then let me see you fall upon the multitude: down “ with them and spare not and put them all to the sword. See in any case there be not one of them “ escape your hands and remain alive, from whom ye may fear any harm, either by fraud or “ force. And now I beseech thee O Dame Ceres, and thy daughter Proserpina, and all other gods “ in heaven above, or in hell beneath, who inhabit this City, these holy lakes and sacred groves, “ wherein ye are honoured and worshipped, to vouchsafe to be propice and favourable unto us: “ in case we enter into this action and enterprise, for the avoiding of treachery intended against “ us, and not to offer mischief unto other: and not otherwise, I would use more words unto you “ my friends and souldiers, for to animate and encourage you, if it were that you had to deal “ with men in arms: but since they are naked unarmed, & unwarned you shall kill and slay them “ at your pleasure, and satisfie your selves with their blood. And to the end that you need not fear “ any harm from Himilco and the Carthaginians, loe the Consul himself lieth encamped near “ at hand. After this exhortation they were dismissed, to take their refection and rest. The next “ day, they were bestowed in sundry parts of the City, some to beset all the streets, others to stop “ the passages and the waies against the townsmen, that they might not escape. But the most of “ them stood upon and about the Theatre, and were nothing suspected as being used heretofore to “ behold and see the assemblies of the people. The Roman Captain Pinarium was by the Magistrates “ brought forth and presented before the people: where he pleaded, That it lay not in his hands, but “ in the power and authority of the Consul, to dispose of that which they demanded: and he ite“ rated for the most part the same allegations that he shewed the day before. At first they began “ gently, some few by little and little: afterwards more and more of them, required him to deliver “ up the keys; and so consequently all with one voice, charged and commanded him so to do: and “ when he seemed to make some stay and defer the matter, they menaced and threatened fiercely, yet “ and seemed as if they would no longer forbear, but proceed to extreame violence. Then the Captain “ made a sign with his robe, according to the former agreement: and with that the souldiers who “ had their eyes upon him, waiting wittly for the signal and were ready for execution, set up a loud “ cry and ran some from aloft upon the multitude assembled over against them; others stood thick “ at every corner of the Theatre, where the people should go forth, and opposed themselves against “ them. Thus the men of Enna, shut up and penned within the Theatre were massacred and lay “ tumbled one upon other: not they only that were killed, but such also as fled one over anothers “ head: the sound fell upon the wounded, the quick upon the dead, one with another, by heaps.
“ Then there was running from thence sundry waies, and as if the City had been taken upon assault “ by the enemy, there was nothing but murdering and flying away in every place. And as hot and fu“ rious, were the souldiers in the execution of this unarmed multitude (whom they judged wor“ thily

A thily and justly to be killed) as if like danger presented unto them, or choler raised in set battel, had provoked them thereto. Thus Enna was held still for the Romans by this means: were the deed simply ill, or by circumstance needfull and necessary; Marcellus misliked not of the fact, & granted the pillage of the Citizens of Enna to the souldiers: supposing that the Sicilians throughly frighted by this fearfull example would betray no more garrisons. The calamity and hard fortune of this City, (standing, as it did, in the very heart of Sicily) was in one day divulged and noised throughout the Island, from one end to the other. And otherwise, a famous and renowned town it was, either for the natural situation so exceeding strong: or because all places in it were accounted sacred and holy, in remembrance of Proserpina: who in times past left her footing & traces there, at what time as she was stoln away & ravished by Pluto. Now it was generally thought by the Sicilians, that this cursed and detestable massacre had defiled and polluted not only the habitations of men, but also the temples of the gods: whereupon even they likewise, who stood but doubtful and indifferent before, fell now away from the Romans, and turned to the Carthaginians.

B Then Hippocrates retired to Murgantia and Himilco to Agrigentum: who were sent for by the conspirators and traitors within Enna, and approached with their forces, but to no purpose. Marcellus returned to the Leontins country: and after he had brought into the Camp corn and other victuals, and left there a meanguard, he presented himself to the siege that lay before Syracuse. And when he had sent Appius Claudius to Rome to sue for the Consulship, he committed the charge in his room of the Armado there, and the old leaguer unto T. Quinius Crispinus. Himself created and fortified his wintering harbours five miles from Exapylor, at a place which men call Leontia. And these were the affairs of Sicily unto the beginning of winter.

In the same summer the war began likewise with King Philip which long before had been suspected. For there came Embassadors from Oricum to M. Valerius the Prætor Admiral of the fleet, for the defence of Brundisium, and the sea-coast thereof about of Calabria, and made report that Philip first assailed to win Apollonia, and was come up the river with one hundred and twenty light gallies, or foists with two ranks of oares against the stream: and afterwards, seeing he could not effect his purpose so speedily as he hoped, privily by night he approached with his army to Oricum: and that the City, situate upon a plain, neither strongly fenced with walls, nor well manned with souldiers, nor yet furnished with armor and munition, was at the first assault surprised and won. And as they recounted these news, so, they besought him to grant aid and succour: and to make head against this undoubted enemy of the Romans, either by Land, or forces at Sea, and to chase him away from them: who for no other reason were by him assailed, but because they were near neighbors to Italy. M. Valerius leaving the guard of that place to T. Valerius his Lieutenant General, with a fleet of ships well rigged, furnished & appointed; and having embarked these souldiers (which the gallies for war would not receive) in the merchants ships of burden, arrived at Oricum on the second day after: and finding that City kept with a small and slight garrison, which Philip when he departed from thence had left there, recovered it without much resistance. Thither repaired to him embassadors from Apollonia, who brought word that they were besieged, because they refused to revolt from the Romans: and were not able to hold out any longer against

E the forcible attempts of the Macedonians, unless a garrison of Romans were sent unto them. He promised to effect whatsoever they desired, and so shipped a thousand elect and choice souldiers in gallies, and sent them to the mouth of the river, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies Nævius Crispus, an industrious man, and an expert souldier. He having landed his men, and sent the gallies back to Oricum (from whence he came) to the rest of the Armado, conducted his souldiers higher in the country, far from the river side, by a way that was not beset nor held by the Kings forces: and in the night-season, unawares to all the enemies, entred the City. The day following they rested, only the Captain took a survey of the youth and able men of Apollonia, of their armor and the munitions and forces of the City. When he had seen and perused all, thereupon he was well appaid and encouraged to fight, and withall he had learned by the Scouts and spies, how retchless, F idle, and negligent the enemies were without. So at midnight he went forth of the City without any noise, and entred the Camp of the enemies so carelessly guarded as it was, and lying so open: that by credible report, there were above one thousand men got within the trench and rampier, before that any one was ware thereof: and if they had held their hands, and not fallen to killing, they might have passed on still even as far as to the Kings Pavilion. But by reason that they slew the warders next the gates, the enemies were raised: whereupon, they were all so frighted and terrified, that not only there was never a souldier took weapon in hand, and went about to repulse the enemy out of the Camp: but even the King himself, half naked as he was, and newly awakened out of his sleep, clad in simple apparell, scarce decent for a common souldier, much less, I wot, for a King, was faine to run toward the river side to his ships. Thither also the other multitude fled disordered in heaps. There were not many under three thousand either slain or taken prisoners in the camp. Yet there were more by odds of the enemies taken than killed. In the rising of the camp the Apollonians met with Catapults and Bulists, and other engines provided for the assault of the City, which they conveyed all to Apollonia, to serve for defence of their City against the like occasion of needfull service. All the booty besides of the camp was granted to the Romans.

Tidings hereof being come to Oricum, M. Valerius presently set forth the Armado as far as to the mouth of the river, that the King might not flee away and escape by sea with his ships: whereupon Philip doubting his power as well by sea as shore, and doubting he was not able to match the Romans, drew up some of his ships to land, set fire upon the rest, and so by land went into Ma- cedony, with a great part of his souldiers disarmed and spoiled. The Roman fleet wintered at Ori- cum with M. Valerius.

The same year in Spain the affairs went variably on both sides. For before that the Romans passed over the river Iberus, Mago and Asdrubal deicated a mighty host of Spaniards, so as, all the farther part of Spain had fallen from the Romans, but that P. Cornelius made haste to transport his army over Iberus, and came in good time to settle the wavering and doubtful minds of the allies. At the first the Romans encamped at * Castrum Alium, a place memorable for the death of great Amilcar. The Castle was well fortified, and thither afore they had conveyed corn. But because all those quarters thereabout were full of enemies, and sundry times their Cavalry had charged the Roman footmen, and gone clear away without any harm, whereby there had been slain at times upon two thousand of them, which either made small halts away, and staid behind, or straggled loosely over the fields: the Romans departed from thence, nearer unto places of more security and peace, and fortified themselves in camp upon the mount of Victoria. Thither came Cn. Scipio with all his forces, and likewise Asdrubal the son of Gisgo, the third Captain of the Carthaginians, with a full army. And they all encamped beyond the water, over against the fort of the Romans above said. P. Scipio, accompanied with certain light armed souldiers, was gone out closely to discover and take view of the places thereabout: howbeit, not so covertly, but he was espied by the enemies, and (no doubt) they had put him to a shrewd foil in the open plain champion, but that he took a little hill thereby for his vantage. Where he was environed and beset round about: but by the coming of his brother Cneus, he was delivered out of that danger.

Castulo, a famous and strong City in Spain, and so near linked in affinity to the Carthaginians, that Annibal from thence married his wife, ranged to the Romans. The Carthaginians came against Illiturgum and began to assault it, because a garrison of the Romans lay there: and like they were to be Masters of the town, by occasion especially of a great dearth and scarcity of victuals within. But Cn. Scipio for to relieve his friends and the garrison, went out with a legion lightly appointed with carriages, and marching between the two camps of the enemies skirmished with them, slew many of them, and entered the City. The morrow after he sallied out, joynd in fight with the enemy, and sped as well: so as in both battels there were slain of them above twelve thousand in the place, more than ten thousand taken prisoners, and 36 military ensigs carried away. Thus the siege brake up at Illiturgum. After this, the Carthaginians began to lay siege unto Biger- ra (a City also confederat with the Romans,) But Cn. Scipio at his coming raised that siege without any conflict. Then the Carthaginians from thence went forward against Munda, and the Romans followed them thither straight after. There they encountred together and fought a set battel with banners displayed, for the space well-near of four hours. And as the Romans bare themselves bravely, and had got the better, and were at point of the victory, the retreat was sounded, by occasion that Cn. Scipio was hurt fore in his thigh with a barbed javelin, and the souldiers about him were greatly afraid that the wound was deadly. But no doubt, if it had not been for that stay and hinderance the very camp of the Carthaginians might that day have been forced. For not only the souldiers, but the Elephants also were driven already so far as the trench, and even there upon the very bank, 39 of them were sticked with darts and pikes. In this battell likewise were killed (by report) twelve thousand men, almost three thousand taken prisoners, and 57 military ensigs won. Then the Carthaginians retired back to the City Aurinx, and the Romans followed upon them, because they would give them no time to rest and breath themselves after their fright. Where Scipio being brought into the field in a litter, gave them battel the second time, and got the victory clear: but fewer of the enemies were slain by the one half than afore, because there were not so many in number left to fight. But (as they are a nation given naturally to renew war, and to be ever fighting, and cannot give over) they soon repaired and made up their forces. For Asdrubal had sent his brother Mago, to levy and gather new souldiers: whereupon they took fresh heart again to try another field. These, being for the most part other souldiers (new come) fought as it were in revenge, and to uphold that side which in few daies space had so often taken the foil, and demeaned themselves as courageously as they before, and sped as unto wardly. For there were slain of them above eight thousand, not many under one thousand taken captives, with military ensigs 58. In rifling of them there was found very much spoil of the Gauls, as rings of gold, ear-kanets, collars, and bracelets great store. Over and besides, two great Lords and Princes of the Gauls, whose names were Manicapus and Arvismarus, were slain outright in that conflict. Eight Elephants taken alive, and three killed.

Now when as the affairs in Spain went thus fortunately with the Romans, they began at length for very shame to thinke of Saguntum, a town that was the cause of all these wars, and had now five years already been in the hands and possession of the enemy. Whereupon by force of arms they recovered it, drove out of the town the garrison of the Carthaginians, and restored it again to the ancient inhabitants, as many as remained alive, and had escaped these broils of war. As for the Turdetans, who were the occasion of the wars between the Saguntins and the Carthaginians, they subdued them, and brought them under their subjection, sold them in port sale, and destroyed their City utterly. These were the achievements in Spain, during the time that Q. Fabius and M. Claudius were Consuls.

At Rome, when the new Tribunes of the Commons were once entered into their office, presently

A. L. Messius one of the Tribunes aforesaid, arrested the Censors P. Furius and M. Atilius, peremptorily to make their appearance and answer before the people. These Censors had taken from him being Treasurer the year before, his horse of service allowed him by the City, called and displaced him out of his Tribe, deprived him of liberty to give his voice, and made him Ævius, and all, for being a party with them at Cannæ, who conspired to abandon Italy. But by the means and mediation of the other nine Tribunes, they were discharged: for they would not suffer, that the Censors should come to their answer while they were in office. And the death of one of them, namely, P. Furius, was the cause that they could not accomplish the lessing and numbring of the Citizens. And when M. Atilius surrendered up his Magistracy, Q. Fabius Max. held the solemn B assembly and Parliament of the people for the election of Consuls, wherein were created Q. Fabius Max. the Consul his son, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time, both absent. For Prætors, there were elected M. Atilius, and with him, they who at that time were Ediles of the chair to wit, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and M. Æmilius Lepidus.

This year as it appeareth in old Records, were the Stage-plays first set out by the Ediles of the chair, and continued four daies. This Edile Tuditanus above named was he who at Cannæ when all besides him for fear were affrighted in that wofull calamity, brake forcibly through the midst of the enemies, and escaped. When Q. Fabius the old Consul had finished the Election then the new Consuls Elect were sent for to repair unto Rome, and they entered their Magistracy. Then they assembled the Senat for to consult and take order for the war, for the Provinces as well their own,

C as those that were under the Prætors: also concerning the armies, and the disposition of every charge and place of command. So the Provinces and armies were divided in this wise: The war with Annibal, wheresoever it fell out, was committed to the managing of the Cons. with the charge of one army, which Sempronius himself had before under his conduct: and of another, commanded by Fabius the Consul. And those were two legions. M. Æmilius the Prætor, whole lot it was to have the jurisdiction over the forreiners, had committed his authority unto his Colleague Atilius, the Prætor of the Citizens of Rome, that he might govern the Province about Luceria, and those two legions, over which Q. Fabius, now Consul, had the command, whiles he was Prætor. To Sempronius the Prætor befell the Province of Ariminum. To Cn. Fulvius was allotted Suessula, with two legions likewise: so as, Fulvius should have the leading of the legions

D of Citizens, and Tuditanus receive his from M. Pomponius. The government of the forrein Provinces continued still in the former deputies. M. Claudius ruled Sicily, so far as the dominion of King Hiero extended: and Lentulus the Vice-Prætor had the charge of the old Province. T. Octavius was high Admiral of the Navy, without any new supply or augmentation of forces. M. Valerius was employed in Greece and Macedony, with one legion, and the Armado which he had before. Q. Mutius was L. Deputy in Sardinia, having under him the old army, consisting of two legions. And C. Terentius had the administration of the affairs in Picennus, with that one legion which long time he had been Captain of. Moreover, it was decreed and agreed upon, that there should be mustred and enrolled two new legions of Citizens, and twenty thousand men besides

E the defence and maintenance of the State and Empire of Rome, against many wars at once, either in hand already, or suspected shortly. The Consuls having enrolled two legions of Citizens, and chosen a supply to make out the rest, before that they set foot out of the City, procured the pacification of the gods, for the fearful and prodigious tokens that were reported. For the wall and gates of Rome were blasted and smitten with lightning from heaven: and likewise the Temple of Jupiter at Aricia. Other vain objects and illusions also of the eyes and ears, which men imagined they saw and heard, were beleeved for truths. Namely, there appeared in the river of Tarracina certain resemblances and shews of Gallies, whereas indeed there were none such. And in the Temple of Jup. Vicilinus, which standeth in the Territory of Cissa there was heard, forsooth, rustling of armor: and the river of Amitemus seemed to run with blood. When satisfaction was

F made for these strange signs, the gods pleased, and all well again, according to the direction set down by the Priests and Prelates, then the Consuls set forward in their expedition, Sempronius into Lucania, and Fabius into Apulia. Where it fell out, that Fabius the father repaired into the Camp at Suessula, as Lieutenant and assistant unto his son. And when Fabius the younger went forth to meet him, and his Serjeants or Ushers marching afore, said not a word to Fabius the father, nor put him aside to give way, for very reverence of his person, (such majesty he carried,) the old man rode forward, and passed by eleven of the said Lictors with their bundles of rods. Then the Consul commanded the Serjeant that was next himself to do his office: and with that said Usher called upon old Fabius, to alight from his horse back: and at last he set foot aground: I did all this but to try, quoth he, my son, whether you knew well that you were a Consul or no.

G There came that night secretly to the Consul while the Camp lay there, one Cassius Albinus, an Arpinat, with his three bondslaves, promising, that if he might have a good reward for his service, he would betray Arpos into his hands. Fabius then propounded this matter unto his Council, to be debated of. Some were of opinion, that Albinus was to be whipped and put to death, fugitive rumpagare and false knave as he was: a common enemy, and a dangerous to either part, and playing with both hands, like a double-hearted hypocrite. Who first, after the overthrow at Cannæ (as if he might turn with the wheel of fortune, and go from his word and faithful promise, and change ever as the changer) ranged himself unto Annibal: and by his example, drew with him Arpi to revolt and rebell: now after that he seeth the Roman estate to rise again and hold up head (and that beyond his hope & contrary to his desires) he would play the villain and turn coat again, and come with a new practice of a more shamefull treason than before: as if treachery and falshood were of the nature and quality of a judgment passed in a remittal court: and as if he might be allowed to carry two faces under a hood, and alter every hour. Faithless friend that he is, not to be trusted, and slippery enemy, not to be regarded. A good deed it were, that together with that same traitor of Falerii, and the other of King Pyrrius, he made a third, and were punished accordingly for exemplary justice, to teach all rogues and runnagates hereafter how they run from their Lords and Masters. On the other side, old Fabius (the Consuls father) replied, and said: That men now a daies had forgot how to make difference of seasons, and in the very heat & midst of wars, reasoned and gave their opinion and sentence of every thing and person as in a free time of open peace: when as indeed, we are to think, consider, and deliberate of this point, that (if possibly it might be) no more of our allies revolt from the people of Rome, rather than invite and incite them thereto: and after one is started aside, and upon repentance returned again to the ancient amity, to fall a reviling and rebuking of him, and bitterly to say that he deserveth to be made an example to all others. For if it may be lawfull for one to turn from the Romans, and held unlawfull to return again unto the Romans, no man need doubt, but shortly the Roman Empire will be forsaken of all her confederats and allies, and we shall see within a while all the Cities of Italy linked and confedered in a league and friendship with the Carthaginians. And yet (quoth he) I am not the man that thinketh Alcimus worthy to be trusted in any thing for all this, but I would take a mean course & middle way between both extremities. My opinion is therefore that for the present he should be taken neither for enemy nor friend, but commanded to ward, and to have the liberty of a prisoner, and only be kept forth-coming in some confederat and trusty City, not far from the Camp during the time of the war. And when the war is once finished and ended, then I hold it good to deliberate and consult, whether that his former revolt hath deserved more punishment than this his present return meriteth favour and grace. Every man liked well of this advice of old Fabius, and gave their assent. So he was bound with chains, and both himself and his company delivered over and put in custody, and a good round sum of gold, which he then had brought with him, was by commandment reserved for his use. At Cales he made his abode: where all the day time he used to walk at liberty, with his keepers following him, but in the night they kept him close prisoner. But at Arpi, where his house was, they of his own house began first to miss him, and seek for him: afterwards, when it was noised throughout the whole City, that he was out of the way, and could not be found: the same hereof caused a tumult, for the loss of a principall person as he was, thus revolted to the enemy. And for fear of an alteration in the State, presently the news thereof was sent to Annibal. Who was nothing offended therewith, both because long afore he had the party himself in jealousy and suspicion, as one neither fish nor flesh, a man of no credit and hardly to be trusted: and also for that he found a good occasion and quarrel to seize upon the goods of so rich and substantiall a Citizen, and to make sale thereof. But to the end that the world might think that he was more angry against his person, than greedy of his substance, he joyned with cruelty, a grave course also of judicall severity, that the one might serve as a file to give lustre to the other. For having sent for his wife and children into the Camp, first he examined them straightly, for to know whether he was fled, and what store of silver and gold he had left behind him at home in his house: and when he had learned enough of them touching every particular, and as much as he desired, he burnt them quick to ashes.

Fabius being departed from Suessula purposed the first thing that he did to assail Arpi. Where he lay encamped a mile from the town: and after he had well viewed by near approach, the situation of the City, and considered the wall, look where he saw it was most strong and sure, and therefore guarded most slightly and negligently, there especially he purposed to give the hottest assault. And when he had sufficiently provided and got together all ordnance and engins, requisite for the battery of Cities, he made choice of the most hardy and valiant Centurions of the whole army, and set over them certain Tribunes and Marshals, valorous and doughty good men, and appointed unto them a Regiment of six hundred souldiers (for so many he thought sufficient for the present service) with direction and commandment, that when the trumpet sounded the relief of the fourth watch, they should bring scaling ladders to that place aforesaid. Now there stood a gate low and narrow, answering to the street not much used and frequented, by reason that quarter of the City was not inhabited, but stood void. That gate he gave them order first to scale and clime over, and then to go forward on the wall, and from within-forth to break down the bars, and level the said gate, and when they were Masters of that quarter of the City, then to wind the horn, and give signall to the rest of the forces for to approach and come hard to the town, saying, That he would have all things in readines, and in good order. This direction was performed accordingly with great diligence, and that which was thought and feared would have been an hindrance and let unto them in the action, was the only thing which he ped them most, that they were not desiered. And that was a smoking shower of rain that began after midnigh, which caused the warders and watchmen to quit their standings, forsake the Sentries, and to flie into the houses for covert. The first noise of the storm pouring down with such a force, made that the rumbling of the souldiers could not be heard, as they were breaking down the gates and

As it grew after to rain more softly, and so kept still at one, it sounded gently and sweetly in their ears, untill he brought a good many of them fast asleep. Now after they had seized the gate, the Marshalls gave order, That the Cornettiers should be bestowed in that void street afore said, distant equally asunder, and to wind their horns; for to waken and raise the Consul. Which being done, according as it was before agreed, the Cos. commanded the standards and ensigns to be brought forth, and somewhat before day-light entred at the said broken gate into the City. With that, the enemies at length began to rouse themselves, for now the shower and storm was past, and the day approached. There was a garrison in the City at hand of five thousand of Annibal his souldiers, armed and well appointed: and the Arpins of themselves were 3000 strong. Those B the Carthaginians put in the forefront, as a forlorn hope, and opposed them against the enemy, for fear of some treacherous prank that they might play behind their backs. First, they began to arrange themselves to fight in the dark, blind, and narrow lanes. For the Romans had filled and taken up not only all the streets, but also the houses that were next the gate, to the end, they might not be galled with shot, and wounded from aloft. Some Arpins and Romans fell at length to meet, to take knowledge and acquaintance one of another, and so began to commune and talk together. The Romans asked what the Arpins meant to rebell: for what offence and harm given of the Romans, and for what desert and benefit received from the Carthaginians should they (being naturall Italians) maintain war for Aliens, strangers, and barbarous nations, against the Romans their old friends and ancient Allies: and so to bring Italy in subjection to Affrick, to do homage and fealty, yea, and to become tributary, and to pay pension unto it? The Arpins excused and cleared themselves, saying, that they (simple men, and ignorant in all things) were bought and sold by their great rulers and principall Citizens, and lived in manner as captives and slaves under the command of some few persons that might do all. Upon this beginning, more and more of them grew to parling and conference. At length the Prator of Arpi himself was by his own people and Citizens brought and presented before the Consul: where, after faithfull promise passed between the ensigns and the battels; the Arpins immediately bent their forces on the Romans side against the Carthaginians. The Spaniards likewise (who were not many under a thousand men) after they had capitulat and agreed with the Roman Consul, nothing but this one article, That the garrison of the Carthaginians might be sent forth and paid away safe without harm: D came with their colours to the Consul. Then all the gates were set open for the Carthaginians, depart: and being sent away upon safe conduct without any harm at all or damage unto Annibal, arrived at Salapia. Thus Arpi was restored again to the Romans, without the loss and detriment of any one man but one only old traitor and new fugitive revolt. The Spaniards were appointed to have double allowance of victuals: and they performed good, faithfull, and valiant service many times after to the Common weal.

When one of the Consuls was in Apulia, and the other in Lucania, one hundred and twelve men of arms, Gentlemen of the Nobility of Capua, having licence granted by the Magistrates to go out of the City, pretending to make a rode into the enemies country; and to fetch in booties and prizes, came directly into the Romans Camp, lying about Suessula. And meeting with the E Corps de guard, declared who they were, and that they would par with the Lord Deputy. Now Cn. Fulvius was the General and Commander of the army there: who being advertized and certified hereof gave order that ten only of all that number should be brought before him unarmed. When he heard their suit and demand, which was nothing else, but that when Capua was recovered by the Romans, they might have their goods restored unto them: he received them all into his protection. The other Prator also Sempronius Tuditanus, won by force the town Citernum: where there were taken prisoners above seven thousand men: and a good deal of copper and silver coin gained besides. At Rome there chanced a fearfull and pitifull fire, which continued two nights and one whole day. All between Soluna and the gate Carmentalis, together with the Equimellum and the street Jugurium, were burned down, and made even with the ground. Likewise F without the gate the fire spread far all about, and in the Temples of Fortuna and Dame Matuta, and Sper, consumed much, as well hallowed as prophane.

The same year, when all things prospered well and had good success in Spain, P. and Cn. both Scipios having recovered many associates and those of ancient league that came in again to him and yielded themselves: and besides, gained some new confederats: conceived good hope, and took heart to proceed farther, even into Affrick.

Syphax King of the Numidians, on a sudden fell out with the Carthaginians, and became their professed enemy. Unto him the Scipios addressed three Centurions as Embassadors, to treat with him about a league and alliance: and to promise withall, that if he went on still to trouble and molest the Carthaginians, by making war upon them, he should do an high favour to the Senate and people of Rome: that they would endeavour and bring about, that in good time and place, G he should be well required for that kindness, and receive at their hands a double recompence with thanks. This embassage pleased the barbarous King right well. And after he had conferred and reasoned with the Embassadors, concerning military affairs, and the knowledge of warfare: and heard those old & experienced souldiers talk of war, he soon found his own wants, and how unskilfull himself was in many points and feats of arms, in comparison of that methodicall and orderly discipline, whereof they had discoursed. The first thing then that he requested at their hands, was this: That as they were good friends and faithfull Allies, two of them would go back with their Embassie unto their Generals, and that the third might remain with him, to read unto him a lecture in the military science of warfare, Saying, that the nation of the Numidians were raw and altogether unskilful in footmens service, and only nimble and practised in fight on horseback, So (quoth he) from the first beginning of our nation have our ancestors used to war: & so have we from our childhood been enured to fight. Mary, an enemy I have trusting and presuming much upon his Infantry, whom I would gladly be able to match every way in all kind of service, Footmen I am able to set out as well as another: for why? my Realm is populous, and yieldeth abundance of men: but altogether ignorant we are, how to fit them with armor, how to marshall them, how to order and set them in battell array: inasomuch as all my people in battell go to it pell-mell, and are as a multitude huddled and thrumbled together as I venture without skill without discretion and advisement. The Embassadors answered and said, That for the present they would do according to his will and pleasure: but withal, they had his faithful promise & word of a Prince that he should immediately send back their companion again, in case their Generals approved not their deed in that behalf. Q. Statorius his name was, that staid behind with the King. So Syphax sent by the two Romans his answer to the foresaid Embassage into Spain: and besides, with them other Numidians, Embassadors of his own, to receive farther assurance and security from the Roman Generals: unto whom he gave in charge, that forthwith they should sollicite, perswade, and entice all the Numidians that were auxiliary souldiers unto the Carthaginians, and served in any Camp, City, or garrison Town of theirs, for to abandon them and come to him. And Statorius for his part, having mustered a great multitude of serviceable young men, chose forth and enrolled a power of footmen, to serve in the Kings wars: and when he had sorted them into bands and companies, and ordred them in battell array, as near as possibly he could, to the manner of the Romans: he trained them in their running to follow their colours: he taught them to keep their places in their ranks, and to double their files: and likewise he accustomed them to travell and do work: and so acquainted them with other military orders and exercises, that within short time, the King reposed as good confidence, and was as mighty in his new Infantry, as in his old Cavalry: and in a set pitched field on even ground, was able to meet the Carthaginian with banner displayed, and give him the foil in a full battell. The coming of the Kings Embassadors into Spain, was to the Romans also a matter of great consequence and importance: for upon the rumour and fame that went thereof the Numidians began to fall away apace, and to come thick unto the Romans. Thus were the Romans joynd in amity and friendship with King Syphax.

When the Carthaginians had intelligence of this new alliance, they addressed immediately their Embassadors to Gala, who reigned in another part of Numidia, over a nation called Massyli. This Gala had a son named Masanissa, of seventeen years of age, but a youth of such towardness, and so forward in vertue, that even then he made good and apparant shew, that he would another day enlarge his domibion, and make a more flourishing and mighty Kingdom than his father should leave it unto him. These Embassadors declared unto Gala, That forasmuch as Syphax had entred league, and was banded with the Romans, to the end that by their alliance and society, he might be more mighty and puissant against other Kings and nations of Affrick: It were also better for him and much more commodious to joyn with the Carthaginians in all convenient speed: before that either Syphax passed over into Spain, or the Romans into Affrick: And Syphax (say they) may soon be defeated and overthrowen now, while that he hath gained naught yet, but the bare name of the Roman League. Gala was soon perswaded to send a power of men especially at the earnest instance of his son, who was very desirous of that war, and to have the managing thereof. He with the help of the Carthaginian legions vanquished Syphax, and gave him a great overthrow. So as at that field there were slain, by report, in one day thirty thousand. Syphax himself in person, with some few Numidian horsemen, fled back to the Maurisians, that inhabit the farthest coasts, hard upon the Ocean over-against Gades. But the barbarous people at the fame of his coming so resorted in great numbers to him out of all parts, that in a short space he was able to arm a mighty host. And before he could with them cross over into Spain, which was divided from Affrick with a narrow arm of the sea, Masanissa was come with his victorious Army: who in that place, of himself, without any help or aid of the Carthaginians, gave Syphax battell, to his great honour and singular glory. In Spain no memorable exploit was achieved, but that the Roman Generals allured and drew to them the able and serviceable manhood of the Celtiberians, for the same hire and stipend that they bargained for with the Carthaginians: and sent from thence above three hundred Spaniards of the noblest parentage into Italy, to sollicite their countrymen, who served under Annibal as auxiliaries to follow them and take part with the Romans. This only, touching the affairs of Spain that year, is a thing worthy to be noted and remembered. That the Romans never waged souldier to serve in their War before that time, when the Celtiberians began to be their mercenaries, and first received pay.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and twentieth Book.

Publius Cornelius Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, was made Edile, before he was of lawfull years. Annibal won the City Tarentum (all but the Castle, into which the Roman garrison was retired) by means of certain young Tarentine Gentlemen, who had made semblance, that they went by night a hunting. The solemn plaies in the honour of Apollo, were now first instituted, upon occasion of certain propheticall verses of Martius, wherein the overthrow at Cannæ had been foretold. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius Consul, fought fort unately against Hanno, a Duke or Captain of the Carthaginians. T. Sempronius Gracchus the Pro-Consul, was by a Lucan (his host that gave him entertainment) trained into the danger of an ambush, and slain by Mago. Centenius Penula, who had served in the wars as a Centurion, having made suit unto the Senat, to have the leading of an army, and promised, if this petition were granted, so win the victory of Annibal, and to vanquish him, took the charge of eight thousand footmen, and gave battell to Annibal: but he was slain himself, and his whole army defeated and put to the sword. Gn. Fulvius the Prætor fought unfortunately against Annibal, and lost the field: in which fight there died sixteen thousand men. Himself, with two hundred horsemen fled and escaped. Capua was besieged by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius, the Consuls. Claudius Marcellus in the third year of the siege won Syracule, and bare himself in that service like a worthy and noble Knight. In that tumult and hurly-burly when the City was taken, Archimedes, while he was busily occupied about certain Geometrical figures and forms that he had drawn in the dust, was killed. The two Scipios, Publius, and Cornelius, after so many and so worthy exploits performed fortunately in Spain, came to a wofull and heavy end, being themselves slain there, with the loss well-near of their whole Armies, in the eighth year after that they went into Spain. And the main possession of that Province had been quite lost, but for the singular manhood and industry of L. Martius, a Knight of Rome, who having rallied and gathered together the remnants of the armies, so encouraged them, that by their valiant service two several encamped holds of the enemies were won, seven and thirty thousand of the enemies slain, and eighteen hundred taken prisoners, and a great rich booty obtained. Whereupon he was called Captain Martius.

The five and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

VV Hiles these affairs thus passed in Affrick and in Spain, Annibal emploied the summer season in the territory of Tarentum, in hope by treason to be Master of the City of the Tarentins. In which mean while, certain base Cities of the Salentins, and towns of no importance revolted unto him. And at the same time, of those twelve States of the Brutii, which the year before had turned, and banded with the Carthaginians, the Consentins and Thurins were rallied wholly again to the devotion of the people of Rome. And more of them had returned likewise, but for L. Pomponius Veientanus, Captain of the Allies: who after he had made certain rodes into the country of the Brutii, and sped his hand well with many booties, took upon him the countenance of a sufficient Colonel, and was no less reputed: and having gathered a power of men, suddenly in haste, without good adviement, fought with Hanno. In which conflict, a mighty multitude of his men were either slain or taken prisoners. But, as good hap was, they were but a disordered unruly rabble of rustical clowns and bond-slaves: and the least loss of all other, was the Captain himself, who amongst the rest was taken captive: a man as then, the author of a rash and fool-hardy fight, and had been aforetime a Publican or farmer of the City revenues, and alwaies (through his naughty practises and cunning fetches and shifts wherein he was become skillful) a disloyal person and dangerous both to the publicke State, and also to those private companies and societies, with whom he had commerce and dealing. Sempronius the Consul, lying in the Lucans country, made many light skirmishes, but not any one, worth remembrance, and won certain poore towns, and of smal regard, belonging unto the Lucans.

The longer that this war continued lingring, whiles prosperous success and adverse mishap interchangeably wrought much variety and alteration as well in the inward minds of men: as in their outward state and fortune: such religious zeal and superstition (and the same for the most part in forein ceremonies) had so seized & possessed the City, that either the men or gods thereof, were suddenly all at once become clean altered and transfigured. Insomuch as now the Roman rites and holy observations were contemned, not only in secret, & within doors at home in their private private houses, but abroad also in the open streets, yea, and in the common place and Capitoll: where there flocked alwaies a sort of women, that neither offered sacrifice and oblations, nor said their prayers, and did their devotions according to the use and custome of their native country and City. Certain odd Priests and Chaplains, yea, and doting wizards and blind Prophets, had inveigled the minds and consciences of men: whose number was the greater by reason first of the rurall people and peasants of the country, who for need and poverty, and for fear together, were driven to quit their lands which they had not tilled and husbanded, by reason of the long wars, and many invasions and rodes that laid all waste, and so retired into the City: afterwards by the easie occupation and ready means of gain which they found by the error of others, whom they soon seduced and abused: which trade they used and practised openly, as if it had been a lawfull art and mystery. At the first, divers good and honest persons began secretly to grieve and be offended herewith, yea, and to mutter and utter their griefs in private: but afterwards in process of time the matter was presented before the LL. of the Councill, and brake forth to open complaint in publike places. The Ædiles and Triumvirs Capitall were blamed much, and sharply rebuked of the Senate, for not redressing these disorders: and when they went in hand to rid the common place of this multitude, and to cast down, over-turn, and sling away the preparation and provision for their sacrifices and oblations, they had like to have been misused and mischieved by the people. When this malady and disorder seemed now to be greater than might be remedied and reformed by the meaner and inferiour Magistrate, M. Æmilius, Prætor of the City for the time being, received Commission by order from the Senate, to see that the people were eased and delivered from this new religion and superstition. He not only read unto them in a publike assembly the decree of the Senate in that behalf, but also made proclamation, Imprimis, that who-soever had any books of prophetes or prayers, or treaties written of this art and science of sacrifices, should bring in all those books and writings unto him before the Calends of April next ensuing. Item, that no person should sacrifice either in publike place, or sacred Church, after any new form or forreign rights and traditions. And in that year there died certain publike Priests, to wit, L. Cornelius Lentulus the Arch-Prelate, or high Priest: and C. Papyrius Maffo, the son of Ælius a Bishop. Also P. Furius Philus an Augur and C. Papyrius Maffo the son of Lucius, a Decemvir deputed for holy mysteries. In place of Lentulus and of Papyrius, were M. Cornelius Cethegus, and Cn. Servilius Cæpio substituted high-Priest and Bishop. For Augur there was created L. Quintus Flaminius: and L. Cornelius Lentulus was choien Decemvir over sacred ceremonies and divine service.

Now the time drew near of the solemn election of new Consuls: but because it was not thought good to call the old away, (busied as they were in the wars) T. Sempronius one of the Consuls, nominated for Dictator, to hold that election aforesaid, C. Claudius Cento, who named for his Generall of the Cavalry Q. Fulvius Flaccus. This Dictator, the first comitiall day following, created for Consuls Q. Fulvius Flaccus above named, his Generall of horse-men, and Ap. Claudius Pulcher, who in his Prætorship had the jurisdiction and government of the Province of Sicily. Then were the Prætors elected, Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, C. Claudius Nero, M. Junius Syllanus, and P. Cornelius Sulla. When the Election was ended, the Dictator resigned up his place.

That year was Ædile Cn. Plautius, together with M. Cornelius Cethegus, one P. Cornelius Scipio, whose surname afterwards was Africannus. When he stood and made suit for the Ædileship, and the Tribunes of the Commons were against him, objecting that he was not eligible and capable of that office for that he was not of lawfull age to be a competitor, and to put in for it: If (quoth he) all the Quirites and Citizens of Rome will chooe me Ædile, I have years enough on my back. Whereupon, in favour and furtherance of his suit, there was such running and labouring on all hands to the Tribes for their voices, that the Tribunes suddainly forsooke their purpose to hinder him. And this was the largesse and donative that the Ædiles bestowed. The Roman Games were, according to the wealth of that time, exhibited and set out with great state and magnificence and continued one day longer than ordinary: and for every street throughout the City, was allowed a Constitio of oyl, L. Villius Tappulus, and M. Fundanus Fundulus Ædiles of the Commons, accused certain dames and wives of the City before the people, of dishonest and incontinent life: and some of them being condemned, they forced into banishment. The Games called Plebeii, were renewed for two daies: and by occasion of these games a solemn feast or dinner was kept for the honour of Jupiter.

Then Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time entered the Consulship, together with Appius Claudius: and the Prætors cast lots for their Provinces. It fell unto P. Cornelius Sulla his lot, to have the jurisdiction both of Citizens and Strangers, which before was executed by twain. To Cn. Fulvius Flaccus fell Apulia: to C. Claudius Nero was allotted Sæssula: and M. Junius Syllanus his hap was to have the rule of the Tuscans. The Consuls were appointed by decree of the Senate to war with Anniball, and to have under their command two legions apiece: and that one of them should receive his legions of Q. Fabius, the Cos. of the former year: and the other take his at the hands of Fulvius Centimalus. As for the Prætors, Fulvius Flaccus had Commission for the conduct of the legions at Luceria, which served under Æmilius Prætor there: and Nero Claudius was to have the leading of those that were under the hand of C. Terentius in Picenum: and that they should provide themselves of supply to make up the full number of the Companies. M. Junius had the charge of the legions of Citizens mitted the year before to serve in Tuscany: T. Sempronius Gracchus,

* About a wine gallon.

A Gracchus and P. Semprianus Tuditanus continued still in the government of their Provinces, the one of Lucania, the other of Gallia; and kept their own forces. Likewise P. Lentulus governed the old Province in Sicily: M. Marcellus was Lord Deputy of Syracusa; and so far as the Realm and Dominion of King Hiero reached. T. Octavius Admiral of the Navy. Greece was governed still by M. Valerius; Sardinia by Q. Mutius Scævola; Spain by P. and Cornelius Scipio. To the old armies before, there were other two new legions levied and enrolled by the Coss. So as in all, the whole forces for that year amounted to 23 Legions.

When the Consuls should muster the souldiers, they were hindered by occasion of a lewd prank played by one M. Posthumius Pyrgensis, to the great trouble and disquiet of the State and publike peace. This Posthumius was by his vocation and calling a Publican, who many years together for crafty and deceitfull dealing, for avarice and covetousness, had nor his fellow in all the City, but it were L. Raponius Veientanus again; the same man, whom the year before, as he foraged the territories of the Lucans rashly and unadvisedly, the Carthaginians by the conduct of Hanno had taken prisoner. These two (forasmuch as it was covenanted and indented before, that the transporting of those things which were for the provision of the armies beyond sea, should be warranted by the City against all danger of tempest; and that all damage and loss of goods that way miscarrying, should not lie upon the shoulders of the Publicans, who had undertaken by great to serve the armies, but be made good again out of the common Chest and Treasure:) these publicans (I say) not only gave false information of certain shipwracks, but also if they brought word at any

B time, truly of some ships that were perished, they were such only as were lost by their own fraud and deceit, and not cast away by chance or violence of weather. For they would freight & charge certain old vessels and shaken bottoms, with some few wares of small or no worth at all, and suffer them to sink for the nonce in the deep sea, and save the mariners and sailors with small pinaces and cockboats prepared aforehand for the purpose: and when they had done, lie shamefully and say, that they had lost merchandise and commodities in those ships of sundry sorts, and of great value. These cunning parts of theirs had been the year past revealed and notified to M. Emylius the Prætor, and the Senat by him made acquainted therewith: howbeit there was nothing done, nor any act of Senat devised for the chastisement of the offender: because the LL. of the Councill in no case would offend the company and society of these publicans and farmers, in such a

D time especially, when there was some need of them. Then the common people took the matter into their own hands, for to proceed with more severity against these lewd and fraudulent practices. At length, two of the Tribunes of the Commons, Sp. and Lucius, both Carvili, arose up and shewed themselves. For seeing how odious and infamous an indignity this was, and not to be suffered they brought M. Posthumius in question; and laid an action and set a fine upon his head, of two hundred thousand Asse. When the day of trial was come, whether the fine aforesaid should stand and be paid, or taken off and remitted; and that the Commons were assembled in so great number, that the great Court-yard of the Capitol would scarcely hold the multitude: the defendant spake for himself and pleaded at large. But the only hope that he seemed to have was this, in case C. Servilius Scaeva a Tribune of the Commons, a friend and near kinsman of Posthumius,

E would by vertue of his place come between and stop the course of law for proceeding farther, before that the tribes and wards were called forth, to go together and to give their voices. The two Tribunes abovenamed, having brought forth the witnesses to depose, and their depositions being taken, commanded the people to void and make way: And the lottery casket or foller was brought forth to cast lots, in what Tribes the Latines should give their voices. All this while the Publicans were earnest with Scaeva to dissolve the assembly by one means or other, and put off the Court for that day. The common people on the other side called on hard and gain said it. And as it fell out, Scaeva sat formost in one of the points and corners of the assembly. He wist not what to do, his mind was so perplexed for shame of the one side if he did not help his friend and kinsman, and for fear on the other side, because he see the people so eagerly bent. The Publicans seeing

F small hope of help in him, with full intent to make some stir, and to trouble the Court, put forward forcibly and advanced themselves through a void way, seized upon an high place, and between the Tribunes and the people, rushed in upon them, and fell to quarrell and brawl both with the people of the one side, and also with the Tribunes on the other: insomuch as they were like to go together by the ears. Whereupon Fulvius the Consul, "See ye not (quoth he to the Tribunes) how basely ye are accounted of and made of no better reckoning among them, than private persons? See ye not a riot and mutiny toward, unless ye make haste and break up the assembly? So the Commons were dismissed, and a Senate called: Where the Consuls made relation unto the Lords of the Councill, and complained how the solemn Session and Court of the Commons, was by the audacious violence of the Publicans disturbed: "That Court (I say)

G wherein M. Furius Camillus, upon whose exile ensued the destruction of the City, suffered himself to be condemned by ungrateful Citizens: wherein the Decemvirs afore him by vertue of whole laws the City is governed; and we live at this day: and wherein my principall Citizens afterwards have been content to beset down and judged by the people. Moreover how Posthumius Pyrgensis by force wrested from the Commons, the liberty of their voices and suffrages; subverted and made void the iudicial Session of the Commons: curbed the Tribunes and had no regard of them; came as it were in warlike manner against the people of Rome: and got for their vantage the higher ground, to keep the Tribunes from coming unto the Commons:

and to stop the tribes for being called to scrutiny and to give their voices: and nothing else was that kept men from committing a fray, and shedding blood, but the patience of the Magistrates themselves: in that for the present, they gave place to the furious rage and insatiable cruelty of a few: and for his will and pleasure brake up the assembly, before they could go together about the matter they were met for: (which the defendant himself with force & arms was ready to stop and hinder for going forward) because they might have no occasion given them to quarrel, which was the only thing that they fought for. When this matter with all the circumstances was thoroughly scanned of, and the best men there had spoken their minds, and given their opinion according to the outrageousness and indignity of the thing: and thereupon the Senate decreed, that this violence tended to the breach of common peace, and the hazard of the State (a most dangerous precedent to be suffered) then without more ado, the two Comitum Tribunes of the Com. laid aside clean all debating about the penall fine aforesaid, and indicted Posthumus of a capitall crime: and commanded him to be attached by a principall Serjeant, and to be led to prison, unless he put in good sureties for his appearance to answer the cause, such as would be bound for him body for body. Posthumus put in bail: and made default at his day. The then Tribunes called the Commons together, preferred a bill unto them, which they granted to pass in this form: That if M. Posthumus came not forth & made appearance before the Calends of May, and being cited and called that day, answered not to his name, and no lawful excuse alleged for his absence, they judged him to be a banished man, and therefore awarded his goods to be sold in port-sale, and himself to be excommunicate, and interdicted the use of water and of fire: and to lose the benefit of a Citizen for ever. This done, they began also to endite all those, one after another, of a capitall crime, who were his abettors, and the movers and stirrers of a sedition and commotion of the people, and to call for personal pledges. At the first they committed as many of them as could find no such sureties: and afterwards, those also that were sufficient to put in bail. For the avoiding of which danger, most of them departed into voluntary exile. This was the end of the Publicans fraudulent dealings: and this was the issue of their audacious enterprise, in defence and maintenance of their guile and deceit.

* 1 of May.

* Scapula rather.

After this, a solemn Court was called for the creation of the Arch-Prelate, and M. Cornelius Cethegus newly elected Prelate, was the President of this election. Three competitors there were, who sued for that Prelacy, and strived earnestly one against the other: namely, Q. Fulvius Placcus, Consul for the time being, who also had before been twice Consul, and Censor besides; also T. Manlius Torquatus, a man of great reputation, for that he had been likewise dignified with a double Consulship, and one Censorship; and last of all, P. Licinius Crassus, who as yet, was to suffer the Edileship: howbeit, this young man in that sute and contention was superior, and carried it away from those grave, ancient, and honourable persons. Before him, for the space of an hundred and twenty years, there had not been created any one, the highest Priest, (save only P. Cornelius Calpurnius) but had sit before in the Ivory Chair and born office of State. The Consul had much ado to go through with the Levy, and to enroll the full legion of souldiers, by reason that the small number of young and able men would hardly afford both to furnish out the new legions of Citizens, and also to supply and make up the old. Howbeit the Senate would not suffer them to give over their enterprise which they were about, but agreed that there should be chosen two Ternions of Triumvirs: the one sort of them to be sent out, within the compass of fifty miles every way from Rome, the other to go farther: with commission to take good view and survey, both within that precinct and without, in all through-fares and market towns: in boroughs and places of frequent assemblies: of all persons of free condition that they could set eye on: and so many as they thought able men of body to bear arms, although they were not come to the lawfull age for service, to press them for souldiers. Also it was decreed, that the Tribunes of the Commons; if they so pleased, should put up a bill, that all under seventeen years of age, who had bound themselves by military oath, should have as good pay, as if they had been enrolled souldiers at seventeen years or upward. By vertue of this decree, the two Ternions aforesaid of the Tribunes being chosen, made diligent search, and visited all the country over for free-born men accordingly.

At the same time letters came from M. Marcellus out of Sicily, concerning the demands of the souldiers who served under P. Lentulus, and they were read in the Senate House. That army consisted of the residue which remained after the field lost at Canna, and was confined into Italy (as hath been said afore) with this condition, not to return back into Italy before the Punic war should be ended. These souldiers obtained licence of Lentulus to send as Ambassadors unto Marcellus (where he lay in winter harbour) the principall men of arms, such as served on horse allowed by the City, the chiefe Centurions also and the bravest souldiers and choicest flower of the Legions. One of these in the name of the rest, having liberty granted them for to speak in his oration in this wise, "We had come to you into Italy, O M. Marcellus, when you were Consul, immediately upon that decree made against us (which if it were not unjust and unreasonable, yet surely it was heavy and rigorous enough: but that we hoped to be sent into this Province: so generally troubled and out of order by the death of the King, there to be employed in some dangerous and cruell war against the Sicilians and Carthaginians both at once, and so with our bloodshed and grievous wounds to make satisfaction for our trespass unto the Magistrates and rulers of Rome. Like as in our fathers daies, they which were taken prisoners

 "same Pyrrhus. And yet, I can not see, [my LL of the Senat] for what delight of our parts, ye "either have been displeased sometime, or are offended at this present with us. For me thinks,
 "I see both Consuls, and the whole body of the Senat of Rome, when I behold your face, O Mar-
 "cellus: whom if we had had to our Consul at Canna, it would have gone better both with the "Common-weal, and with ourselves, then it did. For I beseech you, suffer us now, before I
 "I make moan, and complain of our hard state and condition, to purge our selves of that crime "for which we are blamed. Set aside, thar neither the wrath of the Gods, nor destiny and fatal "necessity (upon the Law and decree whereof dependeth the immutable order and infallible B "course and consequence of all things in the world) was the cause that we were defeated & over"thrown at Canna, but our own selves, and our default was the occasion let us see then, whose "fault it was, the souldiers, or the Generals? For mine own part, I remember I am a souldier, "and of my Captain and General I will never speak but well: of him especially, unto whom I "know the Senat rendered thanks for that he despised not of the common-weal; and whose "government ever since his flight and running away, hath been prorogued from year to year, and "who hath had the conduct of armies continually. Neither will I say ought of the rest likewise, "who escaped that unfortunate foil and defeat, I mean our military Tribuns and Colonels, who
 "(as we hear say) sue for dignities, bear honourable offices in City, yea, and rule whole Provin"ces as LL. Presidents in foreign parts. It is foindeed my LL? do ye to easily pardon and forgive C "your own selves and children? and deal ye so hardly, so rigorously and cruelly, against us base ab"ject persons and vile wretches? And was it no shame and dishonor imputed to the Consul and "other great personages of the City to flee, when there was no other hope? and were the poor "souldiers sent by you into the field with this intention, to be all killed up, and none to escape? At "the battail of Allia, the whole army in a manner fled away: Also at the Straights of Caudium
 "(to say nothing of other shameful foils of our armies) the host yielded up their armor to the "enemy, before they joynd battel, and fought one strok. Yet, so far off it was, that those armies
 "sustained any infamy and shameful reproach therefore, that both the City of Rome was recovered
 "again by the means of those Regiments which fled from Allia to Ves, and also the Caudine le"gions which returned to Rome naked, were sent again into Samnium well armed: who subdued D "and brought under the yoke of subjection the very same enemies, who had taken such pride and "joy in that dishonour and ignominy of theirs. And now, for the army before Canna, is any man
 "able to come forth and charge them justly, that either they fled, or for cowardly fear behaved "themselves unbecomly, and not like souldiers? Where were slain in field above fifty thousand men:
 "from whence the Consul fled with fifty Horsemen, and no more: and of which company there is "not one remaineth alive, but whom the enemy, weary with killing, spared and left. I remember,
 "at what time as the prisoners taken there, were denied money to pay for their ransome, then "every man commanded and praised us, for saving and reserving our selves against another day, to "be employed in the service of the Common-weal: for returning unto Vesuvius to the Consul, "and for making a good shew of a compleat army. But now, in worse case are we, than in our E "fathers dayes, captives have been that were taken prisoners. For they only had their armor and "weapons changed for worse; their rank in the battel shifted; their place in the camp where "they should quarter, altered: which notwithstanding, they recovered again all at once, by per"forming their good devoir to their country, and winning a victory in one fortunat battel. Not "one of them was ever confined (as it were) to a place of exile: none put beside hope to be dis"charged from souldiery by serving out his full time: and to be brief, they were set to fight with "some enemy or other, where they might once for all, either lose their life, or end their dishonor.
 "And we, against whom nothing can be objected at all; unless it be this, that we were the cause,
 "and none but we, that some citizen of Rome might be said to remain alive of all those that were
 "at the battel of Canna: we I say, are sent far enough off, not only from our native country, and F "Italy, but also from all enemies: where we wax old in exile, to the end, that we should have no "hope, no occasion and opportunity to wipe away and cancel our disgrace, to mitigate and paci-"fie the anger of our fellow-citizens, and finally to die with honor. But it is neither end of "shame, nor reward of vertue and valour, that we desire and crave: but only that we might be "permitted to make proof of our courage, and shew our prowess. Pains and perils we seek for,
 "and to be employed in dangerous adventures, like hardy men and brave souldiers. Two years
 "already there hath been sharp and hot war in Sicily. Some Cities the Carthaginians won by "force, other some the Romans took likewise by assault. Whole Regiments of foot, many troops "and cornets of horse encounter together, and assail one another. At Syracuse there are great "enterprises and worthy feats of arms, both by Sea and Land. The shouts of them that fight, the G "very clattering and ringing again of their armor and weapons, we can hear where we are, and
 "we sit still like idle larks, and do nothing, as if we had neither hands nor weapons to fight with.
 "T. Simplicius the Consul, with legions of bond-slaves, hath bidden battel to the enemies, "and fought with them in plain field so oft, that they are well recompensed for their labour with "gaining their freedom first, and then the Burgeoise of the City. Let us yet, in place and quali"ty at leastwise, of bond-slaves taken up and bought for money against these wars, fight with "those enemies: as well as they have done, and by our fight tie, whether we can regain our en"largement and liberty. Will you your self, O Marcellus, make trial of us, and of our valour, by Sea, by Land, in pitched field, and battelranged, or in giving assault and winning of walled Towns? Put us to it, and spare not. The hardest adventures, the most painful and dangerous enterprises, are they which we require most gladly: that we may have that betimes, and at once, which we should have come unto at Cannae: seeing that all the time we have lived since, hath been destined to our ignominy and disgrace.

At these words they fell down prostrate at Marcellus his feet. Marcellus answered them, that he had neither power of himself, nor commission otherwise, to content them, and satisfy their request. Howbeit, write to the Senat he would: and according as the LL. should give advice and direction, so he would do and not fail. These letters (as I said before) were brought to the Consuls, and by them read in the Senat-house. And after deliberate consultation about their contents, the Senat passed this decree: That as concerning those soldiers, who had forsaken their fellows fighting before Cannae, the Senat saw no reason, why they should be put in trust any more with the affairs of the Common-wealth; but if M. Claudius the Proconsul thought it good otherwise, he might do according to that which he judged convenient, and to stand with his own credit, and the safety of the State. Provided alwayes, that not one of them be dispensed with, and freed from servile or charge of souldiery: nor rewarded with any military gift in testimony and token of his valour: nor yet reduced home again into Italy, so long as the enemy made abode there.

After this, the Pretor for the City, by virtue of a decree from the Senat, and an act of the Commons, assembled the people together. In which Session were created five Commissioners called Quingueviri, for the reedifying and repairing of the turrets and the walls: Likewise two other fraternities of Triumvirs, the one for taking an inventory of all sacred things, and to sign and note all offerings and oblations: the other for reedifying the Temples of Fortune and dame Minerva, within the gate Carmentaria, and likewise of Spes without the gate, which the year past were consumed by fire. Great and fearful tempests hapned this year. On the Alban mount it rained stones continually for two dayes. Many places were blasted and smitten with lightning from Heaven; and namely, two Chappels in the Capitol, and the Rampier about the camp and fort above Suessula in divers places thereof: and two watchmen in their Sentinels stricken stark dead. The wall and certain turrets, there on at Cumes, not only smitten but also shaken down and overthrown with lightnings and thunder-bolts. At Reate there was seen a huge stone to flie to and fro in the air. The sun also appeared more red than it useth to be, and like to blood. In regard of these prodigious sights, there was a solemn Profession and supplication all one day: and the Consuls for certain dayes together, attended only upon Divine service of the Gods: and the Novendial Sacrifices were devoutly celebrated nine dayes together.

Now whereas a long time already both Annibal hoped, and the Romans also suspected that the Tarentins would revolt: there fell out between, an occurrence and outward accident, which hastned it the rather. There was one Phileas a Tarentine, who having abode long at Rome under colour of an Ambassador leger, a busy headed man, and of an unquiet spirit, one that of all things could not away with rest and peace, in which so long as he lived he thought every day a year, and that now he was waxen old and aged therein, found means to have access unto the hostages of the Tarentins. Kept they were in the Close belonging to the Temple of Liberty, with the les attendance and careful eye, because it was expedient and good neither for themselves, nor for their City, to make an escape, and deceive the Romans. These hostages he had oftentimes solicited and perswaded by much talk and many reasons, and at length having bribed and corrupted two sextons and warders of the said Temple, he trained them forth in the evening out from the place where they were in safe custody: and when he had accompanied them onward on the way as a guide, and directed them how to pass secretly, he fled himself and they together. By day break the next morning they were missed, and their escape was noised throughout the City: Whereupon, men were sent out after them from all parts, to fetch them in again: who having overtaken them at Tarracina, laid hold of them, and brought them back to Rome: where in the Comitium, they were, by the consent of the people, beaten with rods, and then thrown down headlong from the cliff Tarpeia.

The cruel rigor of this punishment, caused much anger; and provoked two of the noblest and most famous Grecian Cities in Italy to indignation, not only in publick generally, but also in private particularly: according as any man was either in blood joyned, or in alliance and friendship linked to them who were thus foully and shamefully put to death. Amongst whom there were about thirteen noble Gentlemen of Tarentum, conspired together and the chief of them were Nico and Philonenes. These conspirators before they would stir and enter into any action, thought best to speak and confer with Annibal first: and so having gone forth of the City under a pretence as if they went to the chase a hunting, by night they came unto him. But when they drew neer unto the camp, the rest hid themselves within a wood neer unto the high way: Nico and Philonenes only went forward to the watch, and there being taken (as they requested themselves) were brought before Annibal. Who when they had delivered unto him their complor and upon what occasions they entered into that designment they were highly commended, and promised great rewards, and wiled and charged by him, that to the intent they might bear their country-men in hand, how they ever went out of the City to fetch in some booties, they should drive afore them into the City, certain cattel of the Carthaginians, which were put over to pasture and feeding:

A and herewith gave them his word to do it safely, and without any impeachment and resistance whensoever. Thus these young Gentlemen were seen to bring in good store of cattell: and as they were known to make this adventure the second time and oftner till, men marvelled the lesse at the matter, and suspected nothing. Now upon a new parling and communication with Annibal, they covenanted with him upon his faithful promise in these terms, Imprimis, for the Tarentins themselves, to enjoy freely their Lands and goods, and live under their own laws. Item, to pay no pension nor tribute unto Annibal, nor be forced to receive a garrison against their wills. And last of all, to betray the garrison souldiers of the Romans; and all their fortresses and places of strength deliver up into the hands of the Carthaginians. When these conditions and capitulations were agreed upon, then Philomenes uled much oitner to go forth and come in again in the night: and as he was known to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that exercise, he had his hounds following him hard at his heels, and all other furniture about him fit for huntmen: and lightly ever he took some wild beast or other with his hounds, or elie got something from the enemy, that of purpose lay ready for his hands: and alwayes as he brought home ought with him, he would bestow it either upon the Captain of the Roman garrison, or deal it among the warders of gates. And they all, verily believed and were perswaded, that his going out and in thus, most by night, was only for fear of the enemies. Now, when he had used this so accustomedly, that he had made it an ordinary practise, in so much, that at what time of the night so ever he had but once lured or whistled, the gate was streight set open for him: then Annibal thought it time, to put the C plot abovesaid in execution. Three dayes journey he was off; Where becaue he would have men the lesse marvail, why he kept a standing camp so long still in one place, he feigned and made himself sick. The Romans also, that lay in garrison at Tarentum gave over to suspect his long abode and leaguering there. But after that he was determined and resolved to advance toward Tarentum, he picked out ten thousand foot and horsemen together, whom he supposed for nimble bodies, swift footmanhip, and lightness of armor, to be most meet for expedition: and with them at the fourth watch of the night, he marched forward with his enignes. And having sent out afore-hand fourscore Numidian light Horses, he commanded them, to ride about and scour all the wayes on every side, and to cast their eye to espie and discover all the coasts, that no country people a far off might descry and view the army on foot, but they should be seen: and withal, to D bring in, as many as were gone before, and kill all them they met and encountered: to the end that the Peasants there inhabiting, might think they were Theeves and Robbers, rather than the vancurriers and fore-riders of an army. Himself in person marching with great speed and celerity, pitched his camp almost 15 miles from Tarentum. Neither would he there, be known unto his men of his purpose, nor tell them whicher they should go: only he called his souldiers together, and charged them to hold on the direct way, and not suffer any one to turn aside, nor in the march go out of his rank or file: and above all things, to be ready for to receive their charge and commandment from their Caprains, and do nothing without their warrant and commission. As for himself, he would when he saw his time, let them know his mind, and what the service was that he would have done. And about the same very hour and instant, news came as far as Tarentum, that E some few Numidian Horsemen forraged the country, and had put the villagers in great fright all about. At which tidings, the Captain of the Roman garrison was no more moved, nor made any other hast, but only gave order, that some of the Horsemen the next morning by day light should ride forth, to keep the enemy from farther excursions. In the mean time, they that had this charge, bare themselves so carelesly in providing themselves to execute that which they were commanded, that contrary-wise, they took those outrodes of the Numidians for a good argument, That Annibal with his army was not dislodged, but abode still in leaguer where he lay fitt. Annibal when it was once dark and dead night, began to set forward. Philomenes was there ready to be his guide, loden with his game hunted as his manner was. The rest of his conspiracy waited their time to execute their several charges, as it was agreed among them. Now it was ordred between F them afore, that Philomenes coming in at the usual little wicket, with his venison that he had hunted, should bring in with him some armed men: and Annibal on another part, come to the gate called Tamenis, which looked toward the East, and stood on the Land side of the City, a good way within the wall, as it were in a nook. When Annibal approached the said gate, he made a fire, in token that he was come (as it was devised between them before) and it flamed forth and gave a shining light. The like did Nico again. Then the fires on both sides were put out, that they made no more blaze. And Annibal in great and still silence, led his army close to the gate. Nico came suddainly at unawares, upon the watchmen fast asleep, killed them in their beds, and opened that gate. Annibal entred with his Regiment of footmen, and commanded the cavalry to stay behind, to the end they might have liberty of open ground to ride, whithersoever there was need, G and as occasion required. Now by this time, Philomenes also was come neer to that little gate on the other side, where he uled to make his egress and ingreis to and fro. And when he had raised the watchman with his voyce so wel known, and with his whistle wherewith now he was familiarly acquainted, & said withal, that he was troubled with tugging and lugging of a foul & heavy beast: therewith the wicket was set open. Two lusty fellows there were carrying in the wild bore between them, and he himself followed with one of the huntmen, lightly & nimbly appointed, and whiles the watchman his eye was upon the two porters, that carried the beast, wondering at the bigness of the bore, and took no heed to himself, Nico thrust him through with his spear. Then tred in after them, about thirty men armed, who killed the rest of the watch, and brake down the great gates withal: and immediately there entered the companies with banner displayed: and so, forth from thence they were conducted and brought to the market place, without making any noise, and there joyned themselves to Annibal. Then Annibal divided two thousand Gauls into three Regiments, whom he sent into sundry parts of the City: and gave order to the Tarentins and the Affricans, to get possession of the most principal and populous places of the City: and when the cry and shout was once up, to kill all the Romans wheresoever, and to spare the Townsmen. But to the end that this might be orderly done, he gave direction to the young Gentlemen aforesaid of Tarentum, that so soon as they espied a far off, any of their own Citizens and Country-men, they should bid them be quiet and still, to hold their peace, to be of good cheer and fear nothing. By which time, they began to set up a shout and cry, as men use to do in a City taken by assault, but what the matter should be, no man of the Town or garrison could certainly tell. For the Tarentin inhabitants supposed verily, that the Roman souldiers of the garrison were risen up to sack the City: the Romans on the other side, thought that the Townsmen mutined, and they were in doubt of some traiterous practise. The Captain himself awakened and raised at the first tumult, escaped to the key, where he took a small Barge or whirry-boat, and fled to the Castle. The Trumpet also that sounded from the Theatre, made the greater terror: for it was both a Roman Trumpeter, provided aforehand for the purpose by those Traitors, and a Grecian blew it, one who had no skill: and so it was doubtful, both who he was that sounded and who they were that he gave signal unto. When day appeared, and the Romans saw the armour of the Carthaginians and Gauls, then they wist well in what door the wind was, and how the World went: and the Greeks seeing the Romans lying along every where slain, were soon aware that the City was taken by Annibal. But after it was broad day light, and that the Romans who remained unkilld, were fled into the Castle, and the noise and hurliburly began by little and little to slacke and give over: then Annibal commanded the Tarentins to be called to a general assembly, and to present themselves without arms. When they were all come together, but only those who with the Romans were fled for company into the Castle, there to abide such fortune as they: Annibal spake kindly unto the Tarentins, gave them good and friendly words, rehearsed with great protestation what favors he had shewed to all their Citizens, whom he had taken prisoners either at Thrasymenus, or at Canna: and withal, after he had bitterly inveighed against the Lordly and proud rule of the Romans, he commanded every man to repair home to his own house and set his own name upon his dore: for that, so many houses as had not the name written upon them of the Master thereof, he would presently upon sound of Trumpet, command to be rifled. Over and besides, that if any one should hap to write his own name, and set it on the door or lodging-house of a Roman (for he saw divers of their houses empty) he would take him for an enemy, and deal with him accordingly. After this speech ended, and the assembly dissolved, when the doors were marked with their titles and inscriptions aforesaid, whereby the houses of friends and enemies were known distinctly one from another: the signal was given by sound of Trumpet: and then there was running every where from all parts to ransack the lodgings of the Romans. And some pretty sprinkling of pillage they met withal. The next day after, he advanced against the Castle to assault it, which after he saw impregnable and not possible to be won, either by forcible assault, or by artificial devices of fabricks and engins, by reason that both the Sea came to it, wherewith the greater part thereof was compassed, in manner of a demy Iland, and also fortified besides on another part with exceeding high and steep rocks: and withal, fenced from the City with a strong wall and deep ditch: therefore, because he would neither let nor hinder himself from achieving greater affairs, while he was carefully busied onely about defending the Tarentins, nor yet leave them without a strong guard, for fear lest the Romans from out of the Castle, might at their pleasure come upon them, he determined to raise a rampier for a partition between the Castle and the City, for their defence against the said garrison. And he was not out of hope, but that when the Romans should offer to issue forth to hinder the said work, they might also be fought withal: and in case they adventured rashly to run on, and engage themselves too far, they might be cut off in their heat, & the forces of the garrison might be so diminished & abated by some great slaughter & execution, that the Tarentins of themselves should be able with ease to defend their City against them. The said work was not so soon begun, but the Romans all of a sudden, set open the Castle gate, sallied forth & charged upon the pioneers as they were labouring about their bulwark. The guard that attended for the defence of the workmen, and stood before their work, fell off and suffered themselves to be put back, to the end that the enemies upon their first success, should be more adventurous: supposing that the further they gave ground, the more of the other would follow after and chase them. Which being perceived, the Carthaginians whom Annibal had kept close for this purpose, and had in readines very well appointed, rose out of all parts, and made head again. Neither were the Romans able to abide their forcible violence. And sic they could not in multitudes by occasion that the straightness of the place would give no leave: and besides, many things lay in their way: partly the work that was begun, and partly, other provision of stuffe brought for the same, which mightily hindered and impeached them. Most of them fell headlong into the trench: and to be short, more perished in their flight, than were killed in the fight. After this the fortification went in and again, and none durst venture to hinder it. So he cast a mighty deep ditch, & raised an high rampier within it. Also behind it, a pretty distance off, he went in hand

A to build a mure or wall to it, in the very same quarters: that they might be able even without any guard at all, or strength of men, to defend themselves against the Romans. Howbeit, he left them an indifferent band of souldiers, which might withal help out somewhat in making of the wall. Himself then departed with the rest of his army as far as the River G. Iesus (five miles off from the City) and there encamped. From which standing camp, he came back once again to survey the work: and finding that it went better forward than he looked for, he began to conceive some good hope that the citadel also might be won by assault. For why it was not defended surely by situation on high ground, as others are, but seated on a plain and divided from the City, by a wall only and a ditch. Now when as it began to be assailed with fabricks, and artillery devised of all sorts, there hapned a new supply to be sent from Merapontum to aid the garrison: whereby the Romans took heart unto them, in so much as in the night time of a suddain and before they were looked for, they set upon the fabricks and ordinance of the enemies planted thereupon: some they cast down and overthrew, others they fired and consumed. And there an end of Annibal his assault of the Castle from that side.

The only hope behind now, was in continual siege: and yet that hope promised no great effect, because they that held the Castle, had the Sea free at their command, all that side, whereas the said fort (standing as it were in an half Island) overlooketh the mouth of the haven: and the City contrary-wise, was wholly secluded from all enter-courie of passage and commodities coming in by Sea, and liker were they that besieged the fortres, to feel the want and scarcity of victuals, than those that were besieged within it. Then Annibal, after he had called together the principal citizens of Tarentum, laid open unto them all, the present difficulties, saying; "That he neither saw any way to win by force the Castle so strong and fortified as it was, nor had any hope at all to gain it by siege, so long as the enemies were Lords of the Sea. But if they had ships once, whereby they might hinder and stay the coming in of their victuals and other commodities, the enemies immediatly would either quit the peece, or yeeld themselves. The Tarentins held well with that, and approved the device. But (say they) he that giveth us that counsel, must also affoord us means to effect the same. For the Carthaginian ships if they were sent for, and set out of Sicily might well do the feat: mary, as for our own which lie shut up as it were, within a little creek and bay, considering, that the enemy keepeth the mouth and entry of the haven, how is it possible that they should get out from their harbour into the open Sea, and pass without danger? Pass (quoth he?) Pass they shall, make no doubt of that. Many things, I tell you, considered in their own nature are cumbersome and difficult, but by policy and wit of man are easily welded and wrought with a sleight. Ye have a City here seated upon a plain and champain ground, the wayes answering to every side of it are even, large, and broad enough, yea, and open to all quarters. I will chuse that way which crosseth the midt of the City, and passeth along to the haven and the Sea, and so will carry and transport the ships upon wains, with no great ado and trouble. And so, both the Sea shall be ours clear, which now the enemies keep, and also we shall besiege the Castle round, as well by Sea as by Land: nay, more than that, within short time we shall either enter it, being abandoned of the enemies, or else be masters both of it and them together.

These words not only put them in good hope, that the enterprize would be effected, but also set them in a wonderful good conceit and admiration of the Captain himself. Then out of hand, all the wains and carts were taken up from all places as many as could be had, and were put together, and coupled one to another. Divers cranes and other instruments were set to, for to draw up the ships to Land the way made plain and level, that the carts might go more easily, and pass away with less trouble and more expedition. After this they got together draught oxen, cart jades and other labouring beasts, yea, and men also for to draw: and thus the work was lustily begun, inso-much, as within few dayes, the fleet well rigged, appointed, and dressed, was brought about the Castle, and rid at anchor even in the avenue & entry of the haven. In these terms stood Tarentum, when Annibal left it, and returned back to his wintering harbours. But authors write diversly of this revolt of Tarentum, whether it hapned the year past, or at this present. But the greater number of them; and those that lived neerer to that time, when the remembrance of these matters was fresh, affirm that it was this very year.

At Rome, the Consuls and Pretors both remained still, until the * fifth day before the Calends of May, by occasion of the Latin holy-dayes, upon which day, when they had performed a solemn sacrifice, with all complements thereto belonging, on the Alban Hill, they departed every one to his severall charge and Province. After this, there crept into the minds of men a new scrupulosity of conscience upon certain propheticall verses of one Martius, a noble and famous Prophet in times past. Now, by reason that in the year before, there was diligent search and inquisition made, for such books of Fortune, according to a decree granted out of the Senat, those verses came to light, and to the hands of M. Emilius Pretor of the City, who sat upon that commission. And he immediatly gave them to Sulla the new Pretor. Of two Prophecies of Martius, the one, which afterwards caried the greater authority with it, by reason of the event that hapned so right, and declared it so evidently, caused the other also, whereof the time was not yet come, to be of credit and believed. The former contained a Prediction of the overthrow at Canna, in these or such like words:

From Trojane line, O Romane once descended, Flie Canna River, neer to Cannæ Town :
 Lest strangers born, who have thy death intended,
 Force thee to fight on Diomedes his down.
 But warning mine, thou wilt not rest upon,
 Until with blood thou first do fill the plain ;
 And then to Sea from fruitful Land, anon Thy men shall down the stream by thousands slain.
 Thy flesh must bait the fish in Ocean deep,
 And lure the fowles that flie from high to prey,
 And feed wild beasts, on earth below that keep.
 Mark well my words. Jove thus me taught to say.

If enemies ye would expel, if botch and plague sore
 * Sent from a far, ye would drive forth, and vexed be no more;
 To Phœbus (Romans) I advise, ye vow, from year to year
 To set forth playes in solemn wise, with mirth and merry chear.
 From publick stock, the people must, part of the charge disburse :
 The rest shall ye, for you and yours, defray with privat purse.
 The soveraign Pretor must procure these games to be perform'd,
 Who sits in place, mens pleas to hear, and see all wrongs reform'd.
 Then shall the ten Decemvirs hight, the Greeckish rites observe,
 In slaying beasts for sacrifice, and nothing from them swerve.
 If all be done accordingly, your joy shall aye increase,
 Your State shall daily grow in wealth, and fruits of blessed peace.
 For God Apollo will you save, he will your foes destroy,
 Who at their pleasure wast your fields, and work you much annoy.

For the explanation and expiation both, of this prophesie, they took one whole day. And the morrow after, there passed a decree from the Senate, That the Decemvirs should peruse and look into the books of Sibylla, about the exhibiting of those said games, in the honour of Apollo, and celebrating likewise of the sacrifices. And when all was perused, and relation made before the Senat : the Lords made an Act, and set down an order : First, to vow and set forth solemn pastimes accordingly, to the honour of Apollo. Item, After the Games were done and finished, to allow the Pretor * twelvethousand Asles, toward the expenses of the divine service, and two greater beasts for sacrifice. There passed also another Act of the Senat, That the Decemvirs should celebrate divine service, and sacrifice after the observance and rites of the Grecians; and offer upon the Altar these beasts, to wit, an Ox with gilded horns, and two white femal Goats, with gilded horns likewise, for Don Apollo : and a Cow with horns, in like manner gilded, for Dame Latona. The Pretor, when he was to represent the Games within the Circus Maximus, gave commandment, and made proclamation, That the people, during the time of those solemnities, should contribute money, for an offering to Apollo, every man according to his ability, and as he might well spare. This is the beginning of the Apollinare Games and Playes exhibited for to obtain victory, and not for to escape some plague or pestilence, as most men suppose. And when they were celebrated, the people stood to behold and look on, adorned with garlands upon their heads, and the dames and matrons of the City went in procession, and made supplications. Every mans doore was set open, and they feasted and made good chear generally through the City in the open street; and a high holyday this was, solemnized with all kind of ceremonies that could be devised.

But to return again to Annibal, who was about Tarentum; and both Consuls remaining in Samnium, but ready, as it seemed, to besiege Capua : it fell out, that the Campanians already were distressed with hunger and famine, (a calamity that usually followeth long and continual siege) and the reason was, because the armies of the Romans had impeached and hindred their seednesse. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors to Annibal, beseeching him, that he would take order for grain to be brought into Capua, from all parts neer adjoyning, before that the Consuls were come abroad with their legions into their territory, and all the wayes beset, and passages stopped by the guards and companies of the enemies. Whereupon, Annibal gave direction to Hanno, that he should remove out of the country of the Brutii, and passe over with his forces into Campania, and endeavour so, that the Campanians might be provided of sufficient store of corn. Then

A Hanno dislodged anon, and departed with all his power out of the * Brutians countrey, purposing to avoid the leaguer of his enemies, and namely the Consuls, who lay in Samnium: and when he approached neer to * Beneventum, he pitched his Tents three miles from the City it self, upon a high ground. After which, he commanded, that the corn should be brought to him into his camp, out of all the associat and confederat Cities thereabout, into which it had been carried in the summer afore; and allowed a good guard for the safe convey thereof. After this, he sent a messenger to Capua, to give them notice, upon what day they should attend, and be in readinesse to receive their corn; and against the time, provide out of the countrey for the carriage, carts, wains, and draught-beasts, and pack-hories of all sorts. But the Campans, like as they carried themselves in all things else, idly and negligently, so in this they were very slack and retchless: for they sent little above forty carres, and some few beasts for carriage besides. For which they had a check given them, and were rebuked by Hanno; because that hunger, which causeth the very dumb beast to bestir it self and make hard shifts, was not able to prick them forward to be more careful about their own business. So there was a farther day appointed for to fetch their corn, and to come more furnished and better provided for carriage. All this being reported to the men of Beneventum, with the circumstances and particulars, as it was, they addressed with all speed ten Embassadors to the Roman Consuls, encamped then about Bovianum. Upon which intelligence given of the affairs at Capua, they took order, and agreed between themselves, that one of them should conduct an army into Campania. And Fulvius, who undertook that charge, marched by night to Beneventum, and put himself within the walls of the Town. And there he was advertised by them that dwelt neer hand, That Hanno was gone out with part of his forces, for to purvey corn; that there were 2000 carts come, with a rude and disorderly multitude besides of people, without armor; that all that they did was in hurry, in haste, and great fear; and finally, that the camp was out of form and fashion, and all good military order cleane gone, by reason of a rabble & multitude of country clowns, come out of those quarters, and entermingled amongst them. The Consul, I say, being enformed for certain by credible persons, of these things, gave his souldiers warning to make ready against the next night ensuing, nothing but their ensignes and weapons, for that they were to charge upon the camp of the Carthaginians. And so they set forward at the relief of the fourth watch, leaving their packs and trusses with all their baggage and baggage behind them at Beneventum: and presenting themselves before the camp, somewhat before day, they put them into such a bodily fear, and so terrified them, that if it had been pitched upon a plain ground, no doubt, it had been won at the first assault. But the height of the place, and their rampiers and fortifications besides, which could not possibly be entered upon, without climbing upon the steep hill with much difficulty, were a defence unto it. By day light there was a lusty assault given, and a hot skirmish begun, but the Carthaginians not only defended and kept their rampier, but also (as having the vantage of the ground) they chased and thrust the enemies back, as they mounted up the hill. Howbeit, resolute hardinesse overcame all hardnesse and difficulties whatsoever; For in diverse places at once they advanced as far as the banks and trenches; but it cost bloody blows first, and the death of many a souldier. The Consul therefore calling the Coronels and Marshals together, said, it were not amisse to give over that rash and heady attempt, and, as he thought, it were the safer course, for that day to retire the army to Beneventum, and on the morrow to encamp themselves afrent the enemy, to the end, that neither the Campans might get forth, nor Hanno return and enter into the Town again. And that this might be the sooner effected, and with a great deal more ease, he would send for his Colleague also with his army, and both of them jointly bend their forces that way. But these devices of the Captain general were soon dashed. For as he was about to sound the retreat, the souldiers with a loud voyce cried out, that they could not away with such faint Captains; they scorned to be commanded in so cold and slothful service; they would none of that: and so put the Consul out of his bent. It hapned, that next unto the gate entring into the enemies camp, there served a cohort or company of the Peligni, led by Captain Vibius, who caught the banner out of the bearer his hand, and flung it over the rampier, and with that, fell to cursing himself and his company both, wishing a plague light upon him and them to, if the enemies went away with that banner: and therewith led himself the way, and brake first through the trench, and over the pallisado into their camp. Now by this time the Peligni fought within the rampier: and then Valerius Flaccus a Coronel of the third legion, from another side fell to upbraid the Romans, and hit them in the teeth with their beastly cowardice, for suffering their allies to have the honor of entering and taking the camp. Whereupon T. Pedanius (a centurion of the Regiment called Principes, and serving in the first place thereof) took likewise an ensign from him that carried it, and withal, Now shall, quoth he, this ensign, and this Centinere (meaning himself) presently be within the rampier of the enemies: let me see who dare follow, and save it from being taken by the enemy. At first, his own band and company followed him hard at heels, as he clambred to get over the rampier, and then the whole legion came after likewise. By this time, the Consul also seeing his souldiers climbing over the rampier, changed his purpose, and was of a clean other mind: and from calling and reclaiming his souldiers back, fell to exhort and encourage them, shewing in how great hazard and danger a right hardy and valiant cohort of allies were, and the whole Legion of Citizens besides. They all therefore set to, and every man did his best: and notwithstanding there was many a dart driven and javelin lanced, notwithstanding the enemies opposed posed their armor and bodies full against them yet they never flinted to assay every place, as well high as low, until they were broken through, and gotten in. Many a man was hurt (ye may be sure) but yet even they that bled until they fainted, and were not able to fight any longer, carried this mind and strove withal, to die yet within the rampier of their enemies. Thus in the turning of an hand the camp was won, as easily as if it had been pitched upon a plain and even ground, and not fortified at all with trench and rampier. From this time now, there was no more fighting, but killing on all hands in that tumult and confusion of pell mell within the camp. Slain there were of enemies more than six thousand, and above seven thousand taken prisoners, together with the Campan purveyors for corn, and all the provision of wains, carts, and labouring beasts. Besides another huge booty was taken, which Hanno when he went a foraging all abroad, had raised out of the country of the associates of the people of Rome. Then the Consul after he had cast down all the fortifications of the camp, returned from thence to Beneventum. And there both the Consuls together (for Ap. Claudius also thither came after a few dayes) made sale of all the prizes and pillage, and divided the same. Vibius the Pelignian, and T. Pedanius a principal centurion of the third legion, by whose forward and singular good service, the camp of the enemies was forced, were rewarded especially above the rest. Hanno then together with some few forragers whom by chance he had with him, returned from Cominium Ceritum (whither the news came of the losse of the camp) into the Bruttians country, more like one that fled in rout, then marched in warlike order.

The Campanians also having heard, as well of their own losses as of their allies, sent Embassadors unto Annibal, to certify him: "That both the Consuls were at Beneventum, that the war was "within a dayes journey of Capua, and but a step from the very gates and walls of the City: and "unless he made good hast to succour and rescue them, Capua would sooner come under the "obedience and subjection of the enemies than Arpi did. And he was not to make such a reck- "ning of all Tarentum (much less then of the Castile alone) as in regard thereof to leave Capua un- "defended, and yeeld it to the people of Rome, Capua I say, which he was wont to compare and "make equal with the City of Rome. Annibal promised that he would take care for the good estate of the Campanians: and for the present he lent two thousand Horsemen with the Embassadors, as a guard to keep the country and territory from invasion and spoil.

The Romans in this mean time, among other their affairs, neglected not the safety of the Castle of Tarentum, and the garrison there beleagued. For C. Servilius, Lieutenant, by order and authority of the Senat, was sent by P. Cornelius the Pretor into Hetruria, to purvey for corn, and to buy store: who with certain ships laden therewith, arrived in the haven of Tarentum, passing even through the guards of the enemies. At whose coming, they that before whiles they had but small hope, were oftentimes by way of parly moved by the enemies to go to the contrary side, now themselves began to perswade and sollicit the enemy to come unto them. And the garrison surely was strong enough, considering that the souldiers which lay at Metapontum, were drawn from thence to the defence and keeping of the Castle of Tarentum. And therefore the Metapontins, so soon as they were delivered of the fear whereby they were kept and held in as with a bit, revolted unto Annibal. Semblably did the Thurins also, who inhabited the same tract by the Sea side. They were moved and perswaded thereto, not so much by the rebellion of the Tarentins and Metapontins, with whom they were linked in kindred, and joyned neer in blood (over and besides that they were descended as well as they, out of Achaia) as with anger toward the Romans for the hostages lately by them killed. Their friends therefore and kinsfolk dispatched letters and messengers unto Hanno and Mago (who were in the country of the Bruttii neer at hand) offering to deliver the City into their hands, if they brought their power and presented it before their walls. Now was there one M. Atinius, Captain there over a small garrison, whom they supposed might be easily drawn forth of the Town to make some rash and inconsiderat skirmish, presuming not so much upon his own souldiers (who were but an handful) as upon the youth and stout of the Thurians, whom he had of purpose enrolled into bands and companies, and furnished with armor against the like occasions of service. The Carthaginian Captains afore named, had divided all their forces between them in two parts, and were entered into the territory of Thuri: and Hanno with his Regiment of footmen, advanced with banners displayed before the City: Mago with the Horsemen, staid behind close among the Hills, over-against the Town, and there lay secretly in ambush. Atinius then, who by his espials was enformed only of the squadrons of footmen, came forth with his forces into the field, ignorant (God wot) both of the falshood and treason of the Townsmen, and also of the covert trains and ambushment of the enemies. The skirmish of footmen was exceeding faint and cold, whiles the Romans being but few, fought in the vanguard: and the Thurins looked rather when the skirmish should end, than made any hast to fight themselves and help: and withal, the squadrons of the Carthaginians gave ground for the nonce, to train the enemy as far as the side of the Hill, under which, on the other side their Horsemen lay in wait and were ambushed. And thither they were not so soon come, but the Horsemen made hast to shew themselves, with a great outcry, and presently put to flight the raw and disordered company and multitude of the Thurins: who were not very fast and sound in heart to them on whose side they fought. The Romans albeit they were environed round, whiles the footmen lay still at them on the one side, and the Horsemen charged them a-fresh on the other side, yet they mainteined fight, and held out a long while: but at last, they likewise turned back

A back and fled to the City. There the traitors and conspirators being gathered together on heaps, so soon as they had let in at the gates standing wide open, the companies of their own citizens: when they saw once the Romans running apace in disorder toward the City, made a false alarm, crying aloud that the Carthaginians were at hand, and that both enemies and friends together intermingled, would enter the City, unless they made better hast to shut the gates. So they excluded the Romans out, and gave them as a prey to be hewn in peeces by their enemies. Howbeit, Asinius with some few, was received within the Town first. After this, there was some mutiny and dissension between the citizens themselves, for a little while. Some were of mind to stand upon their guard and defend the Town: others were of opinion, to yeeld unto fortune of the time, and deliver it up to the victors hands. But in conclusion, fortune and bad counsel together, (as for the most part it falleth out) prevailed. And so, after they had brought Asinius and his soldiers to the haven side, unto their ships for to be embarked, more upon good will that they bare to him for his mild and just government, and therefore were ready to save him, than for any regard at all they had of the Romans, they received the Carthaginians into the City.

The Consuls then led the legions from Beneventum into the territory of Capua, not only to make spoil and marre the corn, that was laid up already in strong Towns against winter, but also to afflict Capua: supposing they should make their Consulship renowned unto posterity, by the destruction of so rich and wealthy a City: and besides, do away that great dishonour and shameful blemish of the Empire of Rome, in suffering a City so neer unto them to continue now three years in rebellion, without revenge and condign punishment. But to the end that Beneventum should not be without a guard, and that against all suddain accidents and occurrences of war, in case Annibal should come to Capua, for to rescue and aid his allies, (which they made no doubt but he would do) there might be Horsemen to withstand his violence: they commanded T. Gracchus to come out of Lucania, with the cavalry and light armed footmen: and to take order and leave some other to govern the legions and the standing camp, for the guard and defence of those parts there.

Gracchus before he dislodged out of the Lucans country, hapned to have a fearful and prodigious token, as he offered sacrifice. For after the sacrifice was performed and accomplished, two Snakes came gliding out of a blind hole, no man knew how, to the entrails of the beast, and fell to eat the Liver: and so soon as they were espied, suddainly glid out of sight and were no more seen. Now, when as the bowel-pryers had given advice to kill a new sacrifice, and so soon as the inwards were opened and laid forth, to tend and look unto them more heedfully, the Snakes came again, as it is reported, the second and third time: and when they had once given as it were an assay, and tasted the Liver, they went cleer away without hurt and untouched. And albeit the Soothsayers aforesaid, had given an Item, and foretold, that this prodigious sight pertained properly unto the chief Captain and General, and warned him to take heed of some close persons and secret practices: yet his fatal destiny of death that hung over his head, could by no forecast and providence be altered and avoided. Now there was one Flavius a Lucane, the principal head of that bend and side of the Lucans, which when the other faction revolted unto Annibal, took the Romans parts: and having been by them chosen the Prætor, had continued in that place of Magistracy a year already: this man all on a suddain changed his mind and affection, and seeking to wind and enter into the favour of Annibal, could not be content to revolt himself, and to draw with him the Lucans to rebellion: unless he made a league also and covenant with the enemies, and sealed it with the murder and blood of his General: of him (I say) who being entertained and lodged in his house, he purposed villanously to betray. He entred therefore into secret speech and conference with Mago, Governour over the Bruttii, and having capitulated with him, under his faithful word and promise, That if he delivered the Roman General into his hands, the Lucans might live in freedom under their own Laws, in league and amity with the Carthaginians: he told him of a place into which he would bring Gracchus, with a small company and guard about him: willing Mago to put his foot and horse in arms, and in such a place aforehand, wherein he might bestow closely and secretly a mighty number of men. When the place was well viewed and considered all about, they agreed upon a day, for putting this plot in practice. This done, Flavius cometh to the Roman General Gracchus, and enformeth him that he had begun an enterprise of great consequence, for the accomplishment and full perfecting whereof, he needed the helping hand of Gracchus himself: "Namely, he had perswaded with all the Prætors and Governours, who in that universal and general trouble of all Italy, had revolted unto Annibal, for to return again into the league and friendship of the Romans: seeing that the Roman state and their Dominion, which by the overthrow at Canna was come in a manner to the lowest ebb, and sunk into extreme despair, flowed now again, and grew every day more than other, greater and mightier: whereas contrary-wise, the puissance of Annibal decayed much, and was well-neer come to nothing: besides, the Romans were men that might be appeased and reconciled again, especially the trespass being so long ago done and past: for never was there nation under the sun, more tractable, more exorable and ready to pardon a fault: and how often have they (to go no further for examples) forgiven the open Rebellion even of their fore-fathers and ancestors: These (quoth he) were my words unto them, and indeed, but my words. Many they had rather hear Gracchus himself speak, and hear the same from out of his own mouth: "they

"they would more gladly talk with him in person, and take hold of his right hand, which as the assured pawn of his faithful promise, he carrieth alwayes with him wheresoever he goeth, and they desire no more, I have therefore (saith he) appointed a convenient place of interview and conference: lying out of the way and forth of sight, but yet not far from the Romans camp. These the matter may be dispatched in few words, and all the name and nation of the Lucans, reduced under the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracchus suspecting no fraud nor harm, neither in his words nor deeds, sounding all to a great likelihood of simplicity and truth in his conceit, departed out of the camp attended upon with his Sergeants, and guarded only with a cornet of Horsemen: and so by the guidance of his own host, in whose house he lodged, was plunged headlong within the danger of the ambush of his enemies: Who, suddenly arose, and Flavim because he would put it out of doubt, that he was a traitor, went to their side and joyned with them. Then they let flie arrows, and shot darts against Gracchus and his Horsemen on every side. Whereupon Gracchus alight from horseback, and commanded the rest to do the same, exhorting them, that the only thing which fortune now had left unto them, they would grace and honour with vertue. For what remaineth else for us, (a small handful unto them) environed as we are with a multitude of them, within a valley compassed about with hills and woods, but present death? This only we are to resolve upon, Whether in this present amazement and heartles fear, we will as beasts suffer our throats to be cut without revenge again; or turning wholly our timorous expectation and suffering of death, into choler and courage, fight adventurously and manfully, and bathing our hands in the blood of our enemies, lose our lives, and fall down dead, upon the weapons and bodies of them, lying gasping themselves under us. Ah! that Lucan, that fugitive rogue and rebel, that treacherous and false traitor, see ye all lay at him. Whose hap it will be, ere he die, to be his Priest, to sacrifice and send him to the Devil, he shall win an honourable prize, and find no small solace and comfort in his own death.

Gracchus killed by his host, a Lucan.

With these words, he wrapped his rich coat of arms about his left arme (for they had not brought forth with them so much as their shields) and charged with exceeding force upon the enemies. The fight was far greater on their part than for the proportion and number of the men. The bodies of the Romans lay open most unto the shot. And thus overcharged on all sides from the higher places: as being in the valley subject to the volley of their darts, they were soon pierced through. When Gracchus was left naked alone, and his guard dead at his feet, the Carthaginians did what they could to take him alive: but he having espied among the enemies his good host and friend, that Lucan, ran among the thickest presse: where he was so fully bent to mischief him, that they could not will nor choose but kill him outright, without they would have lost the lives of many other. He was not so soon dead, but Mago sent him streight wayes unto Annibal, and commanded that his body together with the knitches of rods (belonging to his Magistracy) should be presented and shewed before the Tribunal seat of the General. And this is the true report of the end of Gracchus: to wit, that he let his life in the Lucan Land, about the plains which are called Veteres Campi. There be some that tell it otherwise, how he being accompanied with his Sergeants, and three serving men his bondslaves, went out from the camp within the territory of Beneventum, neer unto the River * Calor, for to wash himself: where there chanced his enemies to lurk, and lye in wait among the willows and salows that grew by the bank side, and so being unarmed and naked too, he was assaulted, where he defended himself as well as he could, with flinging at them pible stones such as the River afforded and carried down with the stream, and so was slain. Others write, that by advice of the Bowel-pyers, he went out of the camp half a mile off, for to purge and expiate in some pure and clean place, those prodigious tokens above rehearsed: and there was beset and environed round about with two troops of Numidian Horsemen, who hapned there to lie in ambush. See how variable and uncertain the same goeth, both in what place, and after what manner, this so noble and famous person came by his death. Nay, the very funeral and sepulture also of Gracchus, is diversly delivered. Some say he was entered by his own souldiers within the Roman camp. Others give out and say (and that is the more common report) that by the appointment of Annibal he was buried in the very entrance of the Carthaginian leaguer; that there was a funeral fire made in solemn wise to burn his corpe; that the whole army justed and ran at tilt and torment in their compleat armor; that the Spaniards leaped and danced Morrice; and each nation according to their guise and manner performed sundry motions and exercises as well of their weapons, as of their bodies: yea, and that Annibal himself in proper person, with all honor of funeral pomp that might be devised, both in word and deed, solemnized the obsequies in the best maner. This say they that affirm the thing to have hapned in the Lucans country. But if a man should believe them, who record how he was slain at the River Calor, then the enemies got nothing of him but only his head. Which being presented unto Annibal, he sent Carthalo immediately with it into the Roman camp, unto Cornelius the Treasurer or Quæstor: who there within the very camp performed the funerals of the General, and both army and citizens of Beneventum together solemnized the same right honourably.

Calor.

The Coniuls being entred into the territory of Campan, as they foraged all abroad, dragging one from another, were by the Townsmen of Cana which sallied out, and by the Horsemen of Mago, put in fear: whereupon in great fright and hast they rallied the souldiers to their colours, that that were ranged over the Country: but before they could well embattail them, and let them in array, they were discomfited, and lost above a thousand and five hundred men. Upon which good success, the enemies (as they are a nation by nature proud) began to be very lofty and exceeding audacious, insomuch, as they offered to skirmish sundry times with the Romans, and ever challenged them to fight. But that one battail, so unadvisedly and inconsiderately achieved, made the Consuls more circumspect and wary afterward. Howbeit, one small occurrence happened, which, as it encouraged and animated them again, so it abated the hearts, and daunted the boldness of the other: For in war there is nothing (be it never so little) but one time or other, it is the occasion of some great consequence and importance. There was in the camp one T. Quintius Crispinus, linked in special friendship and familiarity with Badius, a Citizen of Capua. Their acquaintance grew and encreased upon this occasion: This Badius upon a time, before the revolt of Capua, fell sick at Rome, and lying in Crispinus his house, was liberally and kindly used, yea, and tenderly seen unto by him, during his sickness. This Badius having put himself forward before the standing guards, that warded at the gate of the Roman camp, willed, that Crispinus should be called out unto him. Which being told unto Crispinus, he supposed no otherwise of it, but that he should talk friendly and familiarly with him. For albeit both nations generally were at enmity, in regard of the publick State, yet the private right and band of hospitality, remained still in force, and was not forgotten, and therefore he went out somewhat apart from the rest of his fellows. Now, when they were come in sight and interview one of the other. I challenge thee, O Crispinus (quoth Badius) to combat: let us mount on Horseback, and trye it out between us two, without any other companion, whether of us is the better man at arms. To this Crispinus made answer again and said, We want no enemies, neither you nor I, upon whom we may make proof of our manhood: as for me, if I met and encountred you in the very battail, yet I would decline, avoid, and shift from you, lest I should defile and stain my hand in the murder and bloodshed of my guest and friend. And with this he turned from him, and went his way. But the Campanian contrary-wise, upon these words, was the more eager with him, railing and rating at him for his effeminate cowardise and dastardiness, letting flie at the harmless and innocent man, all spiteful terms and reproachful language: which himself I wot (if he had his due) was well worthy of: calling him a friendly foe, and a kind enemy indeed, and finally charged him, that he made his excuse of sparing him, for friendship sake, whom he knew he was not able to match in manhood and valour. But if (quoth he) thou thinkest, that by the breach of publick league and covenant, our private bands of amity and hospitality, are not yet enough broken in sunder, then here I pronounce openly, in the hearing of two armies, That I Badius a Campanian, renounce all hospitality with thee T. Quintius Crispinus a Roman, and so farewell all friendship forever: I will, I say, have no more to do by way of acquaintance with thee, no society, no alliance, no hospitality will the guest have with that host, who in hostile manner is come to invade his native country, and to make assault upon the publick buildings and private houses thereof. And therefore, if thou be a man, meet me in the field. Crispinus drew back a long time, and was loth to enter into the action; but at last his fellow Horsemen, serving in the same troop and corner with him, forced and perswaded him, not to suffer that bragging Campanian, thus to insult over him without revenge. Whereupon he made no more ado, nor any longer delay, but whilst he went unto the L. Generals to know their pleasure, whether they would permit and license him, out of his order and rank, to fight with an enemy that challenged him, and gave him defiance. And having obtained leave, he buckled his armor about him, took his weapon, mounted on Horseback, and calling upon Badius by name, bad him come forth if he durst to single fight. The Campanian made no stay, and so with spear in rest, set spurs to, and they ran their Horses full career one at the other. Crispinus with his lance pierced Badius above his shield, through the left shoulder, and therewith unhorsed him, and when he was fallen to the earth with the push, he alight himself from his horse, minding on foot to fall upon him as he lay along, and so to dispatch him outright. But Badius, before his enemy fell upon him, left his targuet behind and his horse, and by good footmanship recovered his own fellows. Crispinus then, all goodly to be seen with the spoils of his enemy, made shew of the horse and armor that he had won, and bearing up withal the bloody point of his lance, was with much praise and great gratulation of the souldiers, brought honourably to the Consuls, and presented before them. At whose hands he was both highly commended, and also liberally rewarded.

Annibal having dislodged out of the territory of Beneventum, and removed into Capua, within three dayes after he was come thither, brought forth his forces into the field, making no doubt at all, but that, considering the Campanians his absence, had but few dayes before fought fortunately, the Romans now would be so much lesse able to abide his royal army so often used to victory. And verily when the conflict was once begun, the Roman battailions of the Infantry were much troubled and distressed, especially with the fierce assault of the Horsemen, who overcharged and pelted them mightily with their darts and javelins, until the signal was given to their own Cavalry also, to set hard to, and charge the enemies with their horse. Now whilst the men of arms were busy in fight on both sides, it happened that the Regiment of Sempronius Gracchus lately slain, were detected marching off under the conduct of C. Cornelius the Treasurer, which put both parts in like fear, lest they were some new and fresh enemies that advanced against them. So they sounded the retreat on either side, as if they had been agreed to so do, departed out of the field (as a man would say) on even hand, and retired themselves unto their several holds: howbeit, the greater number was slain of Romans, upon the first violent charge given by the Horsemen. From thence the Consuls intending to draw Annibal away from Capua, departed sundry wayes, Fulvius into the territory of Cumes, and Claudius into the Lucans Country. The next day, when Annibal was advertised, that the Romans had abandoned their camp, and that they were gone into divers parts with their several armies, being at first uncertain whom to pursue, resolved at length to make after Appius, and so began to do. But after he had once trained the enemy about to the place that he desired, he returned himself another way to Capua. And Annibal hapned also upon a new occasion presented to have a good hand of his enemies in those parts.

There was one M. Centenius, surnamed Penula, one of the chief Centurions of the Pilani, a singular good Caprain in that kind, as well in regard of his mighty and goodly body, as also of his brave mind, and valiant courage. This man having served out his ordinary time required by Law, was by the means of P. Cornelius Sulla the Pretor, brought into the Senat-house, and became a Petitioner unto the LL. of the Councel, that he might have the leading of five thousand footmen: promising that within short time, by reason he was so well acquainted with the nature and qualities of the enemy, and withal so much beaten in coasting thole quarters, he would do some great deed, and achieve a piece of notable service: and look, by what cunning devices and stratagems, both our leaders and our armies had been until that day, entrapped and over-raught, the very same would he use and practise against the enemy. He was not so vain and unadvised in making this offer, but they were as foolish and foolish again in taking him at his word, and trusting him: as who would say, A good Leader and Commander, and a stout and hardy souldier were all one. And so where as he demanded but five thousand, he had the charge given of eight thousand: whereof the one half were citizens, the other allies and confederats: and besides them, he himself also gathered together out of the country as he marched, a good Company of Volunaries: in so much as his power was doubled, by that time he came into the Lucans Country, where Annibal abode, after that he had followed Claudius in vain, and to no effect. But a man that had but half an eye, might see what the sequel and event would be of the conflict between General Annib. l. and Centinere Centenius: between both armies also, the one of old beaten souldiers used ever to victories, the other of raw novices and yong beginners, yea, many of them taken up suddainly in hast, and slenderly armed by the halves. For so soon as both hosts had confronted one another, and that on neither side they dallied and shifted off, but minded presently to go to it & fight: soon were they on both parts arranged in order of battail. And albeit the Romans had many disadvantages, yet they maintained skirmish more than two hours: and that so hotly and courageously, that they shrunk not one jot, so long as their leader stood on foot. But after that he once was stricken down and slain, who not only in regard and remembrance of the former name (that he had won) of valour and prowess: but also for fear of future shame and dishonor, in case he should remain alive after the defeat of his forces, whereof he was the only cause through his fool-hardy rashness, presented himself desperately upon the pikes of his enemies, where he might be sure of nothing but present death: and incontinently the Roman battail was discomfited and put to flight. And so hard bestead they were, in seeking wayes and means to escape (all the avenues were so laid and beset with the Horsemen) that of so a great multitude, there were hardly one thousand saved, all the rest miscarried here and there, and came by their death one way or other.

In this mean time, Capua was streightly beleaguered by the Consuls, and they began to assault it in most forcible manner: great preparation there was of all things needful unto such an exploit, and with great diligence every thing provided and brought accordingly. Corn was conveyed to Capitulum, and laid up there for store: at the mouth of the River Vulturnum (where now the City standeth) was the sconce and castle fortified (which Fabius before had built) and a strong garrison therein planted, to the end that both the Sea so near, and the whole River also might be at their command. Into these two fortresses standing on the Sea side, as well the corn which lately was sent out of Sardinia, as also that which Annus the Pretor had bought out of Hetruria, was transported from the Port of Ofis, whereby the army might be served plentifully all winter season. Over and besides that losse received in the Lucans country, the army likewise of the Voluntaries, which during the life of Crassus, had served truly and faithfully, now abandoned their colours; as if by the death of their Caprain they had taken themselves fully discharged from warfare.

Annibal made no small account of Capua: for willing enough he was, that his allies and friends there should not be forsaken and left in so great peril wherein they stood: and yet upon that fortunate success which hapned unto him through the rashness of one Roman Caprain, his fingers itched to be doing with another of them, and hoped to find some good opportunity and advantage to surprise and overthrow both Caprain and army. Whence therefore certain Apulian Embassadors advertised him, that Cn. Fulvius the Pretor, (who as the first in assaulting of certain Cities in Apulia, which had revolted unto Annibal, bare himself like a wife and prudent Caprain: now afterwards, upon his good fortune and happy success in those affairs, whereby himself and his souldiers had made up their mouths, and filled their hands well with booties and pillage) both himself and his men were grown so idle, and so dissolute, that no good government nor military discipl-

A discipline remained among them: hereupon Annibal having good experience, (as often heretofore, so in this late instance but few dayes past) in how man stead an army serveth, when it is directed by an unskilful Leader, removed his tentes into Capua. Now lay the Roman legions and Fulvius the Pretor, encamped about Herdania. And when the news came thither that the enemies were on their journey coming toward them, hardly might the souldiers be reclaimed and stayed, but they would in all hast pick up standard and ensigs, and straight wayes go into the field and bid them battail, without commission and commandement of their Pretour. And no one thing more held them back, than the assured hope they had to do it at their pleasure whensoever they would. Annibal the night following, having certain intelligence, that there was a tumult in the camp, and that most of the souldiers mightily importuned their General to put forth unto them the signal of battail, and called earnestly unto him for to lead them out into the field, made full account to meet with good opportunity and occasion, to have a fair day of his enemies: and therefore he bestowed three thousand men lightly appointed, in divers villages thereabout, among the thick groves and bushes, and within the woods: who at a sign given them, should all at once upon a suddain, start up and leap forth of their lurking corners: and withal, he gave order to Mago, with two thousand Horsemen or thereabout, to keep all the wayes whereas he supposed they were most like to flee and make escape. Having thus ordred all things beforehand in the night time: at the break of day he entred the field with his army, and embattailed himself in warlike manner. Fulvius for his part, was not behind: not induced so much upon any hope or conceit he had of good speed, as drawn and haled thereto, through the rash enforcement and compulsion of his souldiers. And therefore as they came forth to battail upon a head and hear, inconsiderately so they were set in array as disorderly: even at the pleasure of the souldiers, according as they came forth and took up their ranks and files, as they list themselves: and then again as the roy took them in the head left the same, either upon wilfulness or fear. The first legion together with the left wing or corner of Horsemen, were first marshalled: and the squadrons drawn and stretched out in a great length: notwithstanding the Knight-Marshal and Coronels cried out, that within, there was no strength nor power at all: and that the enemies wheresoever they should hap to charge, would break in upon them and go through. But no wholesome counsel for their own good might be taken and considered upon: nay they would not so much as lend their ear, and give them the hearing. And by this time Annibal was in place, with another manner of army (you may be sure) and otherwise ordered and arranged. And therefore the Romans were not able to abide so much as the first shout and shock of the onset. The Captain himself (as foolish and heady as Centenius, but in courage and resolution far short of him) seeing how the world went, the field like to be lost, his souldiers in fear and great perplexity: recovered his horse in great hast, and with some two hundred horsemen fled away and escaped: all the army besides, beaten back affront, beset behind flanked on the sides, and environed round, were so killed and hewn in pieces, that of eighteen thousand, there were not past two thousand saved. And the enemies besides were masters of the camp.

When these losses one in the neck of another were reported at Rome, the City was set in a great fit of sorrow and fear for the while: but so long as the Consuls, in whom rested the main chance, had hitherto prospered and sped well, they were the lesse troubled at these by-blowes and crosses in fortunes. Whereupon they addressed C. Lectorius and M. Minilius as messengers unto the Consuls, willing them to gather together with good care and diligence, those dispersed reliques and remainders of the two armies: also to have an eye and heedful regard unto them, that upon fear and desperation they yielded not themselves to the enemy (as it happened after the Cannian overthrow:) and last of all, to make diligent search and seek out those Volours, or voluntary servitors, that had abandoned their ensigs and called themselves. The like charge was laid upon P. Cornelius, who had commission besides to levy more men. And he made proclamation throughout all market Towns, fairs, and places of frequent resort, That those Volours should be found out and brought again to their own colours, to serve as aforesaid. All these directions were executed and accomplished with exceeding great care and diligence.

Appian Cl. dius the Consul, after he had made D. Junius Captain of the iconce erected upon the mouth of the River Palurnus, and M. Aurelius Cotta Governour of Puteoli, with commission, That as any ships [with corn] from out of Sardinia or Sicilia arrived there, they should immediately send the corn to the camp: went back himself to Capua: where he found Q. Fulvius his Colleague, transporting thither all provision from Caplinum, and making preparation for the assault of Capua. Then both Cons. jointly together besieged the City: and sent unto Cl. dius Nerva the Pretor, for to come unto them from Suessula, out of the old camp of Claudius. Who likewise leaving a small garrison there, to defend the place, with all his power and forces, descended into the plains before Capua. So there were three royal pavilions pitched for three LL. Generals about Capua: and three full armies in three sundry places began to fortifie, erecting bastions and forts in places not far distant: yea, and to cast a trench and raise a rampier round about the City. And in divers quarters at once, they skirmished with the men of Capua, whensoever they came to hinder their fortifications, with so good success, that the Townsmen were driven at last, to keep within their gates and walls. But before that those rampiers and trenches above said were fully finished, and all ends brought together, there were Embassadors dispatched unto Annibal, to complain in the name of the Capuans, as finding themselves grieved, that he had forsaken Capua, and in a manner delivered it into the Romans hands: and with all, to beseech him earnestly, that now or never, he would rescue and succor them, being not only besieged, but also shut up and almost trenched about, as within a prison. P. Cornelius likewise the Pretor of the City of Rome, sent his letters unto the Consuls, advising them before they had fully invested Capua round about, to make offer unto the Capuans of this liberty, That as many as would, might depart with bag and baggage out of Capua: and whosoever went forth before the

* Ides of March, should enjoy their freedom and all their goods and lands: but as many as after that day, either departed or tarried there still behind, should be reckoned no better than very enemies. These intimations were made known unto the Campans, but so light they set by them, that they fell a railing, reviling, and menacing the Romans, with most reproachful taunts and spiteful terms. Annibal was departed from Herdonia with his legions unto Tarentum, hoping either by force or fraud to gain the Castle. And seeing he little prevailed, he turned from thence, and took his way to Brundisium, supposing that Town would be betrayed into his hands. Whiles he lay there also and lost his time in doing nothing, the Embassadors of the Campans arrived and came unto him, with complaints and humble requests both at once. Unto whom Annibal made this glorious and lordlike answer with a Majesty: Once already have I raised the siege, and never will the Consuls, I trow, abide my second coming. The Embassadors having received their dispatch, departed with this hope: but much ado they had, to put themselves within Capua, so enclosed round was it (by this time) with a double trench and a rampier.

It fortuned at the very same instant, when Capua was thus streightly beleaguer'd, that the siege also and assault of Syracuse came to an end: helped forward and hastned by intestine treachery and treason withal, as well as by force of army and valour of Captain abroad. For Marcellus in the beginning of the spring, doubtful in himself and hanging in suspense, whether to bend his whole forces toward Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates, or still proceed to besiege Syracuse: albeit he saw the City might not possibly be won, either by forcible assault, (considering it was by situation both by Sea and Land invincible) or pining famine, by reason the passage in manner lay open to and fro between it and Carthage, for safe transporting of all sort of victuals: yet because he would leave no stone unrolled, but try all wayes that could be devised: he commanded certain revolts from the Syracusians (for there sided with the Romans some of the noblest persons of the City, who at the time of the first backsliding from the Romans, because they misliked and abhorred all rebellion and change in the state, were driven out and banished the City) to deal with their bend and faction by way of conference, to sound the hearts (I say) of such as were their followers, and to solicit them to their part: and withal to assure them (upon their warrant) that if by their means Syracuse were betrayed, they should live in freedom, and enjoy their own Laws as they would themselves. But no opportunity could they espie for to parly and talk with them. For by reason that there were many suspected to entline and draw that way, every man had a careful eye and regard unto them, that there could be no treachery practised, but soon it would be found out and detected. Yet a bond-servant toward one of the banished persons abovesaid, happned to be let into the City, pretending that he was run away from the adverse part unto them: who hapning to meet with some few, began to move and broach such a matter. After which, certain others lying close hidden under the nets in a fisher boat, came about by water to the camp of the Romans, and had conference and communication with those former fugitives and exiled men. And thus from time to time, this was practised in the same manner, by divers and sundry persons, until at length they were a crew of fourscore in all. Now when all things were concluded for the betraying of the City, neer upon the point of execution, it chanced that one Aistalus (a false brother among them, who took snuff that he was not specially trusted in the matter) disclosed the conspiracy unto Epicides, and appeached the parties: whereupon they were all put to extreame torture, and suffered death every one. When this plot would speed no better, they conceived hope another way, by a new occasion and occurrence that presently offered it self. There chanced one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, sent from Syracusa, as a messenger to King Philip for to be taken prisoner by the Roman armado: Now, both Epicides was very desirous and exceeding careful how to ransom him, and also Marcellus was not unwilling for his part to grant the same. For even then, the Romans began to affect the friendship of the Aetolians, with which Nation the Lacedemonians were confederat, and in league. So, when there should be commissioners and delegates sent on both sides, to parle and treat about his redemption the most indifferent place for them to meet in, was at the key or wharf of Trogili, fast by a turret which they call Galegrina, as being just in the midst between, and most convenient for both parties. It happned now, that as they had recourse oftentimes thither about this business, one of the Romans well viewed the wall neer by, he counted the stones that appeared in the forefront of the wall and made estimate to himself of their quadrature and proportion: and withal, giving a guess as neer as he could of what height (by his reckoning) and measure, the wall might be: and supposing it was a good deal lower than either he himself or others, had alwayes before taken it to be, and easy to be scaled with ladders, even of a mean size and middle sort; he relateth the matter, and his conceit of it to Marcellus. And in his opinion it was a thing not to be neglected, but to be thought upon. But forasmuch as there was no access unto that place, by reason, that for the lowliness thereof, it was the more carefully guarded and defended, it was thought good to wait for some opportunity and advantage to help that difficulty. Which, as good hap was, offered it self presently unto them by

A means of a fugitive: who gave them intelligence, that they held a solemn feast of Diana at that time within the City, and the same continued three dayes together: also he said, that for want of other things, during this siege to make good chear withal, they spared for no wine, but made merrery therewith in great plenty and abundance. For why? not only Epicides had bountifully bestowed wine upon the whole Commons, but also the great men of the City had in every ward and parish where they dwelt, allowed a proportion besides, of their own charges. When Marcellus heard this, he called unto him some few of his Colonels and knight Marshals, and conferred with them: and when they had sorted out certain choice and elect Centurions and souldiers, fit and sufficient men to adventure and execute so great a peece of service, and withal provided ladders
 B secretly: to all the rest he commanded a watchword and warning to be given, That they should betimes take their refection of meat and repose of sleep, for that in the night they were to be employed in an expedition and action of service. After this, when he thought it was about the time, that they (as having feasted all day long, and well filled their bellies with meat, and their heads with wine) were gone to rest, and newly fallen sound asleep, he commanded one ensign or company of souldiers, to carry ladders: and besides them, there were upon a thousand well armed and appointed, marching with silence and in thin ranks, brought thither to the place. When the foremost without any stir or noise at all, had scaled the top of the wall, others followed in their course. For the forward and resolute boldness of the former, was able to animate and encourage the rest, if they had been false-hearted. By this time now, the thousand armed soldiers had seized
 C that part, when the rest of the ladders were set to: and upon more ladders still, they gat up to the wall in diverse places, upon a signal given them from the gate Hexapylus. Unto which places the Romans were now come, and found no stirring at all, but exceeding silence and desolation, forasmuch as a great sort of them had made good chear within the turrets, and either were fast asleep with drinking wine already, or else were bibbing still, notwithstanding their eyes were heavy, and their hearts asleep. And yet, some few of them they took in their beds, and killed. Neer unto Hexapylus there is a little wicket, which with great violence they began withal, to break it open. So as now, both from the wall (as was before appointed) they gave signal by sound of trumpet: and also from all parts they went not to work any more by stealth, but plainly and openly without dissimulation. For they were come already as far as Epipola, a place full of D watchmen and warders. And the enemies were to be terrified now and stricken into fear, and no longer to be dealt withal by craft and guile. And it fell out so indeed, that they were mightily scared. For they heard not so soon the sounding of the trumpets, and the shouting and outcry of them that were possessed of the walls and one part of the City, but the warders, thinking all was gone, some ran along upon the wall, others leapt from the walls, or else were born down headlong, with the press of others that were affrighted. And yet many there were, who were not ware at all of this misery and extremity, both because generally they were all dead asleep, and also by reason that the City was so wide and large, that a thing felt and seen in some remote parts, reached not streightwayes throughout, to all the rest. The gate Hexapylus was broken down somewhat before day, at which Marcellus with all his power entred the City. He wakened them all, and E set them to their business: he made them take weapon in hand, and to help (what they could) a City in a manner wholly surpris'd and taken. Epicides made hast from the Island (which they themselves call Naxos) with a company of souldiers about him, making full account to drive them out again: as supposing, that they were but some few, who through the negligence of the watchmen and warders were got over the wall: and ever as he met with any that were scared and in fear, he said unto them erstwhiles, that they themselves made more ado, and every thing worse than there was cause, reporting all in greater measure and more fearful manner than need was in very truth. But when he saw all places about * Epipola full of armed men, after some small volley of shot, and little skirmish with the enemy, (whereby he provoked them, rather than did any good else) he turned back again with his companies, and retired into Acradina, not fearing so much the violence and multitude of the enemies, as lest some intestine mischief by this occasion might arise, and that he should find in this tumult and hurlyburly, the gates of Acradina, and the Island shut against him. Marcellus being entred within the walls, took his prospect from the higher places, and when he beheld under his eyes the most goodly and beautiful City of all others in those dayes, (by report) he wept and shed tears abundantly, partly for joy that he had brought his purpose to good a pass, and partly in compassion and remembrance of the ancient glory and renown of that City. He called to mind the navies of the Athenians by them sunk and drowned: he thought upon the utter overthrow of two puissant armies, together with the loss of two most noble and famous Captains of theirs: moreover, there came into his memory so many wars fought against the Carthaginians, with so great peril and hazard: so many and so mighty Tyrants and Kings that G rained and kept their seat and royal court there: and amongst the rest, he could not chuse but think of King Hiero, of fresh and famous memory, a Prince, who above all other gifts which his own vertue and fortune had graced and endued him withal, was recommended especially for his many favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome. When all these things presented themselves to his remembrance, with this cogitation besides, how all that beauty and glory within one hours space was ready to burn on a light fire, and to be consumed into ashes: before that he advanced his ensigns against Acradina, he sent before, those Syracusians who had conversed (as is afore-said) amongst the guards and garrison of the Romans, to perswade the enemies with mild and gentle

tle speech, yet, to yeeld the City. It so fell out, that the most part of them that warded the gates and walls both, of Acradina, were certain fugitive revolts fled from the Romans, who had no hope at all, upon any condition whatsoever to be pardoned. These would suffer none, either to approach the walls, or to parle and speak with any. And therefore Marcellus, after he saw that enterprise frustrate and disappointed, commanded to retire with the ensignes unto Euryalus. This Euryalus is a little mount and fort, situate in the utmost quarter of the City, remote far from Sea, and commanding the high way that leadeth into the fields, and the middle parts and very heart of the whole Island: a place very commodious for the taking up and receipt of all victuals. The Captain of this hold was Philodemus an Argive, placed there by Epicides. Unto whom there was sent from Marcellus, Sosis, one of them that murdered the tyrant: and after long communication, Sosis with crafty words abused by him, and colourably put off until another time, made relation unto Marcellus, that Philodemus had taken a farther day of respite and deliberation. But he put off still from day to day, trifling out the time of purpose, until Hippocrates and Himilco might come with their forces and legions, making no doubt, but if he might receive them into his fortres, the whole army of the Romans being now enclosed within the walls, should be overthrown, and utterly defeated. Marcellus seeing that Euryalus was not delivered up, (and forced possibly it could not be) encamped himself between Neapolis and Tyche (so are two parts of the City named, and may for their bigness go well enough for two entire cities of themselves:) for fear, lest it be were once entred into the populous and most inhabited places of the City, his souldiers greedy of pillage, would not be kept together, but run loosely up and down to rife. Thither came unto him from Tyche and Neapolis, Embassadors and Orators, with olive branches adorned with sacred veils and infules, humbly beseeching him to hold his hand from effusion of blood, and siring the City. Marcellus calling his Councel about these their petitions, rather than demands, after mature deliberation, by general consent of all, gave expresse and streight commandment to the souldiers, that no man should offer abuse or violence to the body of any free-born person whatsoever: as for all besides, his will and pleasure was it should be their booty. Now was the camp of Marcellus defended on both sides with housing in stead of a wall, and he bestowed a good corps de guard at the gates thereof, lying open over against the streets: lest when the souldiers ran to and fro in the City, the camp in the mean while might be assailed. Then upon the sound of Trumpet the souldiers fell to their business, ran into all parts, brake open dores, set all on a fearful hurry, but spilled no blood: and they never gave over ransacking and rifling, until they had cast out and carried away all the riches and goods, that had been a gathering a long time, during their wealthy and prosperous estate. Amid these stirs, Philodemus also seeing no hope of succours and rescue, after he had covenanted for his security; to return safe and without harm to Epicides, withdrew his garrison away with him out of the fort, and rendred it up to the Romans.

Now whiles every man was turned another way, and busied in that part of the City which was forced, Bomilcar taking the advantage of one night, wherein the Roman fleet by reason of a violent tempest could not ride at anchor in the main Sea, gat forth of the haven of Syracuse with 35 ships, and having Sea room, hoised up sails, and away he went with a mery gale of wind, leaving 4 behind for Epicides and the Syracusians: and after he had informed the Carthaginians in what danger the state of Syracuse stood, returned within few dayes with a fleet of a hundred sail, rewarded for his labor (as the report went) by Epicides, with many rich gifts, which the treasure of King Hiero paid for. Marcellus possessed now of the fortres Euryalus, and having planted there a garrison, was well rid of one care yet: for he doubted, lest if a new power of enemies had been received behind his back into that fort, they would greatly have annoyed his men, enclosed now as they were, and encumbered within the walls.

After this he besieged Acradina, and invested it round about, and fortified three several camps (in meet and convenient places) against it, hoping to shut them up into such streights, that they should be driven to extream scarcity and want of all things. Now when as for certain dayes, the guards of the one side and the other had rested quiet, suddainly upon the arival of Hippocrates and Himilco, they within began from all parts to set freshly upon the Romans. For, first Hippocrates (after he had encamped and well fortified himself fast by the great Key, and given a signal to them that kept Acradina) assaulted the old camp of the Romans, where Crispinus lay with his guard for the defence thereof: then Epicides also sallied forth, and brake upon the Corps de guard of Marcellus: and withal, the Carthaginian fleet approached close to the strand that lieth between the City and the Roman camp, to hinder that Crispinus might have no aid sent unto him from Marcellus. And yet for all this ado, the enemies made a greater stir and tumultuous alarm, than any skirmish to speak of: for Crispinus not only gave Hippocrates the repulse, and drave him from the defences of his own camp, but also followed him in chace, as he fled fearfully in hast away: and Marcellus forced Epicides to take the City again, and get it over his head. So as now they seemed very sufficiently provided and appointed against all dangers from thence forth, of their suddain sallies and irruptions.

Over and besides all these troubles, there hapned a common calamity unto both, the plague and pestilence: in such manner, as it might soon have withdrawn the minds, as well of the one part as of the other, from thinking any more of war. For, besides that it fell out to be the Autumn or harvest season of the year, the place it self by nature unwholsome, stinking and corrupt (but much more without the City than within) the extream and intolerable heat of the weather

A weather mightily distempered all their bodies generally, in the camps both the one and the other. At the first, by occasion of the distemperature of the season, and corruption of the place, they both fell sick and died: but afterward by visiting and tending one another that were infected, the disease grew catching and contagious, and so spread and increased more and more: in such manner, as either they that were fallen sick perished for want of looking to and diligent attendance; or if any came about them, to keep them and minister unto them, they were infected and endangered also as deeply as the other: so as every day a man could go no where, but either death, or corpses carried forth to their graves, were presented to his eyes: night and day in all places there was nothing heard but weeping, wailing, and piteous lamentation. In the end their hearts were so hardened and made savage again, by continual usage to this misery, that not only they gave over to weep over the dead, and to accompany them unto their sepulchres with due mourning and doleful plaints, but also to carry them forth and to inter them: so that the breathlesse bodies lay scattred all abroad on the ground in the sight of them, that looked every hour for the like miserable death themselves. The dead killed the sick: the sick infected the sound, partly with fear, and partly with the corruption and pestiferous stench that came from their bodies. And because they would die rather upon the sword's point, than of this maladie, some of them made offer to go alone among the armed guards of their very enemies, to be killed out of hand, and rid out of their misery. Howbeit, the plague was hotter by far in the Carthaginian camp, than among the Romans, by reason of corrupt water, and much slaughter committed there, and so long siege about Syracuse. For of the enemies army, the Sicilians at the first, so soon as they saw the sickness to spread commonly, and increase by reason of the corruption of the place, got themselves away, and stole every man home to the Cities neer adjoining. But the Carthaginians were faine to stick by it still, as having no place to retire themselves unto; and so, they together with their Generals themselves Hippocrates and Himilco, died all of them, and not one escaped. Marcellus when he saw this mortality grow thus hot, brought his people into the City, where the houses and shadowy places yielded some good refreshing to the sick and weak bodies: howbeit, many also of the Roman army went of it, and turned up their heels. Thus when the Land-souldiers of the Carthaginians were all gone and consumed of the plague, the Sicilians who had served under Hippocrates, withdrew themselves into certain Towns, which were not great, yet free and strong both by natural situation, and also by strength of walls and other defences: the one of them three miles from Syracuse, the other fifteen miles distant from the haven mouth: and thither they conveyed from out of their own cities adjoining, all manner of victuals, and sent abroad for aids of men.

In the mean while Bomilcar set sail once again with his fleet for Carthage, where he made relation of the state of their confederats in such terms, that still he fed them with some hope. That not only by their help they might be saved, but also that the Romans (notwithstanding they had in some sort forced and taken the City) might be surpris'd and taken there themselves: and in conclusion perswaded and prevailed so with them, that they granted not only to lend with him a great number of hulks and caricks, laden with store of all things, but also to furnish him with more ships of war, to encrease his Armado. Whereupon he departed from Carthage with 130 Gallies, and 70 ships of burden, and had forewinds good enough to set him over into Sicily. But those winds kept him from doubling the point of the Cape Pachynus.

The same and rumor first of Bomilcar his coming, and then his delay above mens expectation, that checked it again, wrought diversly in the minds of the Romans and Syracusians, ministering one while fear; another while joy unto them both. Whereupon Epicles fearing lest if the same Easterly winds which then held, and were settled in that corner, should continue many dayes more, the Carthaginian navy would return again into Affrick, leaving the guard of Acradina to the Captains of the waged and mercenary souldiers, sailed to Bomilcar, riding still with his fleet in the rode that looketh toward Affrick, and fearing a conflict at Sea, not so much because he was inferior to the enemies either in force or number of ships (for he had many more than the Romans) but for that the winds stood more favourably to help the Roman Armado than his: howbeit, in the end he perswaded him to try the fortune of a battail at Sea. And Marcellus for his part, seeing both the Sicilian forces gather and assemble together from all parts of the Island, and understanding that the Carthaginian fleet was coming with great store of victuals: for fear lest at any time whiles he was shut up within the enemies City, he should be assailed both by Sea and Land: albeit he was short of them in number of ships, yet determined to hinder Bomilcar for arriving at Syracuse. Thus did two armades of enemies affronting one another, about the head of Pachynus, ready to joyn battail, so soon as the calmness of the weaver would give them leave to advance into the main and open Sea. Therefore when the East wind began to lie, which for certain dayes had blustered and raged, first Bomilcar weighed anchor: and the vanguard of his Armado seemed to gather still into the deep; only because he might more easily gain the Cape and promontory aforesaid. But so soon as he saw the Romans ships make way toward him (I wot not what suddain accident it was that affrighted him) he set up all his sails and fell off, into the main Sea: and after he had sent certain messengers to Heraclea, willing them for to set again their hulks home into Affrick, himself coasted all along Sicily, and shaped his course for Tarenium. Epicles disappointed thus on a suddain, of so great hopes that he had, because he would not return again to the siege of a City, whereof a great part was lost already, saileth to Agriæum, there to abide and expect the event and small issue, rather than to stir himself and trye any more, how to help them with any succour from thence.

These things being reported in the camp of the Sicilians, to wit, that Epicides had quit Syracuse: that the Carthaginians had abandoned the whole Island of Sicily, and in manner yielded it again into the hands of the Romans: after they had sounded first their minds who were besieged, by talk and conference with them, they sent Ambassadors unto Marcellus, to treat about conditions of surrendering the City. When they were grown in a manner to this point, without any squaring or difference at all, that the Romans should have the fignory all and wholly which belonged unto the Kings: and that, all the rest the Sicilians should enjoy, with liberty and their own proper Laws: the Ambassadors aforesaid called forth to a parley, those unto whom Epicides at his departure had committed the government of the affairs, and declared unto them, that as they were addressed Orators unto Marcellus, so they were from him sent unto the army of the Sicilians: that generally all, as well the besieged, as those who were without the danger of the siege, should be comprized within the treaty, and abide one and the same fortune: and that neither the one side nor the other should capitulate or enter into any covenant for themselves apart, without all the rest. Who being received and admitted, for to salute and speak unto their kinsfolk and friends, made them acquainted with the agreement and composition between Marcellus and them: and so after they had presented unto them some good hope of their safety, they perswaded with them so far forth, as to joyn with them, and all together, for to set upon and assault the bodies of the Captains deputed by Epicides, namely, Polyxenus, Philestius, and one Epicides surnamed Syræus. When they were once made away and killed, they called the multitude together unto a general assembly: where they complained greatly of their poverty, and penury of all things, (for which they were wont to murmur secretly among themselves:) "And albeit ye are distressed (say they) with so many miseries and calamities, yet are ye not to blame for tunc therefore, so long as it was in your own power and choice, either to be delivered from them, or to endure them longer. As for the Romans (said they) it was not hatred, but meet love and charity, that moved them to come against Syracuse for to assault it. For when they heard that the government of the state was usurped by Hippocrates and Epicides (the ministers first belonging to Annibal, and after to Hieronymus) then they began to lay siege unto it intending not the overthrow and destruction of the City it self, but to put down and depose the cruel tyrant that ruled the state. Seeing then, that now Hippocrates is dead, Epicides excluded from Syracuse, his Deputies and Captains killed, and the Carthaginians driven out of all their hold and possession of Sicily, both by Land and Sea, what reason have the Romans, that to be willing and well content, that Syracuse should continue in safety now, as well as if Hieronymus self were living, the only maintainer and observant upholder of the Roman amity? And therefore, it ought but well should happen, either to the City, or to the Citizens, ye may thank yourselves, and none else, for letting slip opportunity now offered, of reconciliation and accommodation with the Romans. Never look to have the like occasion hereafter, to that, which at this instant is presented: if ye had the grace to see what a door is opened for you, to be delivered from the yoke of most insolent and proud tyrants. This speech they gave ear unto with exceeding accord and general applause. But before that any Ambassadors were nominated to be sent unto Marcellus, it was thought good that new Pretors should be created. Out of the number of which Pretors, there were Orators addressed unto Marcellus. And the principal man among them, spake in this wise. "Neither we Syracusians (quoth he) O Marcellus, at the first we loved from you Romans, but Hieronymus, impious and wicked Prince as he was: yet nothing so much hurtful to you as to us: not afterwards, when peace was knit again upon the murder of the tyrant, was it any citizen of Syracuse, but Hippocrates and Epicides (the Kings right hands and ministers, who oppressed and kept us under, with fear of one side, and with detestable lights on another side) that made the brack, and were the troublers and disturbers of this peace. Nor yet can any man come forth and say truly, that ever we were at our own liberty, and entertained not peace and amity with you. And now also I assure you, so soon as by the massacre of these, that held Syracuse in such oppression and bondage, we began again to be our own men, and to have the law in our own hands: the first thing you see that we do, is this, to come and present our selves unto you, to deliver up our armor and weapons, to yield our bodies, our City, the walls, and all the strength thereof, and to refuse no condition, that is shall please you Romans to impose upon us. As to your self, O noble Marcellus, the Gods have given you the honour of conquest, over the most noble and beautiful city of all other in Greece. Behold, now, what memorable acts soever that we have at any time achieved, either by Land or Sea, all makes to the advancement of the glorious title and dignity of your triumph. See you then, that another day it be not known by bare hear-say, and the trump of fame, how great and mighty a City you have won, but rather that it may stand still and remain for all posterity, for a mark and worthy spectacle to behold: to the end, that whosoever hereafter, shall resort thither, by Land, whosoever shall arrive there by Sea, it may present unto them, both our Trophies and worthy victories over the Athenians and Carthaginians: and also this of yours, over us, the bravest conquest of all the rest. See (I say) that you leave for your house and family, the City of Syracuse whole and sound, to do homage and fealty ever hereafter, to the name and lineage of the Marcellis, and to hold of them as of their sovereign Lord, in chief and in vassalage. That

A "That all the World may see, that the late remembrance of Hieronymus, beareth no greater stroke with the Romans; that the ancient name of King Hiero, a noble Prince of famous memory. Much longer was he a friend, than the other an enemy. His good deeds and many favours ye have tasted and felt with great contentment: the folly and madness of Hieronymus, hurt none of you, but wrought his own confusion and overthrow. There was nothing but they might have obtained at the Romans hands: all was clear there, and no danger from thence. But among their own selves they were at more war: there was the peril, there was all the mischief. For the Roman rebels, who were run from them, doubting that they should be delivered over into their hands, and not comprised within the terms of the composition and protection, drave the auxiliaries also that were waaged soldiers into the same scruple and fear. They hastily therefore took arms, and first killed the Pretors: and afterwards, ran all about to massacre the Syracusians. Look whom they hapned to meet, them they murdered in this furious fit of choler. Whatsoever came next to their hands, and lay handsome for them, they killed. And because forsooth they would not be without their leaders, they created six provosts or Captains, that three should govern Acradina, and other three Nasos. At the last, after the uprore was appeased, the mercenary souldiers aforesaid, followed the matter thoroughly by search and diligent inquiry, what were the capitulations indeed agreed upon with the Romans: and then began the very truth to appeare, namely, that their condition and the fugitives were far different.

C These Embassadors in very good time returned from Marcellus, and certified them that they were carried away with a wrong surmise and false suspicion, and the Romans had no just cause to punish them. Now there was one of those three Provosts of Acradina, a Spaniard named Mericius. Unto him there was sent for the nonce among those of the retinue and train of the Embassadors aforesaid, one of the Spaniards, who were auxiliary souldiers, serving under the Romans: who finding Mericius alone without other company, gave him to understand especially above all things, in what terms he had left Spain (and from thence he was newly come) namely, how the Romans there were grown mighty, and held a great hand over them with their forces. And that himself, in case he had a mind to do some worthy deed, might soon rise, and be a great man in his country: chose whether he list to serve under the Romans, or return again into his own

D "home. Contrary-wise, if he went on still in this countie he had begun, and minded still to be besieged, what long abiding place could he have there, shut up as he was from sea and Land? Mericius pondered well these reasons: and when it was agreed, that there should be addressed new Embassadors unto Marcellus, sent his own brother with them, who by the self-same Spaniard was brought apart from all the rest unto Marcellus: and after he had a protection granted, he laid the plot, and ordered all the matter how it should be done, and so returned to Acradina. Then Mericius because he would withdraw mens minds from all suspicion of treason, and that he intended nothing lesse, than to betray Acradina, gave it out, That he liked not, and would no more of this recourse, ever and anon, of Embassadors between: and therefore as he would admit of none to come from Marcellus, so he would send no more to him. And to the end, that

E all the guards should be kept more diligently, he thought it good to divide conveniently among the Provosts, the quarters of the City, and assign to every one his ward by himself, and that each one should be bound to answer for the safe keeping of his own division, and for no more. Then all gave their consent to part accordingly, and to himself befell the charge of that quarter which reacheth from the fountain or well Archeus unto the mouth or entry of the great key or haven. And hereof he gave notice and intelligence to the Romans. Whereupon Marcellus caused a great Hulk, laden with armed souldiers, to be fastned by an haling rope unto a Gally of four course of oars, and so in the night by strength of oars to be towed and drawn up after it into Acradina, and landeth the souldiers over against the gate, that is next to the fountain Archeus. This being done about the relief of the fourth watch, Marcellus received the souldiers that were set ashore at

F the gate, according as before it was agreed. And Marcellus by the dawning of the day, with all his forces gave a Camifado upon the walls of Acradina, in such manner, that not only he turned thither unto his assault all those that kept Acradina, but also from Nasos there came running whole squadrons and companies of armed men (leaving their own wards) for to repel and put back the violence and assault of the Romans. In this tumult and trouble, certain Barges appointed and furnished thereto aforesaid, were brought about to Nasos, where the other souldiers stood: who coming adunward upon the Acradina, that were left half naked and very weak, by reason of the departure of their fellows, and finding the gates wide open, at which erewhile the souldiers ramped, with small ado were masters of Nasos, left, as it was, without warders, who in fear made hast to run away and escape. And none of them all had lesse means to defend themselves, or smaller mind to tarry still, than the fugitive rebels, for they durst not well trust their own fellows, and so in the hottest of the skirmish made an escape.

G As soon as he understood, that Nasos was won, and likewise the quarter of Acradina was held, and kept for him: and that Mericius with his guard had joynted to his souldiers, founded the retreat for fear, that the Kings residence, which was more in name than in deed, should be rifled and spoiled.

Thus by suppressing the violence of the souldiers, both the rebel fugitives that were in Acradina had good time and place to shift for themselves and get away, and also the Syracusians delivered livered now at last from fear, opened the gates of Acradina, and sent Orators unto Marcellus; craving nothing but life for themselves and their children. Marcellus called his Council together, and those Syracusans likewise, who in the time of civil dissention, were driven to forsake their houses, and remained among the garrisons of the Romans: and then he made the Embassadors this answer. "There have not been (quoth he) more benefits and good turns for the space of fifty years received at King Hiero his hands by the people of Rome, than detriments and mischiefs intended against them within these few years, by them that have seized and possessed the City of Syracusa. But most of those mischiefs in the end, have lighted upon their heads right justly, who duly deserved the same: and for the breach of league and covenants, they themselves have suffered at their own hands more grievous punishment by far, than the people of Rome would willingly ever have required. As for me, this is the third year that I lie in siege before Syracusa; not, I assure you, with this intent, that the City should not be reserved safe and sound for the natural people thereof to keep and inhabit, but that the Captains and ring-leaders of fugitives and rebels might not seize it, and so hold it in captivity and oppression. How much the Syracusians might have done with me at first, may be easily seen by the example either of those Syracusians who conversed among the guards of the Romans, or of the Spanish Captain Mericus, who yielded up his garrison. Yea, and the hardy and resolute course in the end taken (although it were with the latest) by the Syracusians themselves, may sufficiently testify the same. Whereby also it may appear, that for all my travel and pain which I have undergone, for all the perils which I have adventured and passed through, about the walls of Syracusa, both by Land and Water, thus long: I have gathered no fruit so sweet and pleasant as this, that it may be said, how I was able, yet at last, to win and conquer Syracusa.

Syracusa won

Then the Questor was sent, attended with a guard, unto Nasos, for to enter upon the Kings treasure there, and to keep the same in safety. The pillage of the City was given to the souldiers: but there were appointed certain warders over every house of theirs, who were among the garrisons of the Romans, for to save the same. Amids many cruel, spiteful, and foul examples of anger, malice, and covetousness, which hapned to be committed during the time of this saccage, it is reported, That in so great huriburly as possibly might be, when a City is newly taken, and hungry souldiers run to rifling, Archimedes was busily occupied, and studying upon certain Geometrical figures that he had drawn out in the dust, and hapned to be slain by a souldier, that knew not who he was. Whereat Marcellus was much offended and displeased: and thereupon gave especial order, that he should be honourably enterr'd: yea, and caused his kinsfolks to be fought out: and all they in remembrance of him, and for his name sake, were not only saved, but also well accounted of, and had in good reputation. Thus you see in what sort, and by what means especially, Syracusa was won. A City wherein was found such store of wealth and riches, as hardly would have been gotten in Carthage, if it had been forced then: notwithstanding it was able to hold out with Rome, and maintain war with equal force and power.

Some few dayes before the winning of Syracusa, T. Octavius with fourscore Gallies, of five ranks of oars, crossed the Seas from Lelybeum to Utica, and being exited the gate before day light, chanced to take by the way certain Caricks charged with corn. After he was disbarcked and let a Land, he wasted grievously part of the territory about Utica, and returned to the City with booty and prizes of all sorts. And the third day after he went from Lelybeum he returned thither again with 130 caricks full of corn and other booty: and that corn he sent forthwith to Syracusa: which if it had not come as it did in good time to help the present necessity, the conquerors as well as the conquered had felt the smart of most extrem and grievous famine.

In the same summer, the Roman Generals in Spain (who almost for two years had done no memorable act there, but warred by policy and stratagems, more than by force of arms) dislodged from their forts and winter harbors, and joyned their armies together. Then they called a Council, where they jumped with one general accord in this opinion. That considering all this while they had effected this much only, as to empeach and stay Asdrubal from all means of passing over into Italy, it was now high time to make an end at once of the war in Spain. And to effect and bring this to passe, they supposed verily that their strength was well amended and sufficient, by reason that in the winter time they had levied and put in arms thirty thousand Celtiberians. Now the Carthaginians had in Spain then, no fewer than three armies. Asdrubal the son of Gisco, and Mago, were encamped with all their forces together, distant from the Romans almost five dayes journey: Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, an ancient warrior, and an old Captain in Spain, was somewhat neerer with his whole power, before a City named Antorgis. Him the Roman Generals were desirous to defeat and vanquish first: and in good hope they were, that they had strength enough and to spare, for to accomplish that: many, this was their only doubt and fear, lest upon the discomiture of him, the other Asdrubal and Mago would for fear retire themselves into the unpassable woods, and take the wilds and mountains, and so mainrein a long war. They supposed therefore it was the best course to divide their power between them in two parts, and at once to compass the whole war of Spain. And thus they agreed to part their forces: namely, That P. Cornelius should lead two third parts of the army, consisting of Romans and allies, against Mago and Asdrubal: and that Cn. Cornelius with the other third part of that old army should joyn with the Celtiberians, and war against Asdrubal the Barchine. [i. son of Amilcar above-said.] Both these Captains with their hosts set out together in their journey, putting the Celtiberians

Aberians before in the vanguard, and encamped neer the City Anatorgis in the sight of their enemies, having but the river running between. And there Cn. Scipio staid behind, and made his abode with the power aforesaid: but P. Scipio went onward to perform that part of the war which he purposed and intended. Asdrubal after he perceived that there lay in camp but a small power of Romans, and that their whole hope relied upon the aids of the Celtiberians; as one that could well skill of the falshood and treachery of the barbarous people, but especially of all those nations, among whom he had been so long a souldier: by reason that both camps, as well his own as the other of the Romans, were full of Spaniards, he used by the means of reciprocal commerce of their language, for to have secret speech and conference with the principal heads of the Celtiberians, and so treated with them, that in consideration of a great sum of money, they were perswaded and yielded in the end to withdraw all their forces from thence, and give the Romans the slip. And this they supposed was not so heinous and odious a fact. For why? they were not dealt withal to turn their swords upon the Romans, and to war against them: again, they were to have as good pay and wages to sit still, and not to serve, as was sufficient to bind them for to bear arms and fight: and last of all, rest it self, and sleeping in a whole skin, together with their return home to their own, and the joy and pleasure of visiting their friends, and seeing their goods and lands, were plausible and pleasing inducements to every man. And therefore the Captains themselves were no sooner drawn thereto, than the very multitude. Over and besides, to strike it dead sure, they stood in no fear of the Romans (being so few as they were) that they could possibly keep them perforce. And surely, this might well serve, to be a Caveat for Roman Captains ever hereafter, and such precedent examples and instances as this, may stand in stead of good lessons indeed, to teach them how they trust again the aids of foreiners; and never to relie themselves so much upon them, but that they alwayes have in their camp the greater part of their own forces, and the more number of their natural souldiers. All on a suddain therefore the Celtiberians dislodged, plucked up standards, and departed from them, and never bad them farewell. And when the Romans demanded the cause of this change, yea, and besought and importuned them to tarry, they made them no other answer but this, That they were called and sent for home, by occasion of wars in their own country. Scipio seeing that these Allies of his were so slippery, and could neither be intreated nor enforced to stay: and that himself alone without them was not able to make his part good with the enemy: and to joyn again with his brother, was a thing impossible: for want of all other good means, for the present, when he saw no remedy else, determined to retire himself as far backward as he could: having this especial care above all things, not to encounter and joyn battail with the enemy in plain field, without some advantage, who now was passed over the river, and traced him hard at heels in his dismarch.

About the same time P. Scipio stood in the like terms of fear, but in more danger by the coming of a new enemy, and that was Masaniissa the young Prince, who then was a friend and pensionary souldier of the Carthaginians: but afterwards mighty and renowned for his amity with the Romans. He with his Numidian Horsemen first encountred P. Scipio, as he marched on his journey, and afterwards both day and night molested and troubled him very shrewdly: in such sort, that E not only he would intercept and catch up those that were gone out wandering and stragling far from the camp, a fuelling or foraging, and send them short of home; but also ride braving even before the camp. Many a time would he venture, yea, and enter upon the thickest of the standing corps de guard, and make foul work and trouble among them. By night also he used oft to make many starts upon a suddain, and assail the gates of the camp and the rampier, and put them in exceeding great frights. So as the Romans at no time, nor in no place could be at rest and quiet for him, but ever in fear and doubt of some shrewd turn or other by him: so as they were driven to keep within their rampier, cut off from the use of all commodities abroad, and in a manner as good as besieged: and more streightly yet were they like to be beleaguered, in case Indibilis, who was coming (as the rumor went) with 7500 Suesetans, were once joyned with the Carthaginians. F Whereupon Scipio a wary warrior and prudent Captain otherwise, driven to these hard extremities, and forced to make shifts, entred into a rash and inconsiderate designment, even to go on and meet (forsooth) Indibilis in the night, and in what place soever it should be his hap to encounter him, there to bid him battail, and fight with him. Leaving therefore a mean guard to keep the camp, and T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, as Provost and Captain, he set out at midnight, and meeting with his enemies, joyned battail with them: but they skirmished rather by loose companies in their march, than with their united forces in set and pight field. Howbeit, the Romans had the better hand so much as it was, considering what a confused and disorderly conflict there might be. But the Numidian Cavalry, whom Scipio thought he was secured of, and that they were not aware of him, all on a suddain flanked the sides of the Romans, and mightily terrified them. Against these G Numidians, whiles Scipio made head again afresh, behold a third sort of enemies also charged upon his back, even the Carthaginian Captains, who by this time while the other were in fight, had overtaken their allies and were come thither. So as the Romans were to maintain battail on all hands, and were at a stand, and in doubt with themselves against which enemy to turn first, or what way with a close couched Squadron to give the venture for to breakthrough. As the General was thus manfully fighting, and encouraging his souldiers, presenting and opposing himself forward, where was most need and danger, his chance was to be run through the right side of his body with a Lance: and that massive band of the enemies which had charged upon the thick

battailon, which environed their Captain, seeing Scipio falling from his Horse ready to die, in great joy and mirth set up a cheerful shout, and ran all over the army, and caried glad tidings that the Roman General was slain. This voice being once spread all abroad, caused both the enemies to take themselves undoubtedly for victors, and the Romans to make no other account but they were vanquished. Whereupon they having lost their Leader, began forthwith to flie out of the field. But as it was no hard matter for them to make a lane and break through among the Numidians, and other auxiliary souldiers lightly armed; so to escape and go cleer away from so many Horse, and Footmen also, who were as swift on foot as the horsemen, it was almost impossible. Thus they were more in manner slain in their flight now, then in their fight before. And there had not one remained alive, but that the day being far spent already, and toward evening, the night came on apace and overtook them. The Carthaginian Captains, and those also of Affrick, taking the full benefit of this their good fortune, slept not their businesse, nor made delay: but presently after the battail, scarcely allowing their souldiers so much sleep as would content nature, marched in great hast toward Asdrubal the son of Amilcar: making account assuredly, that when they had joyned their power with his, they should break the neck of this war, and end it once for all. When they were come to him, great joy and gratulation there was between the Captains and the hosts of both sides, for this fresh victory newly achieved: and seeing they had already defeated so brave a warrior and great commander, together with his whole army, they made no doubt but expected certainly to have another hand as good as this.

The news verily of this so great a foil and overthrow, was not yet come unto the Romans: but yet they were stricken into a sad dump and deep silence, and more than that, into a secret preface and fore-deeming of some unlucky tidings: as commonly mens minds use to fore-give and tell aforehand, when there is some mischief and ill toward them. The General himself, besides that he saw he was abandoned and forsaken of his associates, and knew the forces of the enemies so mightily reenforced; by good conjectures and gueses, yea, and by very reason, was induced to suspect some loss and calamity received already, rather than enclined to hope after any good success and happy speed. For thus he discoursed with himself: How is it possible that Asdrubal and Mago should bring their armies together without conflict, unless my brother be slain in fight, or have forgotten to be a warrior? how cometh it that he withstood them not? or how hapneth it that my brother followed not hard after them fast upon their backs? At leastwise, if he had not been able to keep them asunder, but that both Captains and armies must needs meet and joyn in one, yet he himself me thinks, at leastwise would have come by this time to his brother, and brought his own power to his. In this perplexity and anguish of spirit, he thought yet, for the present time, that the only good course he could take, was to withdraw himself back from thence as far as he could: and so all that one night unware to his enemies (who so long only were quiet) he marched a great way, and won much ground of them. The next morning, so soon as the enemies perceived that the Romans were dislodged and gone, they sent out the Numidian light Horsemen, and began to follow after them apace, and pursued them as fast as possibly they could: and before night the Numidian Cavalry had overtaken them, and skirmished one while with the tail of their march, another while at their sides and flanks, and gave them no rest: whereat the Romans made as it were a stand, and began to defend and save their army as well as they could: yet with great wariness and regard of security, Scipio encouraged them so to fight, as they might march on still and gain ground, before the Infantry overtook them. But as one while the army was one foot, and another while stood still, in long time they rid but a little ground. And Scipio seeing the night draw on apace, reclaimed his souldiers from farther skirmishes: and after he had rallied them together, he retired with them up to a little mount, no sufficient place (God wot) of safe retreat for an army, especially so troubled and affrighted already, yet higher than any other place all about. There the first thing that he did, was to bestow the baggage and cavalry in the mids within his forces: and at first the infantry ranged round about in a ring, made no difficult matter of it to put by the violent charge of the Numidian Horsemen. But afterwards when the three Generals marching with three full armies approached, their Captain Scipio perceiving that he was never able to keep that place without some fortification, began to cast his eye about, and to bethink with himself, by what means possible he might empale himself round about as it were with a rampier: but the hill was so naked of wood, and the soil of the ground besides so stony and craggy, that he could neither finde any underwood fit to cut out stakes for a pallisado nor earth meet to make turfs for a bank, or minable for a trench: and in one word, all things untoward and unhandisome for a mound, and to fortifie withal. Neither was there any place there, to speak of, so steep and upright, but the enemy might at ease mount up and climb it. All the hill on every side, had a gentle rising and ascent up to the top. Howbeit, to represent some shew and resemblance yet of a rampier, they were forced to take their pack saddles, with their packs tied fast unto them, and so round about to pile them and raise them to the usual height of a mure: And where there wanted pack saddles to make up the work, there they were fain to heap together, all sorts of fardels, trusses, and other carriages, and to put them between the enemies and them. The Carthaginian armies when they were come, matched very easily up against the Hill. But the new fashion and manner of their defences and fortifications, was very strange unto them, so as at the first the souldiers marvelled much

A and were astonished thereto, and stood still. But their Captains on all sides cried out upon them, And why stand ye gaping (say they) so: and do not pull in peeces and pluck away that foolish babble there, good to make sport with? A very toy, that women and children would scarce stand about thus long? Why, the enemy is taken already in a pincfold, and lieth lurking and hiding himself behind the trosses and other carriages. After this manner (I say) the leaders rated at the souldiers. But it was not so easy a matter, either to get over that Barricado of the packs, or to remove and rid them out of the way, as they lay piled close against them; nor yet to unfold and unwrap the pack-saddles, lying overwhelmed as they did, under the packs, and entangled together with them. Thus they were hindered and staid a long time: and when at length they had put this bag and baggage aside that was set in their way, and made passage and entrance for the armed men, B and that in divers places. The camp and tents were soon taken on all sides, ere a man could turn about: and so being few to many, and frightened men to late conquerors, no marvel if they were killed and hewn in pieces in every place. Howbeit, many of the souldiers having fled for refuge into the forests neer by, escaped into the camp of P. Scipio, whereof T. Fonteius his Lieutenant had the charge. As for Cn. Scipio some write that he was slain upon that mount at the first onset and assault made by the enemies: others report that with a few others he fled into a Tower hard by the camp: and that there was a fire made round about it, and so when the gates thereof were burned, which by no violent means otherwise they could break open, the enemies entred and took it, and they within were killed every one, Captain and all.

C Thus Cn. Scipio came to his end, in the seventh year after that he went into Spain, and on the nine and twentieth day after that his brother lost his life. Their death was bewailed and lamented no less over all Spain than at Rome. For among the citizens at home one part of their sorrow they took for the loss of the armies, another part went for the distraction and alienation of the Province, and a third again was spent in the cogitation of the publick calamity: but Spain from one end to the other, mourned only for their Governors and Captains, and had a great misse of them. And Cneus of the twain, was more bewailed, because he had been longer time their ruler, and had won the favour and affection of men, and possessed their hearts before the other: and was the first that ever gave them in those parts a proof and taste of the Romans just and temperat government.

D When the army was thus defeated and brought to nothing, so as Spain seemed utterly lost, there arose one man yet, that recovered all again, and brought the decayed state to the former perfection. There was in the army one L. Martius, the son of Septimius, a Gentleman and Knight of Rome, a forward young man: for courage and wit, far above the degree and condition wherein he was born. Besides this excellent and most toward disposition of his by nature, he had great helps by the discipline and instruction of Cn. Scipio: under whom, for so many years he was trained and had learned all military knowledge and skill meet for a souldier. This Martius, what by rallying the disperied souldiers who were fled, and what by drawing others out of sundry garrisons had raised and assembled together a reasonable good power, and joynd with T. Fonteius, the Lieutenant aforesaid of P. Scipio: But the Roman Knight, above all others, grew to so great credit and reputation among all the souldiers, that when they had fortified their camp within the E river Iberus, and were determined among themselves, to chuse one General over the armies, in a solemn assembly of souldiers, even by their own military election: they went one by one in course one after another, unto the main corps de guard that defended the rampier, and to the other wards belonging unto the camp, until they had all given their voyces: and so by general consent created him their General. All the time which they had after, (and that was but small) they employed in fortifying their hold, and conveying thither corn and victuals: and what charge soever was imposed by him upon the souldiers, the same they executed readily and willingly, and without any shew that their hearts were dismayed, and cast down any jot at all. But after that news was brought, that Asdrubal the son of Gisco, was coming against them, to dispatch clean the reliques of the war, that he had passed over Iberus and approached neer: and the souldiers saw once the F signal of battel put forth unto them by this new General: calling to mind, what noble warriors they had served under but a while before: what worthy leaders they were wont to have, and with how puissant armies they used heretofore to go to the field: they fell a weeping every one, shaking and beating their heads: some lift up and stretched out their hands to heaven, blaming and accusing the Gods: others lay along upon the ground, calling every one upon his own Captain by special name: Neither could their piteous moans and plaints be staid, notwithstanding the Centurions encouraged what they could, the souldiers of their companies: notwithstanding (I say) that Martius himself sometimes spake them fair, sometimes rebuked them, for giving themselves to such foolish and vain pining like women: and not rather resolve to raise up their hearts, and with him to quicken and whet their stomachs in defence of themselves and of the common G weal, and not to suffer their former Captains and Leaders to lie dead and unrevenged. By this time now all on a sudden, the shout of the enemies was decried, and the sound of the trumpets were within hearing, being come close under the rampier. Whereupon all at once, turning their sorrow and weeping into anger and indignation, they ran every man to his armor and weapon: and as if they had been horn mad they hastned from all parts to the gates and entries of the camp, and charged upon the enemies as they came carelessly and without order and array. Immediately this unexpected and sudden object, strooke an exceeding fear into the Carthaginians: a as wondering from whence so many enemies should start up so soon, considering the armies were so lately clean in a manner destroyed; and how it came to passe, that being newly vanquished and put to flight they should be so stout, so bold and confident of their own selves: whose Gods name, should be their General, after the two Scipios were slain: what Captain and Governor had they over the camp; and who gave out the signal of battell: marvelling (I say) at these premises, and so many particulars, that they once imagined not afore, at first hand they will not what to do, but as amazed men, began to give ground and retire; but afterwards, being still fiercely followed upon with a violent charge, they were plainly beaten back and put to flight. And verily, either there had been a foul havock and slaughter of them that fled; or a rash and dangerous enterprise for them who would have followed the chase: but that Martius hastened to sound the retreat, and opposing himself against the foremost ensignes of the vanguard, yea, and taking hold of some of them himself, staid the main battail and repressed their violence, who were upon the point already to pursue them with heat. And so he reduced them back again into the camp, as greedy as they were still of murder, and thirsty of bloodshed. The Carthaginians, who at the first were driven from the rampier, and for fear hastened away: after that they saw none to follow them, supposed they had been afraid, and therefore staid still: whereupon they departed to their camp again in reckless manner, fair and softly. And as careless as they were in their retire thither, so negligent were they in guarding the same: for although their enemies were neerer, yet they remembered and thought again, that they were but the tail and reliques of two armies, vanquished and defeated a few dayes before. Upon this resolute perswasion of theirs, and bafe conceit of the enemies, they were very negligent every way within their camp: whereof Martius having by his espial, certain intelligence, resolved upon a designment, which at the first sight seemed more like a project of hazard, than an enterprise of hardiness; and it was no more, but even upon a bravery to set upon the enemy in his own camp, and give him a camifado. For as he thought it an easier emprise, to force the hold and pavilions of Asdrubal, being but one, than to defend and keep his own, in case three armies and three Captains should joyn together: so he considered withal, that either if he sped well in this exploit, he should restore and set upright again unto the Romans, the decayed and prostrate State of Spain: or if he were discomfited and put back, yet by giving the adventure first upon the enemies, he should not be altogether contemned, and of no reputation. But lest this attempt so suddain, and the terror and error which may fall out in the night-time, should happen to trouble this his designed plot, and the course of his good fortune: he thought it not amiss, to make a speech unto his souldiers, and to exhort and encourage them afore-hand. And therefore calling them together to a general audience, in this manner he discoursed unto them of his intent and purpose.

of Martius to his souldiers.

"My valorous and loyal souldiers, either the reverence and affectionate love of mine, toward our chief Captains during their life, and after their death: or the very present condition and state wherein we all now stand: may be a sufficient testimony and proof to any man whoever, that this charge and government of mine, as it is in regard of your judgement of me right honourable, so it is in truth, and in very deed, to me most weighty, and full of care and trouble.
For at what time as (but that fear took away all sense of sorrow) I was not so much master of my self, as to seek out and find some comfort and solace for mine own pensive soul and heavy spirit: I was forced being but one, (which is a most hard matter: for a man to do in time of grief) to minister consolation unto the common misfortune and calamity of you all. And surely I have no list at all (the harder is my case) to avert my mind from continual grief of heart, not so much as even then, when as I am to study and devise, by what means I may be able to preserve (for the behoof of my country) these small remnants of two armies. For why the grievous and bitter remembrance of calamities past, is ever before me. The two Scipios trouble me all the day time with careful thoughts, they disquiet me in the night season with fearful dreams, they make me oftentimes to start out of my sleep, willing and charging me, to suffer neither them nor their souldiers (who were your fellows and companions, and for the space of eight years in those parts where they served, never received foil) nor yet the Common-wealth, to continue unrevenge: warning me withal, to follow their discipline, their precepts, rules, and good instructions. And like as, while they lived here among us, there was no man more obedient than my self to their directions and commandments: even so after their decease, whatsoever in my conceit, I judge they would have had especially done in all occurrences, the same my desire is, that you also (my souldiers) would like of and approve for the very best. I would not have you to weep, wail, and lament still for them, as if they were extinct and gone for ever; (for they live still, and shall, so long as the world endureth, and continue immortal in renown and fame of their worthy and noble acts) but rather so often as you remember and think of them, to go like hardy and valiant men to a field, even as if you heard them speaking unto you, or saw them giving out the signal of battell. Neither was it (I assure you) any other object but this, presented yesterday unto your eyes and minds, which effected so memorable a piece of service as it was:
by which ye have made good proof unto your enemies, and given them to understand, that the Roman name died not together with the Scipios; and that the vigour and vertue of that people which was not extinct and buried, by the overthrow at Cannæ, will ever rise again: (ye may be sure) out of all adversities, let cruel fortune storm and rage as much as ever she can. And now, since ye have shewed such valour and hardiness already of your own accord, I have a mind,

A "and would gladly see, how bravely ye will bear your selves upon the direction and commandment of your Captain. For yesterday, when I sounded the retreat unto you, at what time as you followed so freely upon the enemy, being troubled and dishearted: my desire and meaning was: not to repress and abate your bold courage, but to defer and reserve it against some greater opportunity of advantage, and for a more honourable and glorious exploit: that anon upon the first occasion, you being prepared and provided, might surprize them at unawares, and not standing upon their guard; armed and well appointed, assail them disarmed & naked; and that which more is, whiles they are in their beds fast and sound asleep. And the hope that I conceive of this good opportunity and effect thereof (my souldiers) ariseth not upon some fantastick imagination of mine own brain by hap-hazard, and upon vain presumption, but grounded upon good reason and present experience. For verily, if a man should demand even of you your own selves, what the reason was, that being but few in number, and lately discomfited, ye were able to defend your camp, against many more than your selves, and those heartned with fresh victories; ye would make no other answer but this, That you, fearing that which followed, had both fortified your camp in every respect with strong munitions, and were your selves well appointed and furnished, yea, and ready to receive them whensoever they came. And surely, so it is, and we find it true by experience: Men are least sure and secured against that which fortune saith is fearless, and need not to be prevented, because that which we neglect is evermore open and exposed to all dangers. Now the enemies doubt nothing less at this time, then that we, who were so lately our selves besegged and assailed by them, will now come to give an assault upon them in their hold. Let us adventure to do that which no man would beleeve that ever we durst enterprise, and the self-same cause which seemeth to make the thing most difficult, shall effect it toonest of all others. At the change of the third watch I will lead you forth without any noise at all in great silence. Well enformed and assured I am, that in their camp the Sentinels are not relieved in due course and order, neither yet the ordinary corps de guard kept as they ought to be. Your shout and outcry shal not so soon be heard at the gates, nor your first charge and assault given, but ye shall surely be masters of the camp. Then let me see you perform that slaughter and execution among them heavy and dead asleep, affrighted with an unexpected alarm, and taken on a sudden unarmed, and in their beds: from which yesterday ye thought much, that ye were called away and reclaimed. I wot well, that this seemeth unto you an audacious enterprise and full of hazard, but when things go croise and stand in doubtfull terms, and when other means fail, the hardiest attempts, yea, and the most venturous and desperate courses, are ever safest and speediest. For if a man stay never so little at the very instant when a thing is to be done (whereof the opportunity passeth and flieth away ere one would think) immediately when it is once gone, he may sing his cap after well enough, and complain thereof and say, had I wist, but never the nearer. One Army they have hard at hand, and two more are not far off: now if we venture of this here, our opportunity and advantage is as good as theirs. And once already ye have made trial of their forces and your own: put we it off another day, contenting our selves with the bare name of yesterdaies sally, and give over so, it will be great doubt and danger, lest all the Generals with all their armies be rallied and re-united. And shall we then be able to hold our own against three Generals and three hosts, whom Cn. Scipio having about him his whole puissance, fresh and in good plight, could not withstand nor abide? Our Captains by dividing their forces, and dismemb'ring one compleat army, were defeated and overthrowen: semblably may our enemies, parted while they be, and severed asunder, be discomfited and brought to nought. Lo, this is the only way for us to war, and none other. And therefore let us wait no longer than the commodious opportunity of the next night. Go ye then a gods blessing make much of your selves, take your repose and repose, that ye may be fresh and lusty to break into your enemies hold with the same resolute courage, wherewith erewhile ye defended your own. The souldiers, as they gladly gave ear to this new counsell of their new captain, so, the more audacious and adventurous that it was, the better it pleased them. Therest of the day behind they spent in furnishing and making ready their harness and weapons, and in chetishing their bodies, yea, and the better part of the night they slepe quietly. And so at the relief of the fourth watch they set forward.

Now were there other companies also of Carthaginians, beyond this next camp abovesaid, about six miles distant from thence. A hollow way and valley there lay between, standing thick of trees. In the midst of this wood, for a furlong space well near, he bestowed close by a cohort of footmen, yea, and certain horsemen of Romans: but by his leave this was but a crafty and slye trick, borrowed of the Carthaginians. Thus the midst way being intercepted and taken up, the rest of the forces were conducted in a full march toward the enemies in the next camp. And finding no guards before the gates, no Sentinels upon the rampier, they entred in as it had been into their own hold, and no man made resistance: then they sounded trumpets, and gave the alarm. Some fall to killing of the enemies that asleep; others sing dry linter and straw for to kindle fire upon their hues and pavilions; other some again keep the gates, that none should issue forth. So the fire, the outcry, and massacre all together put them out of their right wits, and made them as it were. Besides themselves: that neither hear they could, nor yet make any shift for themselves. Unarmed and killed men fell among the bands of armed souldiers. Some run in haste to the gates, others finding the waies and passages beset, run up to the rampier: and look as they escaped and got away from thence by that means he flieth straightwaies directly toward the other camp. Where they H were caught up by the cohort of footmen, and the corner of horsemen, which rose up suddenly out of their Ambuscado: and being enclosed on every side, were killed to the last man. And yet, if it had been any ones good hap to have escaped from thence with life, so swiftly, and with so great expedition, the Romans after they had got the nearer camp, sped themselves to the other, that he could not have recovered it before them, to bring news of the defeat. And even there likewise, the farther they were off from their enemy, the more negligent they were: and because some also a little before day were slipt away a forraging, fuelling, and plundering, the Romans found every thing more loose and out of order, than in the other camp. Their weapons only stood reared up in their corps de guard, the souldiers themselves were unarmed, either sitting and lying all along on the ground, or walking up and down before the gates, and under the rampier. With these souldiers so secure, so retchleis, so disarmed and disordered (the Romans being yet in their hot blood, and not cooled upon their fresh massacre, and more than that, lusty and brag for their new victory) began to make a fray, and to skirmish. But the Carthaginians were not able to keep them out of the gates. And so within the Camp there was a hot and cruell fight: for, from all parts thereof, they ran together upon the first alarm that arose in the very beginning of the tumult and scuffling. And long had that skirmish continued, but that the Romans bucklers and targets seen all bloody were a pattern unto the Carthaginians of a former execution: and thereupon drave them into a mighty fear. This fearfull fight caused them all to turn back and take their heels: and thus as many of them as escaped killing got out by heaps wheresoever they could make shift to find way, and were clean turned out of their camp, and all that they had. So in the compass of one day and night, by the conduct and direction of L. Martius, there were two encamped holds forced and won from the enemies: in which there were 37000 of the enemies slain, saith Claudius, who translated the Annals of Acilius out of the Greek tongue into the Latine, and 1830 taken prisoners besides the gain of a mighty rich booty. In which pillage there was found a shield of silver weighing 138 pound, with the image and portraiture of Asdrubal the Barchine. Valerius Antias recordeth, that the camp only of Mago was taken, and seven thousand men slain: and that in another battell with Asdrubal, upon a sally forth, there died ten thousand, and 4330 were taken prisoners. Piso writeth, that when Mago followed after our men in an hor and disorderly chace (for they seemed to give back and retreat) there were five thousand men killed by the train of an ambush. But all writers do blazon the great honour and fame of Duke Martius. And besides the very truth of his glorious name, they make mention also and speak of some miracles: namely, that as he made the Oration unto his souldiers, there was seen a flaming fire burning from his head, without any sense and feeling of his, to the great wonder and fear of the souldiers that stood about him: and that in the memoriall of his brave victory over the Carthaginians, there remained in the temple of Jup. untill the Capitoll was burned, that foresaid shield, with the Image of Asdrubal, and it was called Martius his shield. After this, Spain was quiet for a long time, whiles both sides after so many overthrowes given and taken between them, were loath to hazard the main chance in one battell.

In the time that these affairs passed in Spain, Marcellus upon the winning of Syracuse, having set all other things in order throughout Sicily, with such faithfulness and upright integrity, that not only he greatly augmented his own glory, but also enlarged the majesty of the people of Rome, brought over to Rome all the goodly and beautiful ornaments of that City, their graven and molten images, their pictures and painted tables, whereof there was great store in Syracuse. These braveries (no doubt) at the first were no more but the spoils of enemies, and lawfully acquired in right of war and conquest. But from thence began our great love and liking to the cunning workmanship of Grecian Artisans: and from hence came afterwards our licentiousness and outrage in spoiling and robbing, so commonly & ordinarily, all sacred and profane places, where these things were to be had: which staid not so, but proceeded and turned at length to the spoiling of the Roman gods themselves, and to that very first Temple which by Marcellus was beautified and adorned principally above the rest. For strangers and forrein travellers used in pilgrimage to visit the Temples which were dedicated by Marcellus at the gate Capena, in regard only of the most rare and singular workmanship of the ornaments in that kind, of which at this day there is very little or nothing to be seen.

Now from all City well-near of Sicily, there resorted Embassies unto him: as their causes were divers and unlike, so their conditions were not all one. As many as before the winning of Syracuse, had either not rebelled at all, or became reconciled and in favour again they were accepted in the quality of faithfull Allies, and made much of: those who for fear after the loss of Syracuse, yielded, were reputed as conquered, and received laws and conditions at the will and pleasure of the Conqueror. There remained yet no small reliques of war about Aggrigentum for the Romans to dispatch namely, Epicides and Hanno, the Captains of the former war: and a third, sent new from Annibal in the room of Hippocrates, a Citizen of Hippo (his countymen name him Martes) descended from the Libyphancies, a man of Action, and one who under Annibal had been brought up, and taught all feats of arms, and skill of warfare. Unto his charge were committed by Epicides and Hanno the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he over-ran all the countries belonging to the enemies: he went unto all the Confederats, and so wrought with them to continue fast in their allegiance, and to send aids to every one in due time accordingly: in such sort, that within A within short time he got himself a great name throughout all Sicily, so as the favorites and faction of the Carthaginians had no greater hope in any than in him. And therefore both Captains, as well Hanno the Carthaginian, as Epicides the Syracusan, who for a time had been pent up within the walls of Agrigentum, bearing themselves as well upon the fidelity as policy of Mutines, boldly adventured to come forth of the walls of Agrigentum, and upon the river Himera encamped themselves. Whereof Marcellus having intelligence, forthwith removed with all his power, and sat him down encamped, almost four miles from the enemy, minding to wait and expect what they did or went about. But Mutines gave him neither opportunity of place to rest him long, nor respite of time to take counsell in, but crossed the river, and with exceeding terrour, and tumultuous noise assailed the standing guards of his enemies: yea, and the morrow after gave them battell as it were in a pitch field, and drave them within their holds and fortifications. But being called from thence by occasion of a mutiny of Numidians within the Camp (who to the number almost of three hundred were departed to Heraclea Minoa) he went to appease their moods, and to reclaim them to due obedience: but he gave the rest of the Captains (by report) a great charge and express warning, not to fight with the enemy, howsoever they did in his absence. But both the Captains were greatly offended therat, and Hanno especially, who was already male-content, and repined at his glory: What? saith he, thinketh Mutines, a base African, and not of the right stamp neither, to gage and rule me, a Carthaginian General, sent with Commission from the Senat and people? He periwaded therefore Epicides effectually to pass over the river, and to strike a battell: for quoth he, if we should stay for him, and then hap to have a fortunate day of it and win the victory, all the honour no doubt shall redound to Mutines.

Be ye sure, Marcellus thought this a great indignity, that he who had repulsed at Nola Annibal, even when he bare himself so bravely upon his fresh victory at Canna, should give one foot to these petty enemies, vanquished already by him both by sea and land: whereupon he commanded his souldiers to arm in all haste, and to bring forth the standards and ensigns. But as he was arranging his men in battell array, there came riding unto him all on the spur, with bridle on the horse neck, ten Numidians from out of the army of the enemies, with these tidings and intelligences, assuring them, "That their countymen, who first were offended and discontented by occasion of that mutiny aforesaid, wherein three hundred of their company departed and went away to Heraclea: and then afterwards, because they saw their own head and leader, by the practice of those other Caprain, who maligned and envied his glory, sent far enough out of the way, even against the very day when the battell should be fought: were not disposed at all to fight, but would sit still and not stir. A kind of people these were, deceitfull otherwise, and used to break promise: howbeit now, they were just and true of their word. Upon this, as the Romans took better heart unto them, (for there was a speedy pursivant or courier sent throughout the battailions, from company to company, for to signifie unto them, that the enemy was disappointed and abandoned of his Cavalry, whom they feared most of all other) so the enemies were mightily dismaied and put in fear: for over and besides, that they had no help from them who were the greatest strength of their army, they were in a deep fear lest their own horsemen would E set upon them. By which occasion the conflict was not great, for at the first shout and shock given, well it was seen which way the game would go, and the matter was soon determined. The Numidians, who at the first encounter, and during the conflict, had stood quiet in both points of the battell, seeing their own fellows turn back and flie, bare them only company for a while as they fled: but after that they perceived them all to make haste for fear to Agrigentum: fearing also themselves there to be besieged among them, slipped away every one to their own Cities. Many thousands were there slain and taken prisoners: and eight elephants besides taken alive. This was the last field fought by Marcellus in Sicily: upon this victory he returned to Syracuse. By this time now was the year almost come about and growing to an end. And therefore at Rome the Senate decreed, that P. Cornelius the Praetor should send letters to the Consuls, lying before Capua, reporting this tenour: That forasmuch as Annibal was far from them, and no great matter of consequence like to be performed the while at Capua: the one of them (if they thought so good) should repair to Rome, for to create new Magistrates in the room of the old. The Consuls having received the letters, agreed between themselves and took order, that Claudius should go to hold and accomplish the solemn election of Magistrates: and Fulvius remain still at Capua. So Claudius created new Coss. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and P. Sulpicius Galba the son of Servius: a man that had not borne any curule office of state before. After these were Praetors chosen, L. Cornelius Lentulus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, C. Sulpicius, C. Calpurnius Piso. Unto Piso befell the jurisdiction within the City: Sulpicius had the government of the Province Sicily. Cethegus of Apulia: and Lentulus of Sardinia. The Consuls had the government of their Provinces prorogued for to continue one year longer.

ANnibal encamped himselfe at three miles end from Rome, fast upon the river Anio. Himselfe in person, accompanied with two thousand men of arms, rode to the gate Capena, for to view the sit of the City. And notwithstanding that for three daies space the armies of both sides were come into the field ready embattled, yet they never joyned in conflict, by reason of the tempestuous and stormy weather: But ever as they were returned again into their Camps, presently it proved fair. Capua was won by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius the Pro-Consuls. The Nobles and principall Citizens of Capua poisoned themselves. When as their Senators stood bound to stakes (for to be whipped) and then to lose their heads, there came letters from the Senate of Rome unto the Pro-Consul Q. Fulvius, with direction to spare their lives: but before that he would read them, he put them up into his bosome, and willed the ministers or executioners to let the Law have the course, and to do their office, and so he went through with the execution. It hapned that in a solemn assembly of the people there was much debate and question, who should govern as L. Deputy the Province of Spain: and when no man was willing to undertake that charge, P. Scipio, the son of that Publius who was slain in Spain, made offer to go that voyage, and by the voices generally of the people, and with one accord of all he was thither sent. In one day he assailed and also forced New-Carthage. being a young man, not fully 24 year old. And there went an opinion of him, that he was descended of some heavenly race: both for that himselfe, after he was come to seventeen years of age, and had put on his mans robe, conversed within the Capitoll, and also because there was a snake or serpent seen oftentimes in his mothers bedchamber. This book containeth besides the affairs in Sicily: the amity concluded with the Etruscians: and the war against the Acarnanians and Philip King of the Macedonians.

The six and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

CNENS Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Sulpitius Galba the Consuls, when they had entred into their Magistracy upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senators into the Capitoll, where they consulted with the LL. about the state of the Common-weal, concerning the administration of the wars, and as touching the Provinces and the Armies. Q. Fulvius and App. Claudius, the Consuls of the former year, continued still their rule and full command, with the charge of the same forces which they had before under their hands. And over and besides, they were expressly commanded, not to depart from Capua (before which they lay at siege) untill they had forced and won the City. For at that time the Romans among all their other affairs were most amused upon it: not so much for anger and malice, (whereof they had never against any one City greater and juster cause) as in this regard, that being a state so noble and mighty, like as by revolting first it had drawn and induced certain other Cities to do the same: so if it were recovered and regained, like it was to reduce their affections again to look back and return unto their old allegiance and obedience to their wonted signiory of Rome. The Prætors also of the former year, M. Junius in Tuscany, and P. Sempronius in Gaul, continued in their places of regiment, with two legions a piece under their conduct, the same which they had before. And so M. Marcellus remained as Pro-Consul behind in Sicily, for to finish and dispatch the reliques of the war there, with the power of that army which he had already: and had commission (if need were of new supply) to make up the number of his companies, out of those legions which were commanded by P. Cornelius the Vice-Prætor in Sicily: provided alwaies, that he chose no souldier out of those bands, unto whom the Senat had flatly denied, either licence to be discharged, or passport to return home into their country, before the war was fully ended. Unto C. Sulpitius, whose lot it was to govern the Province of Sicily, were assigned those two legions, which P. Cornelius had before: with a fresh supply, out of the army of Cnens Fulvius, which the last year was shamefully defeated, beaten and put to flight in Apulia. These souldiers, all the sort of them, had the same limitation of service and no other, appointed and set down by the Senat, as those former who remained after the overthrow at Cannæ. And this disgrace they had besides, as well the one company as the other, that they might not winter within any town, nor build them any standing camp for wintering harbours, within ten miles of a City. L. Cornelius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, was allowed to have the conduct of those two legions which were under the leading of Q. Mutius. And order was given unto the Consuls, to levy and enroll a new supply thereto if need required. T. Octacilius and M. Valerius were appointed to guard and defend all the sea-coasts of Sicily and Greece, with the

A the help of those Legions and Armadoes which they had already. The Greeks had fifty sail in their fleet, and were manned with one Legion. The Sicilians had one hundred ships, and two Legions to furnish them. So that in this year the Romans maintained three and twenty Legions, to wage war both by sea and land.

In the beginning of the year, when the letters of L. Martins were read and scanned in the Senat house, the L. there assembled, liked well of the contents, and spake highly in the praise of his worthy acts: but many of them were offended at the superscription, because he took upon him the honourable title of a Pro-Prator in his stile, and wrote thus, [L. Martins the Pro-Prator to the Senat] considering, that his command was neither granted by the people, nor allowed and confirmed by the Senat. An ill precedent (say they) it is, and of bad consequence, that Generals of the field should be chosen by armies, and that the solemnity of Elections, so devoutly begun in the name of the gods, and with the religious observation of the Bird-flight, should now be transferred into the Camps and Provinces far from Laws and Magistrates, and committed to the inconsiderate wills of rash affectionate souldiers. And when some there in place were of opinion, that the matter should be put in question at the Council Table, it was thought better to defer that consultation, untill those gentlemen of service, that brought the Letters from Martius, were gone and departed. As concerning corn and apparell for the army, they agreed to write back unto him, that the Senat would take order and provide for both: but they would not allow in any cause to give him this addition, and to write [To Martins the Pro-Prator] lest that they might seem to approve the very same thing by their prejudice and doom aforehand, which they had left for to be decided and determined afterwards. When the Gentlemen aforesaid had their dispatch, and were dismissed, the first thing that the Consuls propounded was it, and no other: and generally they jumped in this one point, for to deal with the Tribunes of the peoples, that with all speed possible they would move the Commons, and propound unto them, for to know, who their will and pleasure was should be sent L. Deputy into Spain, for to have the government of that army, whereof Cn. Scipio, L. General, had the conduct.

This matter, I say, was treated of with the Tribunes, and a bill preferred thereof unto the Commons: but there was another greater contention in terms, that had possessed their minds already. For C. Sempronius Blafus had commented a criminal action against Cn. Fulvius, accusing him for the loss of the Army in Apulia, and ceased not in all the assemblies of the people to make invectives against him, charging him, That being Captain General, through his much folly ignorance, and rashness, he had brought his army into a place of danger: reproving him moreover, and saying, That never any Captain but Cn. Fulvius had corrupted, marred, and infected his legions with all kind of vices before that he betrayed them to the enemies in such wise, that it might be well and truly said, that they were altogether spoiled and defeated before they had a fight of their enemies: and were not vanquished by Annibal, but by their own Colonel and Commander. See (quoth he) the disorder that is in Elections, and how no man, when he is to give his voice, doth well weigh and consider, who it is that he choiceth a General & unto whom he committeth the charge of an Army. Behold the difference between Cn. Fulvius, and T. Sempronius. This man having the leading of an army of bondslaves, by discipline, good order and government, within short time brought his souldiers to that good pass, that there was not one of them all throughout the army remembered and regarded how basely he was born, and of what parentage descended, but all in general bare themselves so, that they were to their friends a sure defence, and to their enemies a fearful terror: and after that he had recovered them out of Blumentum, & other Cities, (as it were, out of the claws of Annibal) he restored and delivered them safe & sound to the people of Rome. Whereas contrariwise Cn. Fulvius having received an army of Roman Citizens, well and worshipfully born, liberally and honestly brought up, had taught them servile vices fit for slaves, and so trained them, that with their friends and allies they were stout, proud, and unruly; and among their enemies were cowards & very dastards: so far from that they were to be a posse, the violence of the Carthaginians, that they were not able to abide so much as their first cry and shout. And no marvel I assure you, that the souldiers could not stick to it in the battell, and hold out manfully: when the General himself was the first that ran away headly. I rather wonder at it, that any of them stood to it and died in the field, and were not all of them as fearful as Cn. Fulvius, and took not heels with him for company. Yet C. Flaminius, L. Paulus, L. Posthumus, both Scipios, as well Cn. as P. chose rather to lose their lives in battell, than to forsake their armies when they were environed round with enemies. But Cn. Fulvius he was in manner the only man that returned to Rome with news of the army defeated and overthrown. Now verily a great indignity it is, and a shameful manner of proceeding, that the residue of the army, after the overthrow at Canna, because they fled out of the field, were confined and transported over into Sicily, with expell condition, nor to return again from thence before that the enemy were clean gone and departed out of Italy: & that the very same rigorous and heavy decree passed likewise, and was executed against the Legions of Cn. Fulvius, and Cn. Fulvius himself, who fled out of the battell which was through his own folly and rashness begun should go away clear, and escape without all punishment: that himself, I say, should lead his old age butaverns, stews, and brothel-houses, where already he hath spent his youth full daies; while his poor souldiers (who had faulted in nothing, but that they were like unto their Captain) he banisheth enough off, and packed away (as it were) into exile, and endure shame.

The Oration
of T. Sempronius Blafus against
Cn. Fulvius.

The answer of
Cn. Fulvius.

"full and ignominious soldiery. Lo, how unequally at Rome the freedom of the City is parted "between the rich and the poor; between men of nobility and high calling, and those that are of "mean parentage and low degree.

Thus much spake the plaintiff C. Sempronius Blaesus. The defendant on the other side shifted all the blame from himself, and laid the whole fault upon his soldiers, alledging and pleading thus, "That when they called upon him hastily, and with great wilfulness for to give battell, he "brought them forth into the field not on that day which they would themselves (for it was late "in the evening) but the morrow after, when both time and place were meet and convenient for "the purpose: and notwithstanding they were well appointed and orderly embattelled, yet were "they not able to sustain either the same, or the fury of the enemies, I know not whether. And "when they all fled away again, he also was carried away in the throng of the rout: like as Varro
"the Consul, at the battell before Cannæ, and as many other Generals elsewhere. And what good "could he have done to the Common weal, in case he had staid behind alone? unless perad-
"venture his death might have cured and remedied the publike sores and maladies, or made "amends for the common losses. Neither was it for want of victuals, nor for that he light at un"awares upon places of disadvantage and danger; nor yet, because he was entrapped within the "trains of an ambush, marching on end forward, without sending his spies before, that he was "overcome; but even by mere force, by dint of sword, in open field, and in a pight battell. And it "was not he could do withall, if his own men were fearful and timorous, and the enemies hardy "and venturous, he had not the rule of their hearts. It is long of every one his own nature to be "either bold or heartless.

Two severall daies was he judicially accused, and at both times a fine of money only set upon his head, in case the matter should go against him. At the third Session the witnesses were produced forth, to be deposed and give evidence: and after that he had been shamefully reviled, and charged with all manner of reproaches, there were very many upon their oath testified, That the first beginning of the fright and flight both, was occasioned by the Prator himself: and that the soldiers seeing themselves forsaken by him, and inposing verily that their Captain and Leader was not afraid of his own shadow, but had great reason to fear, they likewise turned their backs and fled. Upon which evidence, the whole Court was so incensed against him with anger, that they cried all with one voice, to commence a capitall action, for that he was worthy to die.
Whereupon arose a new debate and controversy: for whereas the Tribune had twice before laid a penall action upon him of money, and now at the third time said that he would have a jury of life and death go upon him: then he called upon the other Tribunes for their helping hand to mitigate this rigour of the Tribune. But when those his Collegues made answer again and said, that they would not oppose themselves nor hinder his counsell, but that he might proceed in the suit at his own good pleasure, more majorum, i. e. [according to the ancient manner used by their forefathers,] either by order of law, or rule of custome, and bring him being but a private person to the triall either of a capitall crime, or penall trespass: then Sempronius spake and said flatly, that he laid upon him a criminal action of treason against the State: and requested of C. Calpurnius the Chief Justice of the City, for to have a day of hearing and judicial triall by the people. Then the defendant cast about to help himself by another remedy, namely, in case he could compels that M.
Q. Fulvius his brother might possibly be present at the Session when he should be judged: who at that time was a man of great credit and reputation, in regard both of the name that went on him for his noble acts, and of that great hope which men had of him, that he was like presently to be Master of Capua. But when this said Q. Fulvius had requested so much by letters, entited to that purpose as effectually as he could devise, and to move commiseration and pity in behalf of the life of his brother, the L.L. of the Senat returned this answer unto him again, That it was not for the good of the State that he should depart from Capua: thereupon, before the Sessions day was come, Cn. Fulvius departed of his own accord into exile to Tarquinii, and the Commons made an act and confirmed that banishment of his to be a just, due, and sufficient punishment for his offence.

During these businesses at Rome, the whole strength and force of war was bent against Capua, and yet the City was rather straightly beleaguered than forcibly assaulted: inasmuch as neither the servants or bondmen, nor the common people were able to endure the famine any longer: and send unto Annibal any messengers, they possibly could not, by reason of the straight watch and ward that the Romans kept, so near one unto the other. At length there was a certain Numidian offered to go and to escape clear away, who having taken letters unto Annibal to put him in mind to be as good as his promise, departed in the night, and passed through the midst of the Roman camp, and put the Campanians in very good hope, to issue forth at all the gates, and to make a sally upon the enemy, whiles their power and strength served them. And verily in many scuffings and skirmishes which they made, they got the better for the most part in horse fight: but lightly their footmen had ever the worse. The Romans for their parts were nothing so much pleased when they had the upperhand at any time, as they were discontented and ill afraid, to receive a foil in any kind of service of them, who were not only besieged, but in manner overcome already and conquered. So they devised a means in the end, to make up and supply by industry and policy the defect they had in strength and force. They chose out of all the Legions certain lusty young men, such as for clean strength of body, and lightness withall, were most nimble and swift,

A swift. These had every one of them, a light buckler or target, shorter than commonly horsemen have, and seven javelins or darts apiece, four foot long, with iron heads at one end, like as those Javelins have, which they use to lance that are lightly armed, and begin skirmishes. And every horseman took up one of these behind him on horseback, and used them, both to sit the horse and ride, and also to leap down on foot, with great activity and agility, at the signall and token given them. Now, when as, after daily practice and exercise, they were able to do it nimble enough, and without fear, they advanced forth into the plain, lying between their camp, and the wall of the City, and affronted the horsemen of the Campanians as they stood arranged in battell array: and so soon as they were come within a darts cast, the light javellottiers aforesaid, B dismounted from their horses, at a sign given them: and behold, all of a sudden, out of the Cavalry there was a battaillon of footmen arranged, who charged the men of arms of the enemies, and let flie their shot with great force, dart after dart, which they lanced so thick, that they galled many a horse, and wounded also many horsemen. Howbeit, their fear was much greater, by reason of the strange and unexpected manner of fight. The Roman horsemen seeing their enemies thus affrighted, set too hard, and charged them upon lustily, chased them and beat them down even to the City gates. After this, the Romans were the better in horse-service also. And here-upon began the manner from henceforth to entertain such light armed javellottiers, called Velites, even among the Legions. The first deviser of this mingling of footmen among the horsemen they say was one Q. Navius a Centurion, and that he was highly honoured by the Generall for C his invention.

Whiles things stood thus at Capua, Annibal was greatly distracted in mind, and possessed with two contrary cogitations, whether he should go to gain the Castle of Tarentum, or to rescue and save the City of Capua. At last the regard of Capua prevailed with him: for he saw that as well friends as enemies depended thereupon, and had their mind and eye wholly bent that way: as being a City like to give the very trial and proof, what would the issue be generally of all the revolt and rebellion from the Romans. Leaving therefore behind him a great part of his carriage in the Brutians country, and all his souldiers heavily armed, he made haite into Campania, with an elect power of foot and horse, such as he supposed most meet and best appointed for expedition and riddance of way: yet as fast as he marched, there followed after him three and thirty Elephants, and so he fate him down closely in a secret valley behind the mountain Tiffata, which overlooketh the City Capua. At the first coming he forced the fort called Galatia, and compelled the garrison there to quit the place, and then he turned and opposed himself against the enemies who besieged Capua. But he dispatched certain courriers afore unto Capua to signifie unto them at what time he minded to set upon the camp of the Romans: that they also at the very instant might be ready to issue forth at every gate of the City to do the like. The Romans having no fore-knowledge by their espials of this occurrence, were mightily terrified: for Annibal himself assailed them one way, and all the Campanians as well foot as horsemen (together with the garrison souldiers of the Carthaginians under the leading of Bostar and Hanno their captains) sallied out another way. The Romans therefore being driven to their shifts, as well as they might in so E sudden and fearfull a case, had an eye to this, not to make head altogether one way, and so to leave the rest quite without defence; therefore they divided their forces in this manner among themselves: Appius Claudius opposed himself against the Campanians: and Fulvius against Annibal. Claudius Nero the Vice-Prætor, with the horsemen belonging to the sixth legion, quartered upon the way that leadeth to Suessula: and C. Fulvius Flaccus the Lieutenant with the horsemen of Allies, took up his standing, and planted himself over-against the river Vulturinus. The battell began not after the usual manner, only with shouts and outcries, but besides all other clamours of men neighing of horses, and rustling of armour, there was a multitude of Campanians good for no other service of war, placed upon the wals, who together with ringing and sounding of halons and vessels of brasse (as the manner is in the still dead time of the night, when the moon is in the eclipse) made such an hideous noise, that it caused even them that were in fight to be amused thereupon, and to listen after it. Appius with small ado repulsed the Campanians from the trench and rampier. But Fulvius on the other part had more trouble to deal with Annibal and the Carthaginians, who charged so fiercely upon him, that the sixth legion there gave ground and retreated: which being once beat back, a Squadron of Spaniards and three Elephants passed forwards as far as the rampier, and had already broken through the main battell of the Romans: but they were in suspense between doubtfull hope and present danger, shinking one while to break through and pass into the Camp: and doubtfull another while to be excluded from the rest of their companies. Fulvius seeing this fear of the Legion, and perill where-in the Camp stood, encourageth and exhorteth Q. Navius and other principall Centurions, to assail valiantly, to kill and hew in pieces that one company of the enemies which were fighting under the counterescarp. "For all now lieth a bleeding, quoth he, and in extreame hazard: "for either you must give the enemies way, and then wil they more easily enter into the camp, then "they had already pierced through the thick squadrons of the battell: or else ye must defeat and "slay them in the place, even under the trench. And that (quoth he) were no difficult piece of service, considering they are but few in number, severed and shut out clean from the succour of "their fellows: and the same Roman battaillon which seemeth now disbanded and open, whiles "it is affrighted, if so be it would make head and turn both sides upon the enemy, were able to "com-

"compass round and environ them, and put them to a doubtful hazard, yea, and cut them in pieces within the midst. Navius had no sooner heard the General speak these words, but he caught the ensign of the second band of Hasdrubal from the ensign-bearer, and displayed it in the faces of the enemies, threatening to sling it among the midst of them, unless his souldiers made the better haste to follow him, and settle themselves to fight. He was a goodly tall and personable man of body, his brave armor besides let him out and beautified his person: and withall, the advancing of his ensign on high, drew every mans eye upon him, as well enemies as friends. But when he was approached once to the banners of the Spaniards, then from all hands they spared him not, but hur-red at him their barbed javelins, and the whole battell in manner was bent only against him. But neither the multitude of enemies, nor the volley of their shot, was able to reprecis and rebut the violence of that one man. Likewise M. Attilius a Lieutenant, caused the ensign-bearer of the first band of the Principes, belonging to the same Legion, to enter with his ensign upon the cohort and troop of the Spaniards. The Lieutenants also L. Porcius Licinius and T. Popilius, who had the guarding of the camp, fought valiantly upon the rampier in defence thereof, and killed the Elephants upon the very counterescarp, as they were passing over and entering the camp. And by occasion that their bodies filled up the ditch, the enemies had a passage made them into the camp, as it were over a causey or bridge raised of purpose to give them way: and there over the very carcasses of the Elephants, there was a cruell slaughter committed. But on the other side of the camp, the Campains and the garrison of the Carthaginians had the repulse already: and under the very gate of Capua which openeth upon the river Vultururns, there was another skirmish, wherethe Romans striving to enter the town, were not so much put back and withstood by force of aimed men, as by brakes, scorpions, and other engins of ordnance, which being mounted and planted upon the very gate, discharged shot so violently, that they drove the enemies farther off. Over and besides, the forcible and furious assault of the Romans was danted and suppressed, by reason that their General himself, Ap. Claudius, was hurt; who as he was encouraging his men to fight in the very forefront of the vanguard, hapned to be wounded with a dart above in his breast under the left shoulder: yet there were an exceeding number of enemies there slain before the gate, and the rest were driven for fear to make haste and get the City over their heads. Annibal also perceiving the Cohort of the Spaniards lying along dead, and the camp of the enemies so manfully defended even to the death: gave over farther assault, and began to retire his ensigns, and to turn backward all his footmen, interposing his horsemen behind them, for fear the enemy should charge them on the tail. The legions were exceedingly eager to pursue after the enemies: but Plautius commanded to found the retreat, supposing they had done well enough already, and effected two things, to wit, that both the Campains saw in how little Annibal served them; and also Annibal himself knew and perceived no less. Some writers that have recorded this battell, set down that of Annibal his Army there were slain that day eight thousand men, and of Campains three thousand: that the Carthaginians lost fifteen ensigns, and the Campains eighteen. But in others, I find that the conflict was not so great, and that the flight was much more than the skirmish: for when as the Numidians and Spaniards together with the Elephants brake at unawares into the Roman Camp, those Elephants as they passed through the midst thereof, overthrew and dall along many of the tents and pavilions: and the Sumpter-horses and other beasts there for carriage, with great noise brake their halters, and collars, fled for fear, and bare down all before them as they went. And that besides this tumultuous flight and confusion, Annibal dealt fraudulently, by sending in among the rest certain that could speak the Latin tongue (for some such he had about him) who in the Consuls name gave commandment (since that the Camp was lost) that every souldier should make shift for himself, and flee to the next mountains.
But this deceit was soon espied and prevented with the loss and slaughter of a number of enemies: and the Elephants were coursed out of the Camp with fire. But howsoever this battell was either begun or ended, the last it was fought there, before that Capua was yielded up and surrendered.

The Mediterraneus (for so they call the head Magistrate and Governor of the City of Capua) for that year, was one Seppius Lepidus, a man of base parentage and mean calling. The report goeth, that his mother upon a time as she made satisfaction in the name of him (being then fatherless and under age) by a purgatory sacrifice, for a prodigious domestical portent, that hapned in her house, was told by the Soothsaier out of his learning, that one day the chief government of Capua should befall to that child: whereto, she seeing no likelihood nor hope at all of any such matter, said thus again, You talk of a poor City of Capua, when that day comes; and God save all, when my son shall be advanced to the highest place and government thereof. But these words spoken at random and in jest, proved afterwards good earnest, and true indeed. For when as the Citizens were driven to great straights, through sword and famine, and were past all hope of recovery: in such sort, as they that were of quality and born for honour, refused to be in place of authority, this Lepidus complaining that Capua was forlorn, betrayed, and abandoned by her own nobility took upon him the chief Magistracy, and was the last of all the Campains that bore sovereign rule in that City.

Annibal perceiving that neither his enemies would be drawn forth any more to fight: nor possibly he could break through their camp for to come unto Capua: for fear lest that the new Consuls should stop all the passages, and intercept his purveyance of victuals, determined to dislodge without

A without effecting his purpose, and to remove from Capua. And as he cast and tossed to and fro in his mind what course to take, and whither to go: it came into his head to make no more ado, but to march directly to Rome, the very head and seat-City of the whole war. This was the upshot of all, and the enterprise that he most desired. Howbeit as all others much grieved and greatly blamed him, that he had over-slept the opportunity when it was, even presently upon the battell at Canna: so himself acknowledged no less that he was mightily overseen. And yet the thing was not so far past (he thought) that he should despair, but upon some sudden fright and unexpected tumult, he might seize of some quarter of the City or other. And if Rome were once in that hazard, then either both the Roman Generals, or one at the least, would immediately leave the siege of Capua. B Who if they had once divided their forces, both of them would be the weaker, and minister either unto him, or to the Campanians, some occasion of good fortune. The only thing that troubled his mind was this, for fear lest that as soon as his back were turned, the Campanians would yield themselves unto the Romans. He therefore with large and liberall rewards induceth a certain Numidian (an audacious and adventurous fellow, one that cared not what dangers he undertook) to be the carrier of certain letters, and to enter into the camp of the Romans, counterfeiting himself to be a fugitive, from the adverse part unto them: and so when he espied his time, to slip secretly from the other side of the camp to Capua. The letters were very comfortable, importing unto them, "That his remove and departure from thence was for their good and safety, whereby he meant to withdraw the Roman Captains and their forces from Capua to the defence of their own City of Rome: willing them not to let fall their hearts and be discouraged; for by patient abiding some few daies they should be wholly freed and delivered of the siege. Then he made stay of all the shipping and vessels that he could find upon the river Vulturnus, and commanded them to be brought to Castellum, which he had fortified aforetime with a pile or Castle to guard and keep the place with a garrison. And having intelligence that there was such store of barges and bottoms upon the river, as would serve to transport in one night his whole army: he made provision of victuals for ten daies, brought down his army by night to the river side, and crossed the water with all his power before the next day-light. But this was not carried so secretly, but before that it was effected, intelligence was given thereof by certain runagate fugitives: whereupon Fulvius Flaccus addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, and gave notice thereof. At which tidings men according to their sundry fancies and humours were diversly affected: and as so fearfull an occurrence required, incontinently the Senate assembled.

P. Cornelius, surnamed Asina, was of opinion, that all the Captains and Armies whatsoever should be called home out of all parts of Italy, without regard of Capua or any other exploit besides, save only the defence of the City. Fabius Maximus thought it was a dishonest, lewd, and a shamefull part, to depart from the siege of Capua, and to be scared to turn here and there, and to be carried away with every copy of Annibal his countenance, and with his vain threats and menaces. He that won a victory at Canna, and durst not then go forward to the City, hath he conceived any hope now to win Rome, being also lately repulsed from Capua? No, he marcheth toward Rome, not minding to besiege it, but hoping to raise the siege from Capua. And however it be, I am assured (quoth he) that Jupiter (the witness of covenants broken by Annibal) and other gods besides, will defend us with the help of that army which we shall find at home in the City. Between these two opinions P. Valerius Flaccus held the mean, and prevailed: for he having a regard and due consideration, both of the one and the other: thought good to write unto the Colonels that lay before Capua, and to certify them what strength they had of able men to defend the City: as for the forces of Annibal; and what power was needfull to maintain the siege at Capua, they themselves knew best. Therefore in case that one of the Pro-Consuls there, and part of the army might be spared from thence and sent to Rome, and nevertheless, the siege continue with the conduct of the other Pro-Consul, and the rest of the army: then Claudius and Fulvius should so order the matter between themselves, that the one of them might remain still before Capua at siege, and the other repair to Rome, for to defend and keep their native country from the same danger. Hereupon the Senate agreed, and made an Act: which being brought unto Capua, Q. Fulvius the vice-Consul who was to go to Rome, by reason that his Colleague was sick of his hurt, chose out of the three armies certain companies of souldiers, and so with fifteen thousand footmen, and one thousand horsemen, passed over the river Vulturnus. Then having certain intelligence, that Annibal minded to march along the Latine street way: he took his journey through the towns and burroughs situate upon the way Appia, and sent his courriers before unto Stia, Sora, and Lavinium, which are seated near unto it, not only for to lay provision of victuals ready for him in their Cities and towns, but also from the country villages farther out of the way, to bring their provision to that port through-fare: and to draw forces into their towns for their own defence, and every one to stand upon their good guard, and to look unto their state, as well publike as private. Annibal the same day that he had crossed Vulturnus encamped not far from the river. And the morrow after entered into the territory of the Sidicines, and led his host bear unto Calus. There, after he had staid one day, foraging and spoiling the country, he marched by Sessula, into the territories of Alifae and Casertum, by the way of the Latine street. Under the town Casertum he abode in camp two daies, and raised booties here and there in every place. From thence leaving Lucerana and Aquinum, he came into the country about Fregella, as far as to the river Liris, where where he found the bridge cut down by the Fregellans for to impeach and let his journey. Annibal likewise was staid at the river Vulturnus, by reason that the barges and bottoms were burnt by Annibal: and much ado he had, for the great scarcity of timber and wonds, to make punts and boats for to set over his army. But Fulvius, after he had once transported his men in such boats and planks as he made shift withall, had afterwards no hindrance in his journey: but found not only store of victuals in the Towns and Cities as he travelled, but also plenty thereof brought ready for him to the waies side right courteously. Then the souldiers as they marched on foot cheered and encouraged one another to mend their pace and make speed, considering they went to the defence of their naturall country. Now there was a post sent from Fregelle, who rode night and day and never made stay, and he put the City in exceeding fear. The running together besides of the people, that ceased not to make every thing more than it was, and to invent somewhat of their own fingers ends, and put it to the news that they heard, made a greater hurry than the messenger himself, and set the City in an uprore. And not only the women were heard to weep and wail in their own private houses: but also from all parts the Dames of the City came flocking into the streets, running about to all the Churches and Chappels of their gods and goddesses, sweeping the Altars with the tresses of their hair hanging down, kneeling upon the bare ground and stretching out their hands up toward heaven unto the gods, pouring out their prayers and supplications, That they would vouchsafe to preserve the City of Rome out of the hands of the enemies, and to save the Roman wives and their little children from harm and all abuse. The body of the Senat gave attendance upon the Magistrates in the common place, ready to give them their advice and counsell. Some receive of them direction, and departed every man to execute his charge: others offer themselves to the Magistrates, to be employed in any service whatsoever. Sundry guards were bestowed in the Castle, in the Capitoll, and upon the walls: all places about the City were well manned. The Alban mountain also and the Castle of Tusculum were furnished with good garrisons. Amidst this alarm tidings came, that Q. Fulvius the Pro-Consul, was departed from Capua, and onward on his journey to Rome with an army. And because he should not be abridged of his power and authority, after he was come into the City, there was a decree granted out of the Senat-House, that Q. Fulvius should have as large a commission of role and command as the Consuls themselves. Annibal, after he had made fouler work and havock in the territory of Fregelle, than in other places, for anger that they had cut down the bridges against his coming, led his army through the Frusinat, Ferentinat, and Anagnine countries, and came forwards into the territory Lavicos: and so by Algidum he marched toward Tusculum. And when he could not be let in there within the walls, he descended beneath Tusculum, on the right hand to Gabi: from whence he conducted his army into Pupinia, and eight miles from Rome encamped. The nearer the enemy approached to the City, the greater slaughter was made of the peasants that fled from him, by his vancurriers, the Numidian light-horsemens whom he sent afore to make riddance. And many there were of all conditions and ages that were taken captive.

In this tumultuous trouble, Fulvius Flaccus with his army entered Rome at the gate Capena: from whence he went through the midst of the City, along the street Carina into the Esquilie, and from thence he went forth, and between the gates Esquilina and Collina pitched his tents. Thither the Ediles of the Commons brought victuals: the Consul and the Senate resorted to him into the camp, where they sat in Council about the State of the Common-weal. And agreed it was, That the Consuls should lie encamped likewise about the gates Collina and Esquilina: that C. Calpurnius, Prator of the City, should have the keeping of the Capitoll and the Castle with a guard; and that the Senators keep residence continually in good number within the compass of the Forum, what need soever there should be of their counsell and advice, against all sudden accidents. By this time Annibal was come forward as far as to the river Anio, and within three miles of the City lay encamped, where he kept a standing Leaguer. But himself in person with 4000 horsemen advanced forward toward the gate Collina, even as far as to Hercules his Temple, and rode all about as near as he well could, to view the walls, and the situation of the City. Flaccus took soul disdain thereat, and thought it a shamefull indignity, that he should brave it at his pleasure so scornfully without revenge, whereupon he sent out certain of his own Cavalry, and gave commandment, That they should set the enemies horsemen farther off, and chase them back into their Camp. Whiles they were in skirmish together, the Consul gave order, that the Numidian horsemen, such as were fled from the enemy, and turned to the Romans (who were at that time to the number of twelve hundred upon the Aventine hill) should pass through the midst of the City to the Esquilie: supposing that there were none more meet than they, for to fight among the valleys, the garden houses, the sepulchres and hollow waies on every side. Whom, when some from the Castle and the Capitoll, espied riding down the descent of the hill, called Clivus Pupinus, they ran crying about the City, The Aventine is taken, The Aventine is taken, Which alarm caused a tumult, and gave such an occasion of fear and running away, that if the Camp of Annibal had not been without the walls, the fearfull multitude doubtless would have abandoned and quit the City. But they took their houses, and got every man up to the terraces and leads thereof: from whence they pelted with stones and other shot, their own friends instead of enemies, as they rode scattering one from another in the streets. This tumult could not be repressed, nor the error appear, by reason that the waies were so patterned with

A with a number of the country peasants, and of cattell besides, whom sudden fear had driven into the City. Howbeit, the horsemen fought fortunately, and the enemies were removed and set back. And because it was necessary to stay all disorders and uprores that chanced upon small occasions to arise, it was thought good and agreed upon, that all those who had been either Dictators, or born the office of Censors, should have their full power and authority untill such time as the enemy was clean departed from about the walls. And that was to good purpose: for all the rest of that day, and the night following, there were divers and sundry garboiles, without any cause or occasion raised, and the same stilled and appeased by that means.

The next day, Annibal passed over Anio, and brought forth all his whole power into the field. B Neither were Flaccus and the Consuls behind hand for their parts, but ready for battell. When both armies stood arranged in order on both sides, amused upon the issue and event of that one fight, which was for no less a prize and reward to the victorious part, than the very City of Rome: there fell such a mighty storm of rain and hail together, and so troubled both hosts, that they could scarce hold their weapons in hand, but were driven to retire themselves for safety into their severall Camps, fearing nothing less than their own enemies. The morrow after likewise, when they stood in the same place in battell array, the like tempest parted them asunder. And they were not so soon retired into their Camp, but the day was wonderful fair, and the weather calm again.

The Carthaginians took this for an ominous presage to them of ill luck. And Annibal was cheard (by report) to say, That one while his mind, another while his fortune, would not give him leave to win the City of Rome. There were other occurrences besides, as well small as great, that discouraged him and abated his hope. Of more importance was this, that whiles he lay with his host in arms before the walls of Rome, he understood, there were certain companies with banners displayed sent into Spain for to supply the armies there. Of less reckoning was this, that he was advertised by a certain captive, how the very same plot of ground whereon he was encamped, happened at the same time to be sold: not underfoot, but at the full price, and nothing abated. This he took to be so presumptuous a part, and such a scornfull indignity, namely, that there should be a chapman found at Rome, to make purchase of that piece of land, which he was possessed of and held in right of arms, that presently he called for the publike crier and trumpet, and gave commandment unto him, to proclaim port-sale of all the shops of Bankers and money changers at that time about the Forum in Rome. Nevertheless, hereupon he was moved to dislodge and retired his camp backwards from the City to the river Turia, six miles from Rome. From whence he took his way to the grove of Feronia, where stood a Temple, in those daies much renowned for wealth and riches. The inhabitants thereabout were certain Capenats, who used to bring thither the first fruits of their corn and revenues, yea, and many other oblations besides, according to their store: by means whereof they had adorned and garnished it with much gold and silver. Of all those gifts and offerings was this Temple then robbed and spoiled. But after the departure of Annibal from thence, there were found great heaps of brass, by reason that the souldiers upon touch and remorse of conscience, had cast in many brazen pieces. The sacking and pillage of this Temple, all writers do agree upon, and make no doubt thereof. Calpus saith, That Annibal as he went toward Rome from Eretum, turned thither; and he setteth down the beginning of his journey from Rate, Cusil, and from Amiternum. And that out of Campania, he came into Samnium, and from thence into the country of Peligni, and so passed beside the City Salmo, to the Marucins, and then by the territory of the Albenes into the Marians land, and from thence he marched to Amiternum, and so forward to the town Foruli. Neither is there any error or doubt in all this, because the marks and tokens of the voyage of so great an army could nor within the memory and compass of so small an age be confounded and worn out. For certain it is, that he passed that way. The only difference lieth herein, whether he came to the City of Rome, or returned from thence into Campania, by that way aforesaid.

F Now was not Annibal so resolute to defend Capua, but the Romans were as fully bent, and more eager to continue the siege and assault thereof. For he sped himself so fast another way in his voyage back, first out of the Lucans country to the Brutians, and so on still to the streight [of Sicily] and to Rhegium, that with his sudden coming thither, he surprised them at unawares, even before they heard of his arrivall. As for Capua, albeit in the time of Fulvius his absence it was no less straightly beleagured, yet it felt the coming again of Flaccus: and besides, there was much marvell there, why Annibal returned not back as well as he. Afterwards, they understood, by conference with some that were without, how they were forsaken and forlorn of Annibal, and that the Carthaginians were past all hope to keep and hold Capua still to their own use. There was an Edict moreover of the Pro-Consul, passed by order from the Senat, and the same published and divulged among the enemies, That what Citizen soever of Capua would turn to the Romans before such a certain day he should have a generall pardon. But there was no coming in, nor ranging to the Romans side; for fear of punishment at the Romans hands, more than for any regard of their allegiance to the Carthaginians: because their transgression and trespass in their former revolt was so great, that it might not be abandoned. And as no one man at all privately on his own head came over to the camp of the Romans, so there was no good order taken by publike council for the benefit and safety of the whole City. The Noblemen had given over managing of state-matters, and could not be brought by any means to assemble in the Senat.

And

And in chief place of government was he, who had not won to himself any honour thereby, but his unworthiness was derogatory to the authority and power of that Magistracy which he bore. For now there was not one of the chief Citizens and Noblemen that would be so much as seen in the Market place or Common Hall of assemblies: but shutting themselves within doors in their private houses, they expected every day for the destruction of their country, together with their own undoing and overthrow. The whole charge and care lay upon Bellar and Hanno Captains of the garrison in the fort there of the Carthaginians, and more careful were they of their own welfare, than fearful for the jeopardy of their friends and Allies. These two wrote letters unto Annibal, entreated not only in plain terms and frankly, but also sharply and bitterly: wherein they laid unto his charge, "That he had not only betrayed Capua into the hands of the enemies, but also delivered and exposed them and the garrison to the cruel clutches of the Romans to be massacred and executed. That he was gone his waies, and departed into the country of the Bruttii, as one that turned away his face of purpose, because he would not see with his own eyes the loss of Capua. But, I wot, the Romans contrariwise could not be withdrawn from the siege of Capua, no, not by the assaulting of the City of Rome: so much more were the Romans resolute enemies, than the Carthaginians constant friends. But if he would return again to Capua, and bend the full force of his war thither, both they and the Citizens also of Capua would be ready to sally forth and encounter the enemies. For why, they passed not over the Alps with intent to war with the Rhegins and Tarentins: no, but where the Roman Legions were, there ought the armies of the Carthaginians to be. Thus at Canna, thus at Thrasymenus were the victories achieved, by affronting and meeting the enemy, by joyning camp to camp, and by hazarding the fortune of the battell. To this effect were the letters penned, and given to certain Numidians, who for a good reward had offered their service before, for the safe carriage and delivery of them. These fellows presented themselves before Flaccus in the Camp, in habit and quality of fugitives unto his side: hoping to spy out some convenient time when they might give him the slip and be gone. Now by occasion of the famine which had continued long in Capua there was none but might pretend a good and reasonable cause to depart from thence to the adverse part. But behold, there hapned a Capuan wench to come into the leaguer (a naughty pack and an harlot, that one of the supposed counterfeit fugitives aforesaid kept.) She informed the General of the Romans, that those Numidians, fraudulently and by covin, pretended to flee unto his part, and had letters about them unto Annibal. This would she stand to, and be ready to aver to the very face of one of them, who bewrayed & disclosed the plot unto her. At first, when he was brought forth before her, he set a jolly countenance of the matter, & made it very strange & pretending stoutly that he knew not the woman: but by little and little he was convicted by manifest truths, and especially when he saw that they called for the rack, and that he was upon the point to be put to torture: and so in the end confessed that all was true, and therewith brought forth the letters. Over and besides, another thing was now revealed, which before was kept close and secret: to wit, that there were other Numidians besides, who under the colour of fugitives had gone up and down in the Roman camp: of these there were apprehended not so few as threescore and ten, and they together with the new were whipped with rods, had their hands cut off, and sent back again to Capua. This pitious spectacle and sight of so fearful execution killed their courage, and brake the very heart of the Campains. Whereupon the people ran together unto the Council-House, and compelled Leſius to assemble a Senat, and openly threatened the Nobles (who a long time had absented themselves from public consultations) that unless they would now repair into the Senat, they would go home to their very houses, and pluck them out by the ears into the street. For fear hereof, the chief Magistrate had a frequent and full assembly of Senators. Whiles all the rest were of opinion to send Embassadors to the Roman Generals, Vibius Virius (who had been the chief cause and principall author of their first revolt from the Romans) being demanded his advice, spake to the point in this manner.

The Oration
of Vibius Virius in the Senat of Capua.

"They that talk of Embassadors of peace, and of yielding, little consider and remember either what they would have done, in case the Romans had been at their devotion and mercy, or what themselves must endure and suffer. For what think ye will become (quoth he) of this present surrender of ours, in comparison of that whereby in times past we freely gave unto the Romans our selves, and all that we had, for to obtain their aid and succour against the Samnites? And have we so soon forgot, at what time, and in what condition and state we were when we forsook and abandoned the people of Rome? Also, after our revolt, how we most cruelly and shamefully killed their garrison, who we might have dismissed and sent away with their lives? Moreover, how often we have issued forth against them lying at sieges, and how maliciously minded we were unto them, yea, and how we have sallied upon them in their camp? Over and besides, call ye not to remembrance, how we called for Annibal to surprise and defeat them? and (that which of all other is most fresh in memory) how we sent him from thence to give the assault to Rome? On the contrary side mark well and call to mind, how maliciously they have attempted and practised all hostility against us: by which ye may well know what account to make of them, and what ye are to trust unto. For when they had a stranger and forrain enemy within Italy, nay, when they had Annibal their enemy: when the wars were so hot, that all was on a light fire: they passed by all other affairs, yea, they let Annibal himself alone, and sent both their Consuls with two compleat Consular armies to besiege and force Capua. This is the second

A "second year that they keep us entrenched round about, penning us up, and pining us with extreme famine and hunger: during which time, they themselves as well as we, have endured the utmost extremities and dangers that are, and sustained most grievous and infinite travells: oftentimes being killed and cut in pieces about their rampiers, trenches, and ditches, and finally driven almost out of their Camp and hold. But to let pass and speak no more of these ordinary matters, seeing it is an old and usual case for them to abide painfull toil, and incur many perils, who besiege and assault any Cities or towns of their enemies: See a manifest sign of their deadly feud, and execrable hatred against us. Annibal with a puissant power of foot and horsemen both, assailed their Camp, yea, and in some part was Master of it. Think ye that in so great danger of theirs they were one jot withdrawn from the siege? He passed over the river Volturnus, and burnt the territory of Capua: yet for all that calamity and loss, which their allies received, stirred not they one whit, nor gave over their enterprize. He commanded to march forward with banner displayed against the very City of Rome: they made as little account of that dangerous tempest toward, as of all the rest. After he had passed over the river Anio, he pitched his tents within three miles of the City: nay, he approached at length the walls, and made a bravado even under the gates: to be short, he presented unto their eye his resolution, and menaced to make Rome too hot for them unless they levied the siege before Capua: and yet they gave not over but beleaguered us still. The very wild and savage beasts be they never so fell, be they maddened never so much with blind rage and woodness against one, yet if another go to their dens, and offer to take away their whelps, they will turn again to succour and help their young ones: but the Romans, notwithstanding Rome was besieged, their wives and children in danger; whose piteous cries and lamentable plaints were heard almost even hither; notwithstanding their altars, their sacred fires, the temples of their gods, the monuments and sepulchers of their Ancestors, were profaned, abused, and polluted, could not be drawn away from Capua. So eager, so hungry are they to be revenged of us, so thirsty are they to drink out blood. And good reason, haply, they have so to do. For would not we also have done the semblable, if fortune had given us the opportunity? But seeing the will of the immortall gods is otherwise: and considering that I owe nature a death: in my power it is (whiles I am at liberty, whiles I am mine own man, and master of myself) to avoid torments, to shun shamefull ignominies and reproaches (whereof the enemy hopeth I shall feel the smart) and that by one kind of death, which as it is honest, so it is also easie and gentle? Never will I endure to see Ap. Claudius and Q. Fulvius proudly and insolently bearing themselves upon their conquest over us: never will I be led and haled bound with chains through the City of Rome, to make a shew, and to serve for a spectacle and gazing stock in their Triumph: and afterwards either in dark prison, or tied openly to a stake, yield my back and side to be tewed, whipped, and mangled: and then lay my neck upon the block, to have my head chopt off with the bloody axe of the Romans. Never wil I behold my native country sacked, spoiled, and put to fire and sword, nor the chaste married dames of Capua to be forcibly ravished, the fair and beautiful maidens shamefully deflowered, and the well-favoured young boies and freeborn, unnaturally abused. They rased Alba in times past from the top to the very foundation, and left neither stick nor stone thereof, Alba I say, from whence they had their off-spring, and were first descended: to the end that there might remain no memory at all of their stock and first original. And shall I ever beleieve they will spare Capua, & receive into mercy, against which they are more hatefully and mortally bent than against Carthage? Therefore, my masters and friends, as many of you as are minded and resolved to die before ye see these so many miseries and wofull calamities, I have at home a supper this night well furnished and provided for you all: and when ye have eat meat your fill, and drunk wine to it liberally, the same wastell cup that first will be presented unto me, shall go round about to you all: and that one draught shall deliver your bodies from torments, preserve your spirits from anguish, and contemptuous disgrace: keep your eyes from beholding all cruell acts, your ears from hearing, all shamefull indignities which follow and attend upon conquered persons. There shall be also in readinesse certain servitors of purpose to make a mighty great fire within the base court-yard of mine house, and to cast our dead bodies thereinto. This is the only honest way to death, and befitting us who are free born and gentlemen indeed. In which doing, our enemies will wonder at our vertue and valour: yea, and Annibal himself shall well know that he hath forsaken and betrayed his trust and magnanimous allies.

This Oration of Virius, there were more men present that heard with applause and good liking than could find in their hearts to put that in execution which they so well allowed & approved. The greater part of the Senat, not despairing, but that the clemency of the people of Rome, which had been tried and seen oftentimes in many wars, might be gained and extended also unto them; concluded, to send Embassadors with commission to yield Capua into the Romans hands. Some seven and twenty Senators there were that accompanied Vibius Virius home to his house, and supped with him: and after they had done what they could to drink themselves drunk, and to intoxicate their brains with freely taking in their wine, (thereby to withdraw their minds from the sense and apprehension of their imminent harm and misery) drunk all of the poisoned cup above said. This done, and the banquet ended, they rose from the table, took one another by the hand, embraced each other, taking their last leave, bidding a finall adieu and farewell, and bewailing together with pteuous tears their own misfortune, and the miserable estate of their country, some staid behind to be burned in one and the same fire for fellowship, others brake company and departed to their own houses. Now, by reason that their veins were filled with full feeding and drinking wine so liberally, the poyson was not so quick of operation, nor so effectually as to hasten their death. And therefore most of them languished all night long, and continued drawing on a piece of the next day, before they let their last breath: but yet they all had yielded up their ghost before that the gates were let open for the enemies.

Capua delivered to the Romans.

The day following, the gate of Jupiter which stood next over against the Roman Camp, was by the commandment of the Pro-consul opened. Thereat entred one legion and two cornets of horsemen, under the leading of C. Fulvius the Lieutenant: who after he had first above all other things given expresse order, that all armor of defence, and weapons of offence (which was to be found in Capua) should be brought forth and presented unto him: placed and disposed at all the gates, warders sufficient to see that no person might possibly go forth, or be let out: then he laid hold upon the garrison of the Carthaginians, and commanded the Senators of Capua to repair into the Camp, before the Roman Captain Generals themselves. So soon as they were thither come straightwaies they had irons clapped upon them, and were commanded to make tender unto the treasurers of all the gold and silver they had. The gold amounted to 70 pound weight: the silver rose to the weight of three thousand and two hundred pound. Five and twenty of the Senators were sent to Cales, eight and twenty to Theaurum, to be kept safe in ward. Even those who were known for certain to have principally moved and perswaded the revolt from the Romans. Concerning the punishment of the Senators of Capua, Fulvius and Claudius could not agree: Claudius was more tractable and exorable, and might have been soon entreated for a pardon. Fulvius was more rigorous, and proceeded to a harder course. Whereupon Appius put over the whole deciding and determination thereof unto the Senate of Rome. Alledging that it was meet and requisite, that the LL. of the Council should have the examination of the cause, and namely upon these points. Imprimis, whether they had conspired and combined in this action, with any of the free burroughs and Cities belonging to the state of the Latines. Item, whether they had any help and relief from thence in the time of the war, or from any other towns whatsoever? But Fulvius in no case would condescend thereto, nor suffer that the minds of faithfull and loyall allies should be disquieted with doubtfull surmises and insinuations of any crimes: and called in question upon the appeachment and delatory information of those that never yet made reckoning of conscience, either what they did, or what they said. And therefore he protested to suppress that manner of proceeding, and crush that inquisition for ever. After this communication they departed asunder: and Appius made no doubt but that howsoever his Colleague fared and took on giving out so shrewd and bitter words, he would yet take pause and stay for the letters from Rome, concerning so weighty a business as this was. But Fulvius, because of his designment, brake up his keeping of state in his royall pavilion, and sent his officers and ordinary train out of the way, because he would not be hindered and empeached by them, in the course of his designment: and commanded the Colonels and Captains of the Allies, to give warning unto two thousand chosen men of arms, for to be in readines and present themselves at a third sound of the trumpet. With this power of horsemen he set forward by night, and marched to Tiburum: and by break of day entred the gate and kept his way on into the market-place. At the first entrance of the horsemen, the people ran together from all parts: then he caused the chief Magistrate (a Sidicin) to be called, and charged him to produce his prisoners the Capuans, whom he had in custody. When they were all brought forth, they were first whipped with rods, and then beheaded. From thence he rode upon the spur to Cales: where so soon as he was set on the Tribunal seat, in place of judgement, and the Capuan prisoners likewise presented in place and bound to the stake: there came a horseman in post from Rome, and when he had delivered letters from C. Calpurnius the Consul, and the people of Rome unto Fulvius: there ran a trumpet from the Tribunal through all the assembly, that the whole process against the Campanians was to be put off and reserved entire to the censure and doom of the Lords of the Senate. And Fulvius supposing it to be no less indeed, after he took the letters, never brake them up, but bestowed them in his bosome, and gave commandment to the Crier, to charge the Lictor or executioner to do his office, according to law. Thus they also that were at Cales were executed and suffered death. Then he read the letters, and the order set down by the Senate: but it was too late now, to stay that which was done already and past and which indeed was hastened with all speed that might be, for fear it might have been crossed and prevented.

The Senators of Capua executed.

Now as Fulvius was arising from the bench, Tancredius, a Campan, passing amidst the throng, called by name aloud upon Fulvius. Whereat Flaccus wondering what the man meant, sat him down again upon his seat and demanded what he would: Mary (quoth he) command me also to be killed that thou maiest boast and glory another day that thou hast done to death a better man by far and much more valiant than thy self. Surely (quoth Flaccus) this fellow is lunatick and not well in his wits: and again, were I minded to take his life from him, I am inhibited by vertue of the act of the Senate. "Then (quoth Fulvius) since that my country is forced and lost, my kinsfolk and friends made away: seeing also that I have with mine own hand murdered my wife and children, because they should suffer no villanous indignity: and may not my self so much as die this death which my countrymen here have suffered before my face, I will seek by vertue and manhood to ease my self of this life, so tedious, so irksome, and odious unto me: and with

A with that, he drew forth the skein which he had hid under his garment, and stabbed himself in the breast quite through his body, and there at the feet of the L. General, fell down ready to dye in the place. Forasmuch as both the execution of the Campanians, and also the most part of other matters were performed according to the will of Flaccus alone: some there be that write how Appianus Claudius died about the time that Capua was yielded. And that this very same Tancreus neither came to Cales of his own accord, nor killed himself: but that as he was a binding to the stake, because the words which he uttered could not be heard for the confused noise of the people, therefore Flaccus commanded silence; and then Tancreus spake those words before rehearsed, namely, That himself a right valiant and hardy man was put to death by a meaner person than himself, and much inferior to him in valour and virtue. Wherest by the commandment of the Pro-Consul the crier pronounced and said: Go to Sergeant, let this brave and valiant man have the more store of rods bestowed upon him, let him have good scourging, lay on load, and let the lashes surely on, and let him be the first that you proceed against, let him have the law to the full. Some there be that have written, how the act of the Senat was read before he proceeded to the beheading: but because there was this branch or clause within the act, That if he thought so good, he should reserve the whole deciding of the matter unto the Senat: he construed it thus, that it was put to his discretion for to weigh and consider what was more profitable to the Common-weal. This done, he returned from Cales to Capua. Arella and Callatia were both surrendered into his hands: where they also who were the chief heads of those states suffered the like punishment. Thus there were about fourscore of the Senators put to death: and to the number well-near of three hundred Capuans (born of noble blood) committed to prison. Others of them were bestowed in safe custody within divers Cities of the Latines, and came to sundry unhappy ends. The multitude besides of the Campan Citizens were sold outright.

It remained now to put to question and debate, what was to be done with the City and the Territory thereto belonging. And some were of mind, that a City so exceeding mighty, so near a neighbour, and so dangerous to Rome, should be utterly rased and destroyed. But the consideration of a present commodity and gain, took place and prevailed. For in regard of the territory and land lying about it (which was well known to be the most fertile soil in all Italy, and yielded all manner of fruit) the City was saved: whereinto those husbandmen that tilled the grounds, might retire themselves and dwell. And for the peopling and inhabiting thereof, there was a multitude reserved of the Inhabitants which were there already, namely of Libertines and enfranchised bondslaves, Merchants factors, retailers, artizans, and craftsmen who kept there still and remained. But the whole territory, and all publike edifices were seized to the use of the people of Rome. Moreover, order was taken, that Capua should be inhabited only, and replenished with people like a City: but no form of Common-weal, no Corporation, no Senat, no assembly of Commons, nor Magistrature of their own should be allowed there. For without a common Council of State, without magistracy and government, without intelligences and reciprocal commerce, as in the body of a Commonalty, they supposed, that they would never agree together in any conspiracy, but be far unmeet to contrive a conspiracy and compass alteration. As for a Provost or Governor to minister law, and execute justice among them, they purposed to send them one yearly from Rome. Thus were the affairs ordered and composed at Capua by a good policy and commendable counsel every way. For those that were most in fault and guilty were punished with rigour, and that speedily. The number of Citizens were scattered and dispersed sundry waies, without all hope to return again. The bare houses and walls that had not offended they were spared, and neither burned nor pulled down. And besides, the commodity and gain that accrewed unto the Romans by this manner of proceeding, they won some name of clemency and mercy among their Confederates and Allies: in that they saved a most noble and wealthy City, at the ruins whereof all Campanians, and as many States as bordered about Campania, would have grieved much, and grasped at gain. By this means also the enemy was constrained now to confess, and could not otherwise chuse, how powerful and mighty the Romans were to chastise and punish their faithless associates. Pyrrus, and how feeble Annibal was, and not able to defend and maintain those whom he had received into his protection.

The Roman Pro-Consuls after they had finished and performed their charge at Capua, assigned unto Claudius Nero six thousand footmen out of those two Legions which he had before Capua, and three hundred horsemen which he had chosen himself: also of Latine Allies as many foot in number, and 800 horse besides. This army Nero embarked at Portus, and transported into Spain. When he was arrived at Tyrtacon, after he had there landed his soldiers, and laid up his ships in dock, and armed with all his mariners (to make the greater number) he marched to the river Ithrus, where he received the forces of T. Fomtus, and L. Martius, and from thence advanced toward the enemies.

G Asdrubal the son of Amilcar lay encamped at a place called the Black Stones, in the Asturians country: it lieth between the towns Iliturgis and Mentissa. Now Nero kept the narrow straits of the Forrest there. Asdrubal, because he would not be pent up in so strait a room, sent an herald or messenger of peace to him, who should make promise in his name, that if Nero would permit him to pass peaceably from thence, he would withdraw all his forces out of Spain. The Roman Captain took this message joyfully: and Asdrubal requested, That they might impart the next day, and devise together how the Romans would set down conditions and articles in writing, ting, as touching the rendry and delivery of the fortresses in every City, and likewise of prefixing some day, by which time the garrisons should be removed and displaced, and the Carthaginians have away all their bag and baggage without fraud and covin. Asdrubal having obtained his request, presently commanded, that in the very evening, and all night long the heaviest and most cumbersome part of his whole army should escape what way soever they could out of the gullet of the Forrest. But he gave especial direction, that they should not over many of them that night go forth, because their small number was not only fitter to deceive the enemy, and not so soon to be discovered, but also might more easily pass through those narrow and difficult passages. So the morrow they came to an interview and parl; where the time was spent of purpose in much needless talk, and drawing of books, more than cause was: whereupon the day being far gone, the business was put off unto the next day. And the night ensuing between, ministered Asdrubal more time to send others away. And yet could not they make an end that day neither. Thus there passed certain daies, employed in open shew about dispute and reasoning of the articles and conditions of agreement, and the nights were bestowed in letting out the Carthaginians closely out of their Camp. Now, after that the greater part of his host was gone away cleary, then he began to wrangle and jar, yea, and to go from some offers that he had voluntarily made, and ever they were further and further off from agreement. For Asdrubal the less that he feared, the less also was to be trusted. And by this time in manner all his Infantry were got out of the Forrest, and the next morning, not only the Forrest, but all the plains about were overcast, and covered with a thick and foggy mist. Which Asdrubal perceiving, he sent a messenger to Nero, requesting to defer their farther conference and communication to the morrow, pretending, that the present day was a festivall holy-day among the Carthaginians, and therefore they made scruple upon it, to follow any other business but serve God. All this while there was no fraud so much as once suspected. Asdrubal had no sooner obtained respite for that day, but forthwith he and all his Cavalry, together with his Elephants, dislodged, and without any noise or stir recovered without any harm a place of security. By the fourth hour of the day the sun had dispatched and scattered the mist, and cleared the sky, and then the Romans might discover the Camp of their enemies empty, and no creature left therein. Then at length, Claudius perceiving that Asdrubal had shewed him a Carthaginian trick, and that he was at length thus over-raught by his falshood and cunning practice, began to make out after him, minding to bid him battell. But the enemy would none of that, and fell off. Howbeit there passed some small skirmishes between the rereward of the Carthaginians, and the forlorn hope and vancourtiers of the Romans. Amidst these affairs (the States of Spain) neither they who revolted after the overthrow of the Romans, returned again unto them; nor any new fell away, more than before.

At Rome, the Senate and people after the recovery of Capua, took as great care for Spain now, as for Italy it self. And agreed they were in generall, that the army there should be strengthened with new forces, and a Generall thither sent: but who should be the man was not yet concluded. Forasmuch as they were to take some extraordinary care in the chusing of one to be sent thither, where two singular and renowned warriors were slain within the compass of thirty daies, and to succeed in the room of those twain. Whiles some nominated one, and some another, at length they grew to this point, that the people should hold a solemn assembly (as it were, purchased) for election of a Pro-Consul to go over into Spain. And the Consuls accordingly proclaimed a set day for the said assembly. At first there was great expectation that those persons who took themselves worthy of so great command should put forth themselves, and prefer their own names beforehand. But when this expectation failed and came to nothing, every man began afresh to retrace and renew the former grief, and mourn again for the losses received, and to find the want and miss of so valorous Captains whom they had lost. Whereupon the whole City being sad and pensive, and in manner destitute of all good counsell, and not resolved what to do in this hard case, came yet down into Mars field upon the day, appointed for the election. Every mans eye was upon the Magistrates, and beheld the countenances of their great men and Rulers, how they looked one upon another, grieving and grumbling, that the State was at so low an ebb, and the Common-wealth grown to so desperate a case, that no man durst be seen to take upon him the government and Province of Spain. Then all of a sudden, P. Cornelius (his son that was slain in Spain, a young Gentleman, not fully four and twenty years old) shewed himself, and said, That he would undertake that charge upon him: and therewith stepped up into an higher place, from whence he might be seen, and there he stood. Upon whom, when all men had cast their eyes, and viewed him well, in a generall accord and favourable affection unto the man, they wished unto him straightwaies a happy and fortunate government. And when the assembly was willed to give their suffrages, and go to a scrutiny, there was not one Century from the first to the last, nor one person from the highest to the lowest, but gave their voice with P. Scipio, for to take a voyage as L. Deputy into Spain. But after the thing was passed, and their passionate heart of affection once allayed, they were on a sudden driven into a still silence and deep dump, to think what a strange and new deed they had done. And that which they bethought themselves most of, was this, that favour had carried them away in this action more than the due consideration and regard of his age. Some there were that had in dread and horror the ominous fortune also of that family: and the name of him that out of two mournfull houses was to go

A go into those Provinces where he must fight amongst the Sepulchres both of father and uncle. When Scipio perceived, that presently upon the election passed in so hasty a fit, the people grew to be heavy and pensive: he called them to an open audience, and there before them all discoursed of his young age, of the government committed unto him, and of the future war that he was to manage: and that with so noble courage and haughty spirit, that he renewed afresh and kindled again the former zeal and heat that was so cooled: and possessed mens minds with more assured hope than usually mans faithfull promise, or reason grounded upon the confidence of precedents past, or any earthly thing is wont to afford and warrant. For Scipio was a rare and wonderfull man, not only in regard of those true vertues inherent in him: but also for that he had framed himself even from his young and tender years, by artificiall means, to the better setting out of those inbred parts and qualities of his own: making shew and semblant before the multitude, that the most things which he did, were either represented unto him by night-visions and apparitions, or else suggested, as it were, by revelation from the gods above: were it that he was superstitiously given, and his mind wholly possessed therewith, or that by his policy he might effect his designments, and have his commandments performed with more expedition, as if they were directions delivered from the Oracles and the very mouth of the gods. Over and besides that, he made this overture to credit and reputation, and prepared mens minds in this sort from his very first beginning. From the very time that he once put on his mans gown, there was no day went over his head, but before he began his own private busyness, or enterprised any publike affairs, he would go into the Capitoll: and so soon as he was entered into the Temple, there sit him down, and alone by himself bestow a good time in some secret Ile and corner thereof. This ordinary manner of his, which he continued all his life long, (were it of purpose consideratly, or by chance unadvisedly) made divers men beleieve verily, that it was a truth indeed, which was commonly supposed and reported, That the man had a god to his father. Which deep and setled imagination of the people, resembled and renewed again the like fame (in all the world) to that which went before and was bruited abroad of Alexander the great, and for the vanity and fabulous speech of folk, was the very fame and all one in every respect: namely, that his mother conceived him by a mighty great serpent: for that very often in her bed-chamber there was seen some such prodigious and wonderfull thing, and ever as any body came in, it would wind away of a sudden, and vanish out of sight. These strange and miraculous conceits he would never himself elevate and discredit as toies and vanities, but rather cherish and encrease the opinion thereof, by a certain cunning cast of his own, in that he would neither deny and disavow any such matter, nor yet affirm plainly and verifie the same. Many other devices he had of like sort, partly true indeed, partly feigned and counterfeit, which caused men beyond all measure to have this young man in wonderfull admiration. Upon the strong and grounded presumption whereof, the City at that time conferred upon him (far unmeet, I wot, in regard of his unripe years) so great a government, and a world withall of weighty and important affairs.

Besides, the forces which remained in Spain of the old army, and those which were transported over from Puteoli with Claudius Nero, he had a supplement also of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horsemen: and to assist in the conduct of his wars, he had as coadjutor appointed unto him M. Junius Syllanus the Pro-Prator. Thus with a fleet of thirty ships, (and Gallies there were all of five banks of oars) he took the seas, and set sail from the mouth of Tyber, and coasting along the Tuscan seas under the Alps, and through the gulph of Gallia, he doubled at length the point and cape of Pyrene, and disembarked at Emporia a City of Greeks: (for descended they are also from Phoenicia) and there he let his people a land. From thence, having taken order that his ships should follow after, he marched by land to Taracon, which he appointed for the Rendezvous, where all his allies and confederats (for at the wonder and fame of his landing, there flocked Embassadors unto him from all parts of the Province) should meet together at a generall Diet. There he commanded that the ships should be bestowed in their docks, save only three Gallies (of three ranks) which came from Massila, and upon civillie and kindness accompanied him from home, and those were sent back again. Then he gave audience to the Embassadors, who hung in doubtfull suspence by reason of the variety and of sundry changes and chances that lately had happened, and to them he began to return answer, and give them their severall dispatches: but with such a spirit and boldness (upon confidence that he had in his own rare vertues) that he let not fall in all his speech one word that might move quarrell, and favoured of rigour, and yet whatsoever he spake, it carried an exceeding majesty with it, and a singular credit. Being departed from Taracon, he visited both the States of the Allies, and also the standing wintering camps of the army, where he highly commended the souldiers, for that notwithstanding they had received two shrewd blows, upon two so great defeats one in the neck of another, yet they held the Province still, and kept the field; and not suffering the enemies to reap and taste the fruit of their fortunate victories, and kept them out of all the countries lying within Iberus, and defended faithfully all their confederats according to the trust reposed in them. Martinus he had in his train alwaies about him: whom he so highly honoured, that it was very well seen, he feared nothing less than that any other man should eclipse or shadow his glory. Then Syllanus succeeded in place of Nero, and the new souldiers were brought into the standing winter leaguers, and Scipio having reviewed all the Cities and the States that he was to survey, and performed all other affairs that were then to be done, retired and withdrew himself to Taraco.

The fame of Scipio was no less bruised among the enemies, than it was rise with his own Citizens and loving allies: and a certain presage went withall of the future event, which carried (as good hap was) the greater fear and dread with it, as there was less reason that could be rendered and given thereof. They had betaken themselves into their wintring harbours far distant and remote asunder. Asdrubal the son of Gisco even as far as to the Ocean sea side unto Gades: Mago into the midland parts, and especially above the forest and chafe of Casula. And Asdrubal the son of Amilcar wintred nearest unto Iberus about Saguntum.

In the very end of that summer, when Capua was won, and Scipio come into Spain, the Carthaginian Armado which was sent for out of Sicily to Tarentum, for to intercept the victuals, and empeach the same for coming to the Roman garrison that held the Castle of Tarentum, had verily stopped all the passages from the sea to the said Castle: but by their long abode in those parts, and keeping the seas so straightly, they had caused a greater dearth and scarcity of victuals among their own friends than their enemies: for there could not by the help of those Carthaginian ships so much corn be along the river that was possessed by friends, nor from the open ports, for to furnish the townsmen of Tarentum, as the navy it self consumed and spent in maintenance of that rabble of sea-men, sailors, and mariners, mingled of all sorts of people. So as the garrison of the Castle being but few in number there was able to be sustained by the provision they had aforehand, without the help of any new brought in unto them: whereas the Tarentins and the Navy could not have sufficient conveyed unto them: by reason whereof, at length the Armado had leave to depart thence with more thanks of the City, than they had for their first bien-venuth ther. And yet victuals were not much cheaper, because when the help by sea was gone there could be no corn at all be brought from other parts abroad.

At the end of the very same summer, when M. Marcellus was come to the City out of Sicily, his own Province, C. Calpurnius the Prætor assembled the Senat for his sake in the Temple of Bellona. Where, after he had discoursed of the acts by him achieved, and complained after a mild and modest sort, laying open his griefs, not so much in the behalf of himself, as of his soldiers: in that when he had performed and accomplished his charge and commission in his Province, he could not have licence to bring home his army with: he demanded that he might be allowed to ride in triumph into the City: but he could not obtain it. This matter was much canvassed and debated, pro & contra, Whether it were less meet and convenient, to deny him triumph being now present, in whose name whiles he was absent, for the fortunate success and good speed of all affairs under his conduct and government, there was a solemn procession decreed, and sacrifices done to the honour of the immortal gods: or to grant him triumph (as if the war were fully finished) whom the Senate had commanded to make over his army to his successor: which surely they would never have decreed, but that the war remained still within the Province: and especially seeing the army it self was away, the best witness simply, whether he had deserved a triumph or no. At length, a middle and indifferent course between both was agreed upon, namely, that he should enter the City ovant in a petty triumph. And the Tribunes of the Commons, by the approbation first of the Senate, propoied unto the people, that M. Marcellus should the same day that he came ovant into the City retain still his full authority and government. The day before he entered the City, he rode in triumph upon the mount Albanus, and from thence, in ovant wise he sent a rich booty before him into the City. There was carried in this pomp the counterfeit of the City Syracuse won, crossbows, brakes, standing slings, and all other warlike instrument: besides, the ornaments testifying long and continuall peace, and the great wealth and treasure of the Kings: as divers vessels of silver and brais curiously wrought: other household furniture also, rich hangings of capistry, and garments of great price, many goodly images and right noble statues, wherewith Syracuse was adorned and beauried, even with the best and principal Cities of Greece. In token also of a victory over the Carthaginians, there were eight Elephants brought in a show. And that which was not the least sight and spectacle to behold, Sosis the Syracusan, and Mericus the Spaniard went afore with crowns of gold upon their heads. The one of them was the guide when Syracuse was entered in the night season: and the other betrayed Nafar, and the garrison there. Both these were enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and had fifty acres of land a piece granted unto them for ever. Sosis had his land set out in the territory of Syracuse, which either belonged to the Kings, or to the enemies of the people of Rome, and a dwelling house (chuse where he would in Syracuse of all those that were seized upon by right of conquest.) As for Mericus and the Spaniards that with him fled from the enemies, and sided unto the Romans, they had assigned unto them a City to inhabit, and land to occupy in Sicily, which sometime belonged to them that had revolted from the people of Rome. And order was given to M. Cornelius for to appoint them the said City and land wheresoever he thought good. And in the same territory there were allotted and set out four hundred acres of land unto Belligenes, by whose means Mericus was allured and induced to leave the adverse part and turn to the Romans.

After that Marcellus was departed out of Sicily, the Navy of the Carthaginians disbarked eight thousand footmen and three thousand Numidian horsemen, unto them revolted the Murgantine land and Hybla, together with Magella: and other small piles of base account, took example by them and followed after. The Numidians with their Captain Mutines, ranged over all Sicily, and seized the towns and villages belonging to the associates of the people of Rome. Over and besides all this, the Roman army there, being discontented and angry, partly, for that together with their General,

A nerall they were not licensed to go out of the Province: and partly, for that they were forbidden and debarred, for wintering in any good towns: demerited themselves slackly and lazily in their military service: in such sort, as if there had been a head to lead them as they had a heart to move them, they would have mutined and rebelled. Among these troubles and difficulties, M. Corneli- us the Praetor, both appeased and mitigated the stomacks of the souldiers, as well by comfortable words, as by rebukes and checks: and also brought under his obedience and subjection, all those Cities which had revolted. Of which he according to the former act of the Senate, allotted Mun- erantia to the Spaniards, unto whom both a City and land to it was by order aforesaid due. Both the Consuls who had the government of the Province Apulia, seeing there was less cause of fear and terror now from the Carthaginians and Annibal, were commanded to cast lots between them for the Provinces of Apulia and Macedonia. So Macedonia befell unto Sulpius, and he succeeded there instead of Levinus. Fulvius was sent for home to Rome, about the election of the Consuls. And when he held the solemn assembly of the people, for the choice and creation of the Consuls, The Century of the younger Citizens, which had the prerogative to give their first voice, declared T. Manlius Torquatus, and Ostacilius for Consuls. Manlius being there present in place, when the multitude came about him to congratulate with God give you joy, &c. (for that there was no doubt, but the whole body of the people would approve this choice of the first Century) came with a great company about him to the tribunall seat of estate where the Consul sat: and made request unto him, that he would give him the hearing of some few words, and command C that prerogative century which had given their voices to be called back again to a new scrutiny.
 And when every man was attentive, and expected what he should demand, he alledged for his excuse a pair of ill eyes. "For a shameless Pilot of a ship is he, and as impudent a Generall of an army, (quoth he) who having to do all by other mens eyes, would require to have the goods "and lives of other men to be put into their hands. And therefore may it please your honour to "command this Century of the younger sort to give their voices anew, and in creating Consuls,
 "to remember the war that is in Italy, to consider of the troublesome state of the Common-
 "weal, and to think of this, That scarcely yet mens ears have had any rest since they resounded and "rung again with the noises and alarms, that the enemies raised within these few months, when "they lay in siege neer unto the wals of Rome. But after these words, when the said Century cried D with one accord, that they were of the same mind still, and would nominate the same Consuls again, and none other: then Torquatus, "Neither (quoth he) shall I be able, if I were Consul to "bear with your fashions and conditions, nor you again endure my rule and commandment. To "the scrutiny therefore once again, and think how the Carthaginians war within Italy, and Ami-
 "bal is the Generall of the enemies. Then the Century moved as well by the authority and reverence of the mans person, as by the applause and admiration of the people, who wondered at his vertue, besought the Consul to call forth and cite a Century of the elder bands: for that they would willingly conier with more ancient men than themselves, and by their sage advice and good direction nominate the Consuls. When those elders were called to this Century, there was some time allowed for to commune apart secretly with them, within the place railed in, called Ovile.
 E These ancients said unto them, that they were to consult of three persons, whereof two already were full of honourable dignities, which they had born, to wit, Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus. But verily, (say they) in case ye would have some new Cos. to be chosen, for to be opposed against the Carthaginians, ye have M. Valerius Maximus, a notable man, one who hath performed singular good service, and atchieved many noble deeds, both by sea and land against King Philip. So when they had three propounded unto them, the elder were dismissed and the younger entred into a second scrutiny: and declared for Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus (glittering then in the prime of his glory, for he late subduing and conquest of Sicily) and M. Valerius, who was absent. This foredom and choice of the prerogative Century, all the rest followed after, and by their suffrages confirmed. "Let them mock on now and scoff hereat all they that have nothing in admiration but F antiquity and things done in elder time. For mine own part, if there be any such City and Common-weal, at all, consisting of wise men and Philosophers, as some great Clarks have rather "imagined in their fancies than found in effect: I dare be bold to think & say, that in it there could "not possibly be either rulers and Magistrates more grave and temperate in their desire of dignity "and government, or a people better mannered, nurtured, and instructed. But that it should be "thought an unlikely matter and scarce credible, that a Century of younger persons were willing "to consult with the elder and be advised by them, to whom they should give their voices, for to "be created the chief Magistrates: it is the corruption of this our age that is the cause: wherein
 "we see how small reverence and authority even parents themselves have, and of how slender "and base account they be amongst their own naturall children.
 After this followed the Election of Praetors, wherein were created P. Manlius Volsus, and L.
 G Manlius Acidivus, C. Laetorius, and L. Cincius Alimentus. When this Election was finished, it formally matters came, how T. Ostacilius (whom the people, as it seemed, would have chosen in his absence, to march T. Manlius in the Consulship, but that the ordinary course of the election was disturbed and stopped) departed this life in Sicily. The Apollinare games in the former year had been exhibited, and when Calpurnius the Praetor put up a bill, and moved the Senate, that they might be celebrated again that year also, these passed a decree, That they should be vowed to continue from time to time for ever.

The Oration
 to the Consul

The same year certain prodigious tokens were seen and reported. In the Temple of Concordia^H the Image of Victory, which stood upon the lantern and top thereof was smitten with lightning, and being shaken and driven from its own place, rested fast upon those other Images of Victory that were fixed in the forefront of the said Temple, and fell not down from thence. Word also was brought, That in Anagnia and Fregelle the walls and the gates were likewise blasted and stricken with fire from heaven: and that in the market place of Sutrium there ran streams of blood a whole day together: That in Eretum it rained stones: and that in Rome a female mule brought forth a foal. These strange and wonderfull signs were purged and expiate with greater sacrifices: and a solemn supplication proclaimed: wherein for one day the people should wholly attend their devotions, and pray unto the gods: and likewise a Novendiall sacrifice. In that year died I certain publicke Priests of State, and new were chosen in their stead. Caius Livius in the room of M. Pomponius Mitho the High Priest: and M. Servilius, to supply the place of Sp. Carvilius Maximus, the Arch-Augur. And forasmuch as T. Otacilius Maximus, the Prelate or Bishop, died when the year was expired, there was none nominated for to succeed him. C. Claudius the Arch-flamine of Jupiter lost his Flaminship, and was deprived of that Sacerdotal dignity, because he had committed an error in sacrificing, when he should minister and distribute the inwards of the beast.

About the same time M. Aemilius Levinus (after he had by secret conferences sounded beforehand and solicited the minds of the Ætolian Princes and great LL.) came with a small fleet of ships lightly appointed, to their general Diet or Councill, summoned before for that purpose only. In which solemn assembly, after he had made declaration, "That Syracusa and Capua were won, and under the protection of the people of Rome, and what good success they had in the affairs and wars of Italy: and discoursed besides, That the Romans, according to their ancient custome, received by tradition from their forefathers, used to respect and make much of their Allies: and namely, That either they received them into the City of Rome, and endued them with the same franchises that they themselves enjoyed, or else dealt so liberally with them otherwise, that they liked of their condition so well, as they chose rather to be allies than Citizens: he protested and said, That the Ætolians should be much more honoured amongst them than all others, for that they were the first that of all forrain nations beyond sea, entertained league and amity with them. As for King Philip and the Macedonians, their heavy friends, & dangerous neighbours, he had so danted their courages, abated their forces, and driven them to that pass, that not only they were forced to abandon those towns, which by violence they had taken wrongfully from the Ætolians, but also had much ado themselves to keep Macedony itself quiet, and without perill of hostility: promising withall, That he would bring and reduce the Acar-nians (for whom the Ætolians were so discontented and grieved, that they were dismembred from the body of their State) under their ancient form of jurisdiction and seignory again. These relations and promises made by the Roman General, were confirmed and assured unto them by the authority and countenance of Scopas (who for the time was the Prætor or head Magistrate of that State) and of Dorimachus a Prince of the Ætolians, who with less modesty and greater asseveration and confidence extolled and magnified the greatness, power, and majesty of the people of Rome. The principall matter that induced and moved them was the hope of recovering and keeping Acar-nania. Whereupon, there were conditions drawn & engrossed, under which they should joyn in league and friendship with the people of Rome. And this branch was added to the rest of the defeazances, That if they were so pleased, and liked well of it, there should be comprized in the same league and privileges, the Eleans and Lacedæmonians, together with Attalus, Pleigratus, and Scerdiletus: of which three, Attalus was King of Asia the less, the other were Princes and Potentates of Illyricum. The articles ran in this form: Imprimis, That the Ætolians should immediately make war by land with King Philip. Item, That the Romans at sea should help with twenty gallees at the least, bearing five ranks of oars. Item, As touching all the Cities that should be conquered (beginning from Ætolia, so far as to  Corcyra*) that the ground whereon the Cities were seated, the edifices, the walls, and the lands thereto belonging, should be seized to the use of the Ætolians: all other goods and chattels else, should be a prize for the people of Rome. Item, That if the Ætolians hapned to make peace with Philip, it must pass with this clause and proviso, that the peace should stand good upon this condition, That Philip abstain to make war upon the Romans and their Allies, and all those that lived under their dominions. Item, In case the people of Rome fortun'd to piece again, and be confederate with the King, they should put in a caveat and proviso, that he might have no liberty to war upon the Ætolians, or their associates. These were the covenants agreed upon: and being fair engrossed two years after into a pair of indentures the one of them remained for the Ætolians in Glympia, the other for the Romans in their Capitoll, among other sacred records and monuments, for a perpetuall memoriall to all posterity. The occasion of so great delay was because the Embassadors of the Ætolians were staid and kept very long at Rome. But that was no let nor hinderance at all to the proceedings in the wars. For the Ætolians presently made war upon Philip: and Levinus conquered  Zacynthus* (a little Island near to Ætolia, having a City within it of the same name, which he forced by assault, all save the Castle) likewise  Oeniada* and  Naxos*, which he won from the Acar-nians before: and all these he gave to the Ætolians. And supposing that Philip having his hands full of the war upon his own frontiers had no time to think upon Italy, and the Carthaginians, and to mind the

Philip lying in winter harbpr within Pella, was advertized of the Ætolians revolt. Therefore because he minded at the prime of the Spring to conduct an army into Greece, to the end that Macedony and the Cities bordering thereupon, should not be molested by the Illyrians, whom he supposed would be at quiet and not stir, if they were once frighted with the harms of others, he made a sudden rode and expedition into the marches of the Origins and Apolloniats: and when the Apolloniats issued forth against him, he repelled them, and with great fear and terror drave them within their walls. After he had wasted the confines next to the Illyrians, he turned his forces with like celerity and speed into Pelagonias: and then won by assault a City of the

B Dardaniats, situate in the frontiers of Macedonia, through which the Dardaniats meant to have their passage. And when he had performed these exploits in great haste, not forgetting how the Ætolians and Romans both maintained war against him jointly, he descended through Pelagonia, Nymphæum, and Bolea, into Thessaly: supposing verily that the people of those countries might be incited to wage war together with him against the Ætolians. And leaving there behind him (at the streight of Thessaly) Perseus four thousand strong, for to debar the Ætolians entrance that way: himself in person, before that he should be occupied in greater affairs, led forth his army into Macedonia, and from thence into Thracia, and so forward against the Medians. That nation was wont to make incursions, and to invade Macedony, whensoever they could perceive that the King was either busied in other wars, or his Realm disurnished and slenderly provided

C of good gard and strong garrisons. He began therefore to forrage and spoil the territories about Phraganda; and to assault Iamphorina, the principall City and chief strength of that Region Medica.

Scopas having intelligence that the King was gone into Thracia and kept there occupied in the wars, put all the serviceable young men of Æolia in arms, and prepared war against Acarmania. The nation of the Acarnians, albeit they were both in strength unequal, and also saw already, that they had lost the walled City of the Oniades, and Naxus: and knowing well, that the Roman forces would come upon them besides: rather upon anger than any good counsell and adviement, made preparation for war, and resolved to meet them. Their wives and children, and elder persons, such as were above forty years of age, they sent away into Epirus, adjoyning near unto them,

D Of all that were fifteen years old and upward unto threescore, they took a solemn oath, that they would never return back without victory. They laid also a heavy curse and cruell malediction upon all those of their own nation: and framed a most humble request, in as effectual terms as they could devise, unto all their friends, that none of them should entertain within their Cities, their doors and houses, nor admit to their table, any one of them that were vanquished, and fled out of the field: yea, and beought withall the Epirons to gather together the dead bodies of as many of them as should chance to be slain in battell, and to inter them all in one grave, and erect a tomb and monument over them, with an Epiraph and inscription to this effect; Here lie buried and entombed the Acarnanians, who fighting in defence of their country, against the violence and injuries of the Ætolians, lost their lives manfully in the field. By this means, when their courages were enkindled and incensed, they encamped themselves in their utmost frontiers, abiding the coming of their enemies. And having dispatched messengers to Philip, to give notice to him in what jeopardy they stood, they constrained him to give over that war which he had in hand, considering that Iamphorina was surrendered up into his hands, and that he had sped wel otherwise in the rest of his affairs. The Ætolians, upon the first fame that was blown abroad of that solemn oath, taken by the Acarnians, were wel cooled, and not so hasty to set forward; but hearing once of Philip his coming, they were driven to retire again as far as possibly they could within their own confines. Neither Philip for his part marched on further than to Cline (notwithstanding that he made great speed afore, and took long journeyes; for fear that the Acarnians should be surprized, before he could reach unto them) nor so soon as he heard that the Ætolians were retired, he himself also returned

F unto Pella. Levinus in the beginning of the Spring, took the sea, and loosed from Corcyra, and having doubled the point of Leucates, and sailed as far as Naupactum, there he published and gave knowledge, That he would shape his course from thence for Anticyra: and that Scopas and the Ætolians should there meet him, and be in readines. This Anticyra is situate in Locris, on the left hand, as ye enter into the gulph of Corinth. By land it is a small journey thither from Naupactum, and as short a cut by sea. So within three daies after they began to assail the City on both sides. The fiercer assault was from the sea-side, both because they had in their ships engines of battery, and other ordnance and artillery of all sorts: and also, for that the assailants from that part were Romans. So within few daies the City was yielded up, and delivered again unto the Ætolians, the pillage thereof fell to the Romans share, according to covenant. There Levinus received letters from Rome, specifying thus much, That he was declared Consul in his absence, and P. Sulpitius was coming to succeed him in the Province: but by occasion that he lay there sick of a long disease, he came to Rome later than all men expected.

M. Marcellus entering his Consulship upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senat that day, only for form and order sake: for he made open profession there, that during the absence of his Colleague, he would treat of no matters, either concerning the state of the City, or the Provinces. But this protestation he uttered withall, and said: That he knew full well that there were "many

"many Sicilians in the towns and villages near unto the City barkbiters and slanderers of him, who for his own part he was so far off from hindring, but that they might freely for all him, divulgate and publish abroad in Rome all those crimes which were devised and spoken against him by his adversaries, that were it not that they pretended some fear forsooth, to charge the Consul with any matters, in the absence of his Collegue, he would straightwaies give them audience in the Senate: but so soon verily as my brother Consul is come home, I will not, quoth he, I assure you, suffer any one matter to be debated here, before that those Sicilians be sent for into the Senate house. And I understand that M. Cornelius hath taken generall search like a musther over all Sicily, to the end there might come a number to Rome with complaints of me: he also with letters full of entreaties hath buzzed into all mens ears, and born the whole City in hand, that the war continueth still in Sicily, and all to diminish and abridge my glory. The Consul having that day won the commendation and name of one that knew how to rule and govern his affections, dismissed the Senat: and it seemed that there would be a generall vacation not of law matters only, but of all other things & as it were holyday still, untill the other Consul came unto the City. This rest and idleness (as the wonted manner is) set the Commons having nothing else to do, a talking: and now their tongues walked apart, teasing not to spread rumours. That by this long and continuall war, not only the lands and territory about the City of Rome (especially where Annibal had marched with his cruell army) were wasted, but also Italy was in a manner dispeopled and laid desolate, by reason of so many musters and levies: complaining, that whole armies were defeated and put to the sword at Cannæ in defence of the Common-wealth: and that there were two Consuls created, both martiall men, and warriors, over-fierce and eager of fight, such as time of peace and quietness were able to find occasions of war: so little was it to be looked for at their hands, that in time of war they would seek for peace, and suffer the City to have any breathing time and intermission. These speeches rumoured among the common people were interrupted and staid by occasion of a Scare-fire that began in sundry places together about the Forum, in the night of that day, which was immediately before the festivall daies of Minerva, called Quinquatrus. At one and the self-same time the seven merchants shops and ware-houses, which afterwards were turned into five, and the shops of the Bankers and money changers which now are called Nova, (or the new-shops) were on fire. Divers private mens houses also the fire caught, for as then there were no stately Halls and Palaces of the City there built. Likewise the fire took hold of the common prison, called Linturnia: the Fish market hall likewise, and the royall gallery or walking-place. Hardly could the Chappel of Vesta be saved, and that by the good help and pains-taking especially of thirteen bondslaves: whose bondage was bought out at the Cities charges, and they made freemen. The fire continued one night and a day: and no man made doubt, but it came by mans hand, and was the practice of some few wicked persons: for that the fires began in many places at once, and those far distant aunder. Whereupon the Consul by the advice and direction of the Senat, made proclamation in a solemn assembly of the people, that whosoever would come forth and give notice by whose means that fire was procured, he should be well rewarded: if he were a free-man, with a piece of money: if bond, with freedom. In hope of which recompence, a certain slave belonging to the Calpurnii the Campans, (his name was Manius) was induced to bewray the matters whom he served, and five other young Gentlemen of Campania, whose fathers had lost their heads by the commandment of Q. Fulvius. Those he appeached to have made the said fires: and he gave them a warning besides, that they intended to do more mischief about the City, if they were let alone, and not apprehended: so they were attached, and their household-servants. At the first, these persons made light account both of the informer, and the information they made, and elevated the credit that was given thereto: alledging, that the day before the party himself being chastised and scourged by his Masters, ran away, and so upon an anger and pique he devised: (by occasion of this misfortune which was meer casuall) to frame an accusation against his Masters. But when the matter was avorted to their teeth in open place, and that they, by whose ministry the feat was done, were in the midst of the Forum, upon the rack for to utter a truth, then they all made confession of the fact. So as well the Masters that were the setters thereof, as the servants that were privy and accessory thereto, had their deaths and suffered for it. The informer who disclosed the villany, was made free, and had 10000 ailes for his labour.

As the Consul Levinus passed by Capua in his journey [homeward,] there flockt about him a number of Campans, and besought him with tears, that they might have leave to go to Rome, and present themselves before the Senate, there to make suit (it haply there were any pity and commiseration in them) not to destroy them utterly, nor suffer Q. Fulvius to confine the name and generation of the Campans from off the face of the earth. Now Elacius for his part denied flatly that he bare them any private grudge by malice: but only hated the Campans as the common enemies to the State, and so he would do ever so long as he knew them to ill affect. And as they were to the people of Rome, for there was not a nation upon earth, nor a people under heaven more spitefully & deadly bent against the Roman name than they were. And that was the cause (saith he) that he penned them up within their walls. For whosoever of them chanced any way to make an escape, they ringed about the country like brutes and savage beasts, roaring, tearing, and killing whosoever came in their way. Some of them are fled to the adverse side unto Annibal, others are gone to Rome to set fire on the City, and there (quoth he) shall the Con-

- A "ful find the market place half burned, and the very points and tokens remaining fresh of the "Champion's mischievous practices. There should be seen that they minded to have done violence
 "upon the Chapel of Fortuna, and to have put out those eternal fires, and utterly defaced the sacred "pledges of the Roman Empire, bestowed and laid up in it as the most sacred place of the Chap-"pels. Neither thought he it was safe for the City to permit the Campanians to come within the "walls thereof. Then Lucius having raised the Campanians to take an oath of perpetual friendship and "to Flaccus, that they would make return to Capua before five days were expired, after they had "their answer and dispatch from the Senate, he commanded them to come after him to Rome.
 "Attended thus as he was with his company he encountered the Sicilians who came forth to "meet him and with this multitude he entered the City, accompanied (they say) with the Campanians
 "and Sicilians, both vanquished and subdued by wars, a vaunters of two most famous persons, "Marcellus and Fabius, who had conquered two most noble and renowned Cities, Syracusa and "Capua. But both the Consul treated and consulted first with the Senate, about the state of the Common"weal, and the government of the Provinces. These Legatus related in what terms stood Macedon and Gracchus the Ætolians also, with the Acarnanians and Locrians, likewise what Asches he had achieved in those parts both by sea and land, and how he had repelled Philip back into "Macedonia, when he began to make war upon the Ætolians, who now was retired and gone "into the utmost parts of his Kingdom. So as the legion might be withdrawn from thence, for "that the Armado was sufficient to keep the King forth of Italy. Thus much spake he of himself, "and of the Province whereof he had been governor. Then both Consuls in common proposed "unto the Senate, concerning the Province. And the LL. decreed that one of the Consuls should "take the charge of Italy, and of the war with Annibal; and the other should have under his "hand the Armado, whereof T. Otacilius was the Admiral; and together with L. Cincius the Pre-"tor, govern the Province of Sicily. They were allowed the two armies which were in Tuscany and "in France, consisting of four legions: whereof two of the former year, that were of Citizens
 "should be sent into Tuscany, and those two which the Consul Sulpicius had conducted, should be "led into France. Moreover, that he should have the government of France, and the leading of the "Legions there, whom that Consul would appoint, whose lot it was to have Italy for his Province.
 "D Into Tuscany was C. Calpurnius sent with Commission after the term of the Dictatorship expired, "to have his full jurisdiction to continue for a year. Likewise to Q. Fabius was assigned the "keeping of Capua, and his rule prorogued for another year. The armies, as well of Citizens as of "Allies, were by commandment of the Senate bridged and made less so that for two legions there "should be but one, and that consisting of five hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen:
 "that they should be discharged of such as who had served longest: that of Allies there should "be left seven thousand foot, and three hundred horse: while the same respect and consideration "of service in dismissing the old soldiers. As for C. Fabius the Consul of the former year, he "ruled the same Province of Apulia still, without any alteration of his former: only his govern"ment was continued unto him another year. And P. Sulpicius his Colleague, was commanded
 "E to send away all his army, only the masters and sailors excepted. Likewise order was given that "so soon as the new Consul was arrived and landed in the Province of Sicily, the army there,
 "which was commanded by M. Cornelius, should be sent out of Sicily. Unto L. Cincius the Pretor
 "were assigned the soldiers that remained after the defeat at Canus, for to keep Sicily in order,
 "and those sent to two legions. And as many legions were appointed for P. Claudius Nasus the "Pretor, for to go into Sardinia, even those whereof L. Cincius had the leading in the same Pro"vince the former year. As for the legions of Citizens, the Consuls were enjoined to levy and "enroll them so, as they should retain no soldier of all those who had served in the army, either of "M. Claudius, or M. Valerius, or Fulvius, nor exceeded the number that year of one and twenty le"gions of the Romans. When these Acts were passed in the Senate-house, the Consuls cast lots for
 "F their severall Provinces. Sicily and the Armado fell to Marcellus; Italy, and the war against Annibal, "to Lucius. This lot that fell to Marcellus so struck the Sicilians dead, (who stood in the presence of the "Consuls, looking for the event of the lottery) as if Syracusa had been lost again: in such sort, as "their pitifull lamentations, and their wooll plaints, for the present turned all mens eyes up"on them, and none after ministered cause of much speech and talk. But they went about to "all the Senators from one to another in poor and vile array, protesting, "That if Marcellus came "amongst them again as a Deputy, they would not only forsake every man his own country "where he was born, but also abandon the whole Island of Sicily, complaining that without any "defect of their parts, heretofore he had been cruelly bent against them, and his hatred was irre"concilable: and what would he now do in his choler, and knowing that the Sicilians came to
 "G "none of purpose to make complaints of him? The Island were better (say they) to be on a light
 "fire to burn with Etna; or to be all a very sea, than thus to be exposed as a prey unto a mor"tal enemy, for to be devoured. These grievous moans and piteous complaints of the Sicilians
 "first carried to the houses of the Nobles and great men of the City, and there taken up and much "talked of by many, while some pitied the Sicilians, others envied Marcellus, spread abroad at "length so far, until they came to the Council-Table. And the Consuls were dealt withall to "propose unto the Senate, that they might exchange their Provinces one for another. Then Mar-

The complaints of the Sicilians against Marcellus.

Marcellus stood up and said, "That in case audience had been given to the Sicilians already in the Senate-house, peradventure he would deliver his opinion to another purpose: but now lest any man might say that they were bridled for fear, and durst not speak their minds freely, nor complain as they would of him, at whose command, and under whose obedience, they were to be within a while: he was for his part ready to make change of his Province, if his Collegue were as well content, and made no greater scruple of the matter. Only he requested that the Senate would not prejudice his cause. For if at the first (quoth he) it had been hard and unjust, extraordinarily and without casting lots, to give my Collegue the free choice of his own Province, how much greater wrong then should I have, nay, what disgrace were offered unto me, if my lot should be taken from me and transferred upon him. So for that time, the Senat having made an overture unto Marcellus, what they would have done, rather than by any decree prejudiced the matter, brake up. And the Consuls between themselves privately made exchange, one with the other. See the fortune and fatall destiny of Marcellus, that haied him, as it were, to be matched with Annibal, and to fall into his hands: to the end that the same man, who of all the Romans, was the first that vanquished Annibal in fight, and won the honour from him: should now in the midst of prosperity and happy success of war, be the last Roman General that was slain by Annibal, and yielded the glory of giving him the overthrow. After the Provinces were thus interchangeably shifted, the Sicilians were brought into the Senat. Where they made a long speech as touching the perpetuall and constant faithfulness unto the end of K. Hiero, towards the people of Rome, and all to curry favour and gain thanks unto the whole nation of Sicily. Recounting, that Hieronymus first, and after him Hippocrates and Epicides, as for other things, so especially for their revolting from the Romans, and turning to Annibal, were odious and hateful unto them. For which cause and nothing else Hieronymus was by the hands of the chieftains of their young gallants, as it were by a publike decree of the state made away and killed, and the noblest of their young gentlemen, to the number of seventy, conspired to murder Hippocrates and Epicides: who being disappointed and put by the effecting of their designment, through the delay of Marcellus, (who at the time before appointed, came not with his power to Syracusa) were appeached, their intended plot revealed, and they all by those tyrants put to death. And yet to speak a truth, Marcellus himself was he that gave the first occasion of the tyrannizing of Hippocrates and Epicides, in that most cruelly he sacked and spoiled the Leontium. But from that time forward, the Nobles of Syracusa never ceased to come in unto Marcellus, & promised to deliver the City into his hands, whensoever he pleased. But he, forsooth, at first, stood upon these terms, that he would rather force it by assault, but afterwards, seeing he could not effect that his purpose, notwithstanding he had wrought all the devices he could, both by sea and land, he made choice of one Sosis a copper-smith, & Morienus a Spaniard, to have them to work and contrive the betraying of the City, rather than of the principal of the Syracusan Nobility, who had so often offered that service, and never yet would it be accepted: & all, I wot, because he might pretend some colourable cause of justice, to proceed in all rigor against the most ancient allies of the people of Rome, to massacre them, and make spoil of all that they had: for he saw that Hieronymus had not revolted and gone to Annibal, but the whole people and Senat of Syracusa: Suppose, that the Syracusians in generall, by publike consent had shut the gates against Marcellus, & not their Tyrants Hippocrates and Epicides, when they had the Syracusians sure enough under their own hands: Say they had warred against the people Rome with as spitefull and cruel malice as the Carthaginians do, and ever did: what greater hostility could Marcellus possibly have exercised against them more than he hath, unless he would destroy and rase the City to the very ground? Surely he hath left nothing in Syracusa but the bare walls, the naked and empty houses of the City, the temples and chapels of the gods defaced & broke open: for the gods themselves, with all the rich & gorgeous ornaments are carried away. Many a man is spoiled and robbed of his goods, in such sort, as having nothing left him but the bare soil, they are not able when all is gone, with his leavings to maintain themselves, and sustain their wives and children. They were humble petitioners therefore, and suppliant suiters unto the LL. of the Senat, to take order, that restitution might be made unto the rightful owners, if not of all (for that is impossible) yet of so much at least, as was to be found, and might be truly owned again.

After these and such like complaints Leontius the Consul commanded them to go forth of the Councill-house, to the end that the LL. might be consulted with, and deliver their opinions concerning their demands. "Nay mary (quoth Marcellus) let them stay still rather, that I may answer to their very faces: seeing my LL. our case and condition is so hard, who war and fight for you, that we must have those to enform against us, and be our accusers, whom we have conquered and subdued by martiall arms: Let it even be so, that two Cities, to wit, Capua and Syracusa, won this year, may convent judicially both their conquerors, the one Fulvius, the other Marcellus. When the Embassadors were brought back again into the Senat-house, then began Marcellus the Consul, and spake in this wise,

Marcellus his defence against the Syracusians.

"I am not so far overseen, and forgetfull, my Lords, either of the majesty of the people of Rome, or of this place of command which I now hold, that I would plead mine own cause, as Consul as I am, against these Grecians, my accusers, in case the question were of any crime or fault of mine own. But all the controversie to be discussed, standeth not upon these terms, to examine what I have done, whom the right of war will justify and bear out, howsoever I have "proceeded

him to pardon that which they had spoken, either to bewail, or to ease their conscience; and were effective both them in particular, and the City of Capua in general, unto his merciful protection. After this, the Consul with gracious words licensed them to depart.

When the Sicilians had their dispatch, the Campanians had likewise given them in the Senate; and as their speech was more lamentable, so the Senate was heavier, and harder to be digested; for neither could they themselves deny, but that they deserved condign punishment: nor Tyrants had they any, upon whom they might lay the blame. But they thought they had suffered enough for their sin already, in that so many of their Senators died by poison, and so many lost their heads. Some few of their nobility and but a few remained yet alive, who as they were not roused in conscience, nor so faulty, as to lay violent hands upon themselves, so the Conqueror in his furious wrath, so judged them not worthy of death: they therefore made humble suit for themselves, their wives and children, to obtain freedom, and to enjoy some part of their own goods, being as they were, nice citizens of Rome, and most of them by affinity and near kindred, upon mutual and cross marriages, linked in alliance and blood to the Romans. After that they also were willing to void out of the Senate-house: for a while, there grew some question and doubt, whether Q. Fulvius should be sent for from Capua (for presently upon the taking of the City, Claudius the Consul died) that this matter might be argued and discussed in presence of the General himself, like as the other had been rehearsed of and debated between Marcius and the Sicilians. But afterwards when they saw in the Senate-house M. Annius, and C. Pulvius, the brother of Plautius, both his Lieutenants: likewise Q. Minucius, and E. Virginius Philo, Lieutenants unto Claudius, who had been present in all actions, and were eye-witnesses of every thing; and besides, were unwilling that either Pulvius should be called away from Capua, or the Campanians longer delayed: M. Annius Riparius, who of all them that had been at the service of Capua, was of greatest authority and reputation, being demanded his opinion, spake in this wise.

"I take it (quoth he) when Capua was newly won, I was one of Council with the Consuls there, when question was asked, and enquiry made, Whether any one Campanian had deserved well of us and our Common-wealth. And found it was, that two women only, to wit, Ursula Oppia, born in Aquila, but dwelling then at Capua, and Plautia Clodia, sometime a common trumpet and carter, were well winners unto us. The former of these with daily sacrifice for the welfare, life, and victory of the Romans; the other, secretly sustained the poor and needy Roman captives with food and victuals. As for all other Campanians, from the highest to the lowest, they were no better added unto us, than the Carthaginians. And even those, who were befriended by Quintus Pulvius, suffered death, because they were more faulty than others, but for that they were of greater mark and esteem than the rest. Now, that the Senate should decide the cause of any Campanian, who are condemned enemies of Rome, without a grant from the people, I see not how it can be. For in our fore-fathers time the like cause was of the Sicilians that rebelled; and then M. Annius a Tribune of the Commons, first put up a bill, and the Commons afterwards passed it, namely, That the Senate might have power and authority, to give their opinion, and determine of the Sicilians. Therefore I am of mind, that we deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, that one or more of them, present a bill unto the Commons, by virtue whereof we may be authorized to let down some order for the Campanians. Then L. Junius a Tribune of the Commons, by leave and advice of the Senate, proposed unto the Commons a bill in this form and manner. *Whereas the Campanians, Arrians, Calatins, and Sabellians, who have yielded themselves unto Fulvius the Pro-consul, to be at the pleasure and devotion of the people of Rome: all their lands, which they have surrendered together with their temples, as well their territory within the City, as all and full, both sacred and profane, their necessary implements, and all other things whatsoever, I demand your will and pleasure. O Quirites, what shall be done with the prisoners? The Commons after deliberation, gave their voices to the said bill in this form. Our will and pleasure is, that whatsoever of the Sicilians, who are set at liberty, or the like sort of you think good and advantageous, shall be sold for half a talent. Upon this grant or Act of the Commons, the Senate by a decree awarded unto Oppia N and Clodia, full their own goods and liberty: and moreover if they were desirous to crave further reward at the Senate's hand, they were left to repair unto Annius. For every family and several house of the Campanians, there were special laws and decrees made, all which to repeat and rehearse, would not quit the labour. Some had their goods confiscated: themselves, their Children and Wives were to be sold, excepting those their Daughters which were wedded before that they came under the subjection of the people of Rome. Others were to be kept up in Prison, upon further order were taken for them hereafter. Moreover, of those Campanians they made distinction by valuation of their wealth, whether their goods were to be confiscate or no. All their beasts and cattail which were taken, save Horses: all their bond slaves, but males fourteen years of age and upward, all moveable goods also which were not annexed, and allotted to the sell, they awarded for to be restored to the true owners. All Campanians, Arrians, Calatins, Sabellians, excepting those, who either themselves, or whose parents took part and sided with the enemies, they judged to be free: provided always, that none of them were either free-citizens of Rome, or of Latium. And it was enacted, that none of all them who had been at Capua whilst the gates were shut, should remain either in the City or territory of Capua, within a certain day prefixed: but should have a place for to dwell in, on the further side of Tiber, as it were not upon the very bank close unto Tiber.*

A Tyber. As for those that during the time of war had been neither at Capua nor in any other City of Campania, which revolted from the people of Rome, they should be removed to inhabit on this side the River Liris, between it and Rome; but such as were turned and passed to the Romans side, before that Annus came unto Capua, they should be transplanted on the hither side of Fulturnum the River: provided, that none of them should possess either house or Land within fifteen miles of the Sea. As concerning them who were displaced and confined to inhabit beyond the Tyber, neither they nor their heirs and successors for ever, should purchase and hold houses or Land in any place, but in the territory either of Fai, Sutrium, or Nepesinum; but so, as they exceeded not the limit of five hundred Acres of ground. As touching the goods and chattels of all the Senators, of such as had borne Magistracy in Capua, Atella, or Calatia, they awarded that sale should be made thereof in Capua. As for those that were free born, and whole bodies were to be sold, they should be sent to Rome, and there set a sale. Finally, the Images and Statues of brass, which were said to have been won and taken from the enemies, whether they were sacred or profane, they referred to the Colledge of the Priests and Prelates, to determine thereof at their discretion. Thus they gave the Campanians their dispatch, and sent them away much worse off than they were when they came first to Rome. And now they complained no more of the cruel proceedings of Q. Fulvius against them, but blamed the iniquity and unjust dealing of the very Gods, and their own cursed fortune together.

After the Sicilians and Campanians were dismissed, there was a matter taken: and when an army was levied and enrolled, there began some question and reasoning about the mariners and Rowers to furnish the Gallies. For the accomplishment whereof, when the Consuls could neither raise men enough, nor yet find money at that time in the Chamber of the City, for to press and hire them, and pay their wages withal: they published an edict, that private men according to the rate and proportion in the Subsidy book, out of all orders, degrees, and companies, should as aforetime find Rowers at their own charges, and maintain them with meat and money for thirty dayes. Upon which Edict and Proclamation, all men so grumbled and muttered, and were so highly discontented and angered, that they wanted an head and Captain, rather than matter and occasion of a mutiny and insurrection: giving out, That the Consuls had taken a course, and were in the very train to plague, undo, and destroy the Commons of Rome, like as they had already the Sicilians and the Campanians. For thus many years they have been pillaged, polled,

D "clean spent and consumed with exaction of tributes, and had nothing left them but the bare ground, and the same lying wast and untilled. As for their Houses upon their lands, the enemies had burned: their servants and bonds, such as should husband and till their grounds, the Common-wealth had bereaved them of: one while buying them up to the Sea to be Gally-slaves, for a thing of nothing. A man could not so soon get one brass farthing, or single silver denier before-hand, but it went by and by either for Gally-pay, or for yearly Tribute. And to give that now which they had not, they might never be brought by any force or for any mans commandment whatsoever. Let them sell and make an hand of their goods, imprison and punish their bodies too, when all is gone besides; seeing there is nothing left them to ransom and redeem: the same

E "again. These and such like words were not only muttered in huggermugger, but uttered also and given out in broad terms even in the market-place and before the Consuls; by the multitude that flocked and gathered together in exceeding great numbers: in such sort, as the Consuls were not able with all that ever they could do, to appease the mutiny, neither by sharp rebukes, nor fair words and comfortable speeches. Then they said, that they would give and allow them three dayes respite for to think and consider of these matters: which they themselves bestowed wholly and employed in taking a view and survey of their goods, and making dispatch and ridance thereof out of the way. The next day the Consuls called the Senate together to consult about the supply of Rowers and Gally-slaves: where, after much debating and arguing, that the Commons had good reason to make denial, at length the drift of all their speech was this: That

F "whether it were right or wrong, the burden must lye on private mens shoulders, there was no remedy: for seeing there was no money in the common chest, how should Mariners and Rowers else be gotten and levied? And without Armadoes, how possibly should either Sicily be held still in possession, or Philip be kept out of Italy? or the Sea coasts of Italy remain in safety and security? In these distresses and difficulties the Council being perplexed, and to seek for remedy, and while every mans wits were in the wan and so confused, as if they were benumbed and stone cold: Then Levinus the Consul, As the Magistrate (as he) went before the Senate in place of honor, and the Senate likewise before the common people in worth and dignity: so they sought in all difficulties and hard occurrences to undergo the weightiest burdens first, and be the Foremen and Leaders in all dangerous adventures whatsoever. For if a man would enjoy his

G "inferiors to bear some grievous and heavy load, let him first take it up himself, yes and impose the same upon his own train and company: all the rest then, will be more willing and obedient to follow after, and do the semblable. And never will they grutch at any cost or charges, when they see their Leaders and Rulers take more upon themselves, than they are well able to wield and sustain. To the end therefore that the people of Rome may be provided and furnished of a fleet rigged and trimmed, as our desire is, and that private persons may not think much, nor refuse to find Rowers thereunto: let us first that are here command our own selves: let us,

"I lay, that be Senators, bring abroad in common all the gold, all the silver, all the brazen coin
"that we have, to us every man reserving only for himself, his wife and children: and a little
"tablet or jewel for his son; as a pendant to hang about his neck. Also let all them that have wives "or daughters, retain still one ounce weight of gold; and one pound of silver. And as many as "have been office of State, and sitten in the Ivory Chair, keep still the trappings and caparison of "their Horses; and two pound weight a piece, the one of gold, the other of silver; for to have a "Sale-sellar, and a little bell or cap, to sacrifice and offer unto the Gods within. As for the rest of "the Senators, let us leave them but one pound weight of silver; and no gold at all, and five thou"sand Aſes in coin, to every household a piece. "All other gold, silver, and brazen money be"sides, let us forthwith bring abroad and present unto the Triumvirs or publick bankers, before "that we make or enact any decree of Senat: to the end, that our good example in this volun"tary benevolence and contribution, and our earnest endeavour to help the Common-weal, may "stir up and provoke the hearts and affections, first of those that are by calling Gentlemen and "Knights of Rome, and then forward the rest of the Commons, to imitate and follow us with "some emulation. This is the only means which we that are Consuls have thought upon and de"vised, after much talk and conference together. Set to therefore; my masters, in the name of "God, and lead the way: God will bless your good beginnings. So long as the City standeth
"on foot, and holdeth up the head, no man need to fear his private state; but it shall do well "enough. Go the weal publick to wreck once, and decay, let no man ever think to save his "own. All the whole home liked so well of these motions, that not only they gave their accord "and consent thereto, but over and besides, yielded hearty thanks unto the Consuls for their good "advice and counsel. When the Senat was dismissed, every man for himself brought forth his gold,
"his silver, and brasse money, and laid all together in common; and that with such speed, striving
"as who could go before another, and have his name entered first in the publick Rolles and Regi"sters: so neither the fore-said Triumvirs were able to receive it fast enough, as it was tendered un-
"to them: nor the ordinary Clerks and Notaries to set it down in writing, and take note thereof "accordingly. This consent and agreement of the Senators, the Knights and Gentlemen of Rome, in "their place and calling seconded; and the commons for their parts were not behind: So without "any constraint of law, without edict, without any exhortation made by the Magistrate, the com"mon-weal wanted neither Rowers for to furnish the armadoes, nor money to pay the Rowers.
"And thus when all things were provided necessary for the wars, the Consuls went forth to their "several Provinces.

Never was there any time of this war, wherein Carthaginians and Romans together, had "more tryal of the alternative and variable change of fortune: never hung they more in equal bal"lance, between fair hope and fearful danger. The Romans, in their Provinces tasted both of "sweet and sour. In Spain on the one side, they sped ill and lost: in Italy on the other side, they "sped well and won: so as their sorrow was interlaced still and mingled with joy. Also in Italy,
"the loss of Tarentum turned to their woe and damage: but the keeping of the Castle there with "the garrison, beyond all their hope and expectation, brought them joy and comfort for their sor"row. Also, their sudden fright and fear, for the siege and assault of the City of Rome, was saved "and cured again within a few dayes after, by the forcing and winning of Capua: and all that be-
"wines and mourning turned into mirth and gladness. The affairs also beyond Sea, were checked "with interchangeable turns and counes. Philip became their enemy in an ill time; and when "they had little need thereof. Contrary-wise, the Stolians and Attalus the King of Asia the less,
"proved to be their new friends and loving allies: whereby even then fortune, seemed to smile on
"the Romans, and by that overturn, promised as it were, unto them the Empire of the East.
"Sensibly the Carthaginians, as they lost Capua, so they won Tarentum, and made a strange "game of it. In like manner, as they took no small pride and glory, in coming to the walls of Rome
"without resistance; so they were danted and dismayed again, that this their enterprise took no bet"ter effect in the end: and held themselves much disgraced and dishonoured, that whilom they "sat themselves before one gate of Rome, there was an army of Romans led forth at another, and "sent into Spain. And even in Spain also, the greater hope men had there, that upon the death "of two so noble and valiant Generalls, and the desert of two as puissant armies, the war was "come to a final end, and the Romans driven from thence for ever: the more spight it was, and "the greater grief and vexation they conceived again, when by the valour of L. Marcius a mili"tary Captain, chosen in haste they knew not how, those former victories turned to vanities, and "came to just nothing. Thus fortune was indifferent, and all things doubtful and wavering in so-"spence; both on the one side, and the other. Their hope all one as it was at first: their fortune like
"still; neither more woe nor joy. So as between hope and fear, they faced, as if the war at this time "were new to begin.

And above all other things, was vexed to the heart, that Capua being more boldly and "eagerly assaulted by the Romans, than manfully and faithfully defended by him, had diverted "and turned away the hearts of many States of Italy from him. For neither was he able to hold "them all with sufficient garrisons, unless he would dismember into many small portions, and mangle
"by piece-meal his army: which to do then, was no good policy: nor he thought it safe and good,
"to withdraw his garrisons from thence, or leave the fidelity of his allies at liberty, either to depend "upon sickle hope, or to sway with sudden fear. And (as he was by nature covetous and cruel-
"ly

A ly minded) he resolved at length upon this course, to make spoil of those Cities which he was not able to keep, and so to leave them wast and empty for the enemy. This designment was not so dishonest and shameful in the first enterprise, but it proved as bad and hurtful to himself in the effect and conclusion. For he lost the hearts clean, not only of those that were the parties grieved, and suffered these indignities, but also of all others besides. The present calamity and loss touched but some few: but the precedent and example reached to many more. Neither was the Roman Consul behind hand for his part, to sollicite and sound those Cities, from whence he saw some light appear, and any hope to gain them unto him.

There were in Salapia two noble men above the rest, Dafius and Blasius. Dafius was friend to Annibal, Blasius (so far as he might wish safety) affected and favoured the Romans. And by enterprise of secret messengers, had put Marcellus in some good hope of betraying the City; but without the help of Dafius the plot could not be compassed and effected. Wherefore, after much musing and long deliberation, after many staves and delays, at length he resolved (for want rather of better counsel, than upon any hope to speed) to address himself to Dafius, and acquaint him with the matter. But Dafius not only misliking utterly and abhorring the thing, but also carrying a secret enmity to the party himself, the only eye-sore and concurrent that he had, striving to be greater than he, disclosed all to Annibal. Whereupon, both were sent for, and convened peremptorily before him. As Annibal was sitting upon the Tribunal seat, giving audience and dispatch to certain other matters; and that he might anon the better attend unto Blasius and the action intended against him: whiles the plaintive and defendant stood apart by themselves from the rest of the people a good way. Blasius went in hand again with Dafius, and solicited him for to deliver the City to the Romans. With that, Dafius (as if the matter had been too too apparent) cried out and said, That he bashed not to break unto him and move him, even in the presence and sight of Annibal, for to practise treason and betray the City. Annibal and all they that were there present, gave little credit unto Dafius: and the more audacious the thing it felt was, the less likely hood it carried with it of a truth. Every man supposed verily, it was nothing but emulation, envy, and cankred malice, that caused Dafius to charge upon him that crime, which because there was no witness to the contrary, he might ntruly devise and more freely enforce against him. And so for that time, they were both discharged the court. But Blasius never gave over to follow still this bold enterprise, but beat still upon this one point, shewing how good and commodious the thing would be, both to themselves in private, and to their country in common, until he had wrought him so, and won him to grant, that the Carthaginian garrison, (and those were Numidians) together with the City Salapia, should be rendered unto Marcellus. But without much bloodshed they could not possibly be thus betrayed and delivered: for they were the most hardy and valiant horsemen by far, of all the Carthaginian army. Wherefore, albeit they were taken on a sudden unprovided, and had no use of Horses within the City, yet with such weapons, as in such a sudden tumult and uprore they could catch and come by, first they assayed and gave the venture to break through and escape away: and when they saw that they could by no means save themselves and get forth, they fought it out to the last manfully, even unto death: so as there were not of them above fifty left alive, and came into the hands of the enemies. And surely, the loss of this corner of Horsemen, was a greater damage unto Annibal, than the forgoing of Salapia: for never from that day forward, had Annibal the upper hand in cavalry, which was the only service whereby ever before he most prevailed.

Much about the same time the Castle of Tarentum was streightly distressed for want of victuals, and hardly could endure and hold out any longer. The only hope that the Roman garrison had, which lay there, and the Captain thereof M. Livius the Constable of the Castle, was in the provision sent out of Sicily. For the safe convoy whereof, along the coast of Italy, there rid at anchor a fleet welnear of twenty sail before Rhegium. The Admiral of this fleet appointed to wait these victuals from time to time, was one Decimus Quintius, a man of obscure birth and base parentage, howbeit, for many worthy acts and feats of arms, much renowned in martial glory.

At the first he had the charge but of five ships; whereof two of the greatest, which were three banked Gallies, were allowed him by Marcellus: afterwards, upon his good service, when he had born himself bravely in many conflicts, he had three more committed unto him, and those were of five banks of oars, until at last himself, by calling upon the confederat Cities, as Rhegium, Velia, and Paflum, for the ships due by covenant unto the people of Rome, he had made a pretty Armado, as is above said, of twenty sail. As this fleet had disanchored and was gone from Rhegium, Democritus with the like Armado for number of Tarentin ships, encountred almost five leagues from the City of Tarentum, at a port called Sacripotum. It fortuned at that time, that the Roman Admiral, little looking for any batel, came forth under sail only, but about Crosone and Schapia, he had furnished his ships with Rowers also, and so his fleet for the bigness and tainess of the Vessels, was well appointed, and sufficiently armed and manned. And even then it happened at one time, that both the boisterous wind lay, and the enemies also were within kenning, so as they had scarce time enough to fit their tackling, to make ready their Rowers, and to set in order their fighting men, against a skirmish that was so neer toward. There was not lightly seen a greater conflict, fought more hotly and fiercely between two royal Armadoes that affronted one another, than between these small fleets. For why, the batel was for a greater matter, than all their ships came to. The Tarentins maintained the fight more eagerly, because they were desirous to recover their Castle out of the Romans hands, as they had done their City, after one 100 years almost, during which time, they had been out of the possession thereof: hoping thereby, if they could be masters of the Sea once by some fortunate and victorious battel, to cut off and intercept all hope of victuals from the enemies. The Romans on the other side bestirred themselves as lustily that by keeping the possession of the Castle, all the world might see, that Tarentum was not lost by force, clean strength and valour, but betrayed by stealth and treachery. So they sounded the battel from both parts, and ran affront one at another, with the beaks and stems of their prows, and neither said rowing again forward, nor suffered their enemy to part or go aside from them, until they closed and grapled their ships together, by the means of iron hooks like hands. And so near they buckled, in hot and furious fight, that not only they discharged shot aloof one against another, but also they coped together (as it were) foot to foot, at hand strokes with sword-fight. Their prows and fore-ships stuck graped together, while the poops and hind-decks were driven about with contrary oars of the adverse part. So near and so thick withal stood the ships, and within so narrow a room, that scarce one dart light into the water in vain, and did no harm. With their beak-heads they assailed one another, as it had been on land fight, and so close they were, that the souldiers might passe out of one ship into another, as they fought. Howbeit, two ships there were above all the rest, that maintained a notable fight, and in the vanguard and forefront of the battel, invetted one another most furiously. In that of the Romans was Quintius himself in person, and in the other of the Tarentins, was one Nico, surnamed Perce, a man not only odious unto the Romans, for the publick quarrel between both states, but also maliciously bent, upon a private spite and rancour, as banding with that faction, which had betrayed Tarentum to Annibal. This Nico espying Quintius both fighting and also encouraging his men withal, charged him at unawares, and ran him quite through with a partizan: who was not so soon fain forward headlong upon the fore-deck, armour and all, but the Tarentin following the train of his victory, and seeing the ship disordered and troubled for the losse of their leader, lustily came forward, and boarded her; laid about him manfully, and put by the enemies out of his way, until the Tarentins were masters of the prow and fore-castle. Whiles the Romans had much ado (so thrumbed they were and thrust together disorderly) to defend and keep the poop and hind-deck; with that, another gally of the enemies appeared on a suddain, and charged the hind-part. So the Roman ship in the midst between both, was boarded on every side, and taken. Whereupon all the rest were greatly terrified, seeing the Admirall-ship was won by the enemy: and they fled on all hands. Some were sunk in the deep Sea, some made hast with their oars, and scudded to the land, but anon were a prize and prey to the Thurins and Metapontins. But of the Hulks and Caricks, which were fraught with victual, and followed after, very few there were that fell into the hands of the enemies: the rest shifting and turning their sails cross, this wayes and that wayes, according to the inconstancy of the wind, recovered the main Sea.

But about Tarentum at the same time, their fortune was nothing so good. For whereas there went out of the Town upon a four thousand men a foraging, for to purvey corn, Livius, Constable of the Castle and Captain of the garrison, spying his time (as he waited ever for all opportunities) made out of the said Castle 2000 armed souldiers, under the leading of C. Persius a valorous and industrious man: who set upon the Tarentins stragling out of order, and disperied in wandering wife over the fields; and after he had followed a long time the execution, killing them here and there as he encountered them; the rest, which were but few left of so many, he chaled to the Town: for they made hast in great fear thither, and were let in at the gates standing half shut, for fear lest at the same randon the Town should have been lost. So the Tarentins and Romans, when they had made the reckoning, put up all on even hand. For the Romans were winners by land, the Tarentins at Sea: and both of them disappointed alike of their hope of corn, which was presented to their eyes, but they never tasted thereof.

At the same time Lavinus the Consul, after a good part of the year was gone about, arrived in Sicily, greatly expected and looked for, as well by the old allies as the new: and the first thing of all other and most important, he supposed, was together with this new peace, to settle and compose the State of Syracusa, so much disordered and out of frame. After that, he led his legions to Agrigentum, where only there remained the reliques of war; which City was kept by a strong garrison of Carthaginians. There fortune favoured his first designs. Hanno chanced to be the General over the Carthaginians, but he wholly relied and reposed all his hope in Mutines and the Numidians. This Mutines had raged all over Sicily at his pleasure, and raised booties out of the territories and Lands of the Roman associates, and by no force or policy could be intercepted of his passage back to Agrigentum, nor yet be pinned within the City, but that he would issue forth whensoever he listed. This glory of his, because now it checked (as it were) the fame and honour of the General, turned the man at length to displeasure and danger: so as, what good service soever was achieved, it was never well taken by Hanno, nor joyously accepted, in regard of the person, who was a prick alwayes in his eye. Whereupon in the end he gave away the Captainship of Mutines from himself, and bestowed it upon his own Son: thinking, that together with his government and command, he should lose all his authority and reputation also among the Numidians. But it fell out far otherwise. For the more that he was in disgrace and disfavour with Hanno, the greater grew the old favour and love of the Numidians toward him.

Neither

A Neither could he himself endure any longer the unworthy wrong and indignity offered unto him: and therefore in revenge he presently dispatched certain secret messengers unto Levinus, with credence, that he would betray and deliver Agrigentum into his hands. By the mediation of these intercouriers, there passed sufficient security and assurance between them: and the matter being concluded, the manner also of contriving the plot, was agreed upon. Whereas therefore the Numidians were possessed, and had the guard of that gate that openeth toward the Sea: after they had either driven out the old warders from thence, or killed them, they let in the Romans at the same gate into the City, who were sent of purpose, according to the former agreement. And when they marched up into the midst of the City, even to the market place, with banner displayed, and with great tumult and noise; Hannib supposing it was nothing else, but a seditious uprising of the Numidians (like as they had done sometimes before) came forth as to appease and stay a mutiny and commotion. But discovering a greater multitude afar off, than the Numidians were: and hearing withal the Romans to shout, with the manner whereof his ears had been well acquainted before time, he took him to his heels ere he came within the dart-shot. And bring let out at a back postern gate, taking with him Epistides, he recovered with some few other the Sea side, where, as good hap was, they light upon a small bark or pinnace; and so leaving Sicily to the enemies, for which there had been much strife so many years together, they passed over into Affrick. The multitude besides both of Carthaginians and Sicilians, without any skirmish either begun or intended, fled like blind men they wist not whither: and finding all wayes made up, and no passage forth, they were miserably slain and hewn a pieces about the gates. Levinus being possessed of the Town, caused all the chief men and rulers of the City, to be beaten with rods, and to lose their heads: all the rest together with the pillage he sold in port-sale, and the morny that was raised thereof, he sent to Rome.

When the news of this misfortune of the Agrigentins was blown over Sicily, all at once turned Roman, and Annibal lost all. For in short space there were 20 Towns betrayed and yielded, six forced by assault, and to the number of 40 voluntarily surrendered to the devotion and protection of the Romans. The principal noble men of which States, after that the Consuls had either rewarded or punished according to their several demerits, and compelled the Sicilians generally to lay by arms and weapons, and to take themselves to the plough, for to ear, till, and sow their grounds; to the end that the Island might bring forth fruit, not only to sustain and maintain the natural inhabitants thereof, but also to ease the price of corn and victuals in the City of Rome, and throughout all Italy, like as it had done many times before: he transported over with him into Italy a rabble and damned crew of unruly people from Agatirna. Some four thousand there were of them, a confused multitude of all sorts, a very mish mash and sink, dangle of vile and wretched persons, most of them Outlaws, Bankrupts, and notorious malefactors, in danger of death by the laws of their Cities where they lived. And being fled their countries, some for one fact, some for another, they chanced all upon like fortune to sort themselves (as commonly birds of a feather will flie together,) and at Agatirna, they made choise like outlaws, to live by robbing and spoiling: and this was their only profession and trade. Levinus thought it no good policy to leave behind him these good fellows in an Island, which began but now upon new peace to knit and unite again; for fear lest they would minister matter of innovation and change; and besides, there was some good use of them among the Rhegins, for to forage and rove about the Brutians country: for such they stood in need of, and had laid for a company which were acquainted with theeving and stealing. And to this year made an end of the war in Sicily.

P. Scipio L. Deputy and General in Spain, having in the prime and beginning of Spring put his ships to Sea and set them afloat, and by an edict summoned all the aids of the allies to repair to the Rendezvous at Taraton; gave order and commandment, that as well the ships of war as of charge and burden, should from thence set forward, and shew themselves at the mouth of the River Iberrus. And after he had given direction and charge, that the legions from out of their winter harbors, should there meet together, himself accompanied with five thousand of his allies put himself on his journey to his main army. Being thither come, he thought it good to make some speech to the old souldiers especially, as many as remained alive after so great defeats and overthrowes, and when he had assembled them all together to an audience, in this wise he spake unto them, "Never was there new General before my self, that could by good right, and in regard of desert, render thanks unto his souldiers, before he had employed them, and made trial of their good service. But as for me, before I ever came within sight of this Province, before I entered my government and saw the camp, fortune hath obliged me, and made me beholden unto you. First, for your kindness and zealous affection to my father and to mine uncle, both while they lived, and when they were dead. Secondly, in that when the possession of this Province was lost, after so great foils and overthrowes, ye have by your vertue and valour recovered the same again, and kept it entire to the behoof of the people of Rome, and myself, the next successor in place of sovereign rule and command. But so far much as our full purpose and present resolution is, by the leave, favour, and power of the Gods, not so much to hold the possession our selves and abide in Spain, but to dispossesse the Carthaginians that they may have no footing nor abode at all there: and since the thing that we go about, is not to stand keeping the bank of Iberrus, for to stop the passage of the enemy: but to give the attempt, & passe over our selves by force: yea, and therewithal to transport the war over with "us into his own country, and to come home unto him. I fear me greatly, lest this will seem "unto some of you a greater designment, and more audacious enterprise of mine, than may ei"ther suit and sort with the fresh remembrance of those late defeats, or stand well with my young "and unripe age. The soils and unfortunate foughten fields in Spain, can be of no man in the "World forgotten later than of my self, whose father, whose Uncle, were within the space of "30 dayes there slain, to the end that sorrow upon sorrow, funeral upon funeral, one mournful "death after another, should unfortunately be heaped upon our house and family. But as this de"solate estate and defect almost of all my house and name (wherein I only, in manner, am left alive "of my race) woundeth my heart and makes it bleed, as often as I think of it: to the publick for"tune and vertue of the Common-weale, reviveth my spirit again, and will not suffer me to de"spair totally of the state of this Empire: considering the destiny and Providence of the Gods, I "whereby it is a thing given unto us, and our luck hath ever been, that howsoever we have recei"ved overthrowes in all great wars and dangerous battails, yet in the end, we have gone away "with the victory. I omit to speak of old examples, of Porfena, of the Gauls, and Samnits: and "I will begin at the Punick wars. How many armadoes and fleets, how many brave Captains;

 "how many valiant and puissant armies were there lost and miscarried, during the former? And "what should I say of this in our dayes? In all the defeats and overthrowes, I was either present
 "my self in person; or if I were not in any of them, yet I am sure, I was he that felt the smart of "them, more than any man else whatsoever. The River Trebia, the mere Thrasymenus, the Town
 "Canna, what are they else, but the very sepulchres and tombs of the Roman armies there hewn "in pieces, and of their Consuls slain. And thereto, the general revolt of Italy, the rebellion of "Sicily, the falling away of the greater part of Sardinia. Moreover and besides, this last affright
 "and terror; namely, the Carthaginians camp pitched between Anio and the walls of Rome, and "Annibal seen well neer, as conqueror at the very gates of our City. In these so great ruins and "adverse distresses of our state, yet the vertue alone and valour of the people of Rome hath stood
 "upright, sound, and immutable: yea, and hath raised up again and set on foot, all that which lay "along on the ground. You only, my valorous souldiers, were the first, that after the discomfiture
 "of Canna, under the leading and good fortune of my father, withstood Asdrubal in his journey and "expedition toward the Alps, purposing to go down into Italy; who if he had joyned with his "brother Annibal, certainly by this day, there had remained no memory of the Roman name.
 "And in very truth, these affairs falling out so prosperously, made amends and recompence for all "the former losses. But now through the goodness of the Gods, all things prosper and go well "forward: and the affairs of Italy and Sicily both, mend daily, and are every day better than "other. In Sicily, Syracuse and Agrigentum are won and wholly ours: the enemies be driven "out of all the Island, and the state is reduced into the form of a Province, subject to the people of "Rome, and under their obedience. In Italy, the Town of Arpi is recovered by surrender, the "City of Capua is forced by assault. Annibal himself, having measured all the way, (but in fear-
 "full hast and in manner of a flight) as long as it is from Rome to the Brutians country (in high "Calabria), is there driven up into the furthest angle and corner thereof, nothing more wishing
 "and praying for at Gods hands now, than to be able to retire and get away safe out of his ene"mies Land. What thing then were lesse becoming, my hardy souldiers, than this, If you who "have sustained and upheld the decaying and down-falling estate of the Roman Empire in this "Province, you (I say) together with my two parents (whom for the reverence that I owe to "them, give me leave to make equal, and to honour with that name) at what time as calamities
 "and losses, hapned suddenly one in the neck of another, and the Gods themselves seemed to take "part and stand with Annibal; should now let fall your courages and be faint-hearted, because in "those Provinces aforesaid, all things go well to our hearts desire and great contentment. As for "the late misfortunes and adversities which have hapned here, would to God they had passed over "without sorrow, as well of my part, as of yours. But for the present, the immortal Gods, Pro"tectors and Governors of the Roman Empire, who inspired into the minds and hearts of all the "Centuries, to wish and chuse me to this place of soveraign honor, even the same Gods by augu-
 "ries and auspices, by all tokens of the birds either by flight or sight, yea, and by visions also in the "night season, do portend, signifie and promise unto me, all good speed and happy successe: yea
 "and mine own mind giveth me, (which ever hitherto, hath been to me the truest prophesie, and "never deceived me) that all Spain is ours: and that within short time the whole Punick nation
 "nation, being expelled and driven out from hence, shall fill all Seas and Lands with their shame-
 "full and dishonorable flight. That which my spirit and soul of it self presageth, the same doth rea"son also conclude by most certain and infallible demonstration. The allies and subjects here of "the Carthaginians, oppressed and wronged by them, have humbly by their Embassadors craved "our aid and succour. The Captains General of their forces, being at difference and odds all three "among themselves, inso much as they had like to have departed and revolted one from the other,
 "have distracted and dismembered their forces into three parts, and bestowed them in three sever-
 "all countries, most removed and distant asunder. And no doubt, the like fortune is ready to fall "upon their heads, which lately was our undoing and overthrow, upon the same occasion. For "even as we before were forsaken of the Celtiberians, so are they now abandoned of their allies.
 "Besides, they parted and divided their armies asunder: which was the only cause, that brought "the utter ruin and destruction upon my father and uncle. And be ye sure, that their intestine
 "discord

A "discord and dissention, will never suffer them to joy a friendly and unite again in one. And thus singled as they are, they cannot possibly withstand our puissance. Now my souldiers, for your part, do but favour the mine of the Scipio: do but affect and love me, the issue and off-spring of your noble Generals, budding forth again (as it were) out of the old stock, cut down to the roots. "Go to, old souldiers, and renowned servants, with bold courage let over the River Iberus a new army and a new Capitane pass over with them into those Lands, which ye have often conquered, and wherein ye have achieved many valiant and memorable acts. And for my self, I will so endeavour and effect, that as ye now againe in me, the resemblance of my fathers and uncles visage and countenance, the same feature, proportion, and dimensions of the body: so I will thew and represent unto you, the true pattern and portraiture of their spirit, wit, faithfulness, and ver-B "tue; even as the expresse and lively image taken and drawn from their own selves: in such sort, as every man may say; That Capitane Scipio is either risen from the dead, or new born again. Having by this Oration, incensed and inflamed the courages of his souldiers, and left Scyllax with a guard of three thousand foot, and three hundred Horse; for the defence of that coast; he transported over the River Iberus, all the rest of his forces, amounting to the number of five and twenty thousand foot, and six hundred Horsemen. There he was advised by some about him, seeing the Punick armies were departed into three countries so far remote and diverse shnder, to set upon and assaile that which was next: but he doubting and fearing lest by that means he should draw them altogether, and knowing that he was not able alone to march and make his part good with so many hosts at once, determined in the mean while, to be doing with new Carthage, and to besiege
C and assault it. This City, as it was rich and wealthy in it self, so it was full of all the enemies furniture and provision for war. There was their armour kept; there was their money laid up, there remained the hostages of all Spain. Besides, as it was leaved commodiously to cross over from thence into Affrike; so it stood upon a convenient and large haven, able to receive and harbour the greatest navy at Sea, and the only haven (if I be not deceived) of all that coast and tract of Spain, which boundeth next upon our Sea. But no man was made privy to his determination, or knew whether they should take their journey, five only Lalio. He being sent about with the armado, had direction so to transport and guide his course by sail and oar, that at one and the self same instant, both Scipio might present his Land forces in the view of Carthage, and the fleet enter the haven. So they departed from Iberus, and within seven dayes came before the City of Carthage, both by Sea
D and Land. His camp he pitched on the north side of the City: which he entrenched and fortified on that outward back part, that stood furthest from the City: as for the forefront, it was by natural situation of the ground, defended surely enough. For the site of Carthage is in this sort. There is a gulf or creek of the Sea, in the middle coast and river well neer of Spain, opposite most to the South-west wind, running & retiring in length within the Land half a mile, lying out in breadth somewhat more. In the very mouth of this creek, there is a little Island from the open Sea; which liveth thickets, and defendeth the haven from all other winds, but only the Southwest. From the inmost nook of this bay, there beareth out a promontory like a demy Island, which is the very Hill or Cape whereupon the City is built. The same on the East side and the South, is compassed with the Sea: from the West, it is enclosed with a lake or standing mear, which also spreadeth somewhat E toward the North, of an uncertain depth: which stretcheth according to the tide, and as the Sea either ebbereth or floweth. Now, there is an elbow or bank of firm ground, somewhat lesse than a quarter of a mile over, that joyneth the City with the main or continent. To that side (notwithstanding it had been no great piece of work there to fortifie) the Roman General, call no trench, nor raised any rampier: either upon a brave and sturdy mind, to shew the enemy how confidently he trusted in his own strength; or because, whensoever he advanced to the walls of the City, as oftentimes he took occasion so to do, he might have open recourse and regrest again into the camp. But when the inner side, which required fortifications, was finished, he set the ships in order within the haven, making a row, as if he would besiege them also on the water side. And when he had gone through all his armado, and given the Captains of the ships in charge, to look well to their F centinels and watches in the night (for that commonly enemies at their first besieging, make what attempts and adventures they can in every place) he returned into his camp. And because he would not only yeeld his souldiers good reason of this his designment, in that he began war first and principally with the besieging of that City: but also encourage them, and put them in good hope of the winning and conquest thereof, he assembled them together, and discoursed before them in this manner;

The situation of New Carthage.

The Oration of Scipio to his souldiers.

"My valiant souldiers and trusty friends, if any man here thinketh, that ye are brought hither to assault a City only, and there an end: he rather maketh reckoning of your present pain and travel, than considereth the profit and commodity thereof ensuing. For ye shall in very truth give the assault to the walls but of one City: but in that one City ye shall be masters and conquerors of all Spain. Here lie the hostages of all their Nobles, their Princes, and States. And no sooner shall ye be Lords of them, and have them in your rule and custody, but presently, all that G "now is under the hands of the Carthaginians in Spain, will be surrendered unto you, and at your devotion. Here is all the money that the enemies have: without which, like as they are not able to maintain war, (as who wage and entertain all their armies for pay) so it will mightily
"stead us, if we light upon it, in gaining the hearts of the barbarous people. Here are their engines and artillery, here is their armour, here is their tackling and provision for their navy, and all "other

"other munition and furniture for war: wherewith we shall both furnish our selves, and disarmish
 "the enemy. Gain we shall over and besides, not only right fair and beautiful, but also a most rich "and wealthy City: yes, and more than that, of right great importance and consequence, in re"gard of a goodly and surpassing commodious haven: by means whereof, we may be provided "both from Sea and Land, of all things needful and requisite for the war. Which, as they will be "of great moment to us that shall have them, so they will be the greater loss to the enemy that "shall forgo them. This is their Castle for strength, their garner for corn, their treasury for money, "their armory, their arsenal, and in one word, their very store-houle of all things whatsoever.
 "Hither is the direct passage and freight cut out of Africa, here is the only port and harbor for "shipping, between the Islands of Gades, or Gabrata, and the mountains Pyrenai: from whence "all Spain overlooketh (as it were) and commandeth Africa. But knowing that you are well
 "appointed already, and prepared to the service, I will say no more but this: Now for the honour "of the Romans, let us go courageously to it, and with all our might and main assault new Car- "thage. And when they all with one accord cried unto him, so to do indeed, and that no other "thing was first to be done: then he advanced before Carthage, then he gave commandment to assail
 "it at once, by Land and Sea. Mago the Captain of the Carthaginians on the other side, when he "saw preparation made by Water and Land to give the assault, for his part ordered his forces and "dispoled them in this manner. To make head against the Romans on that side where they lay en"camped, he opposed two thousand Towns-men: with a guard of five hundred souldiers he kept
 "the citadel: other five hundred he placed upon a little hill belonging to the City which looketh to "the East: all the other multitude whatsoever, he appointed to make resistance in other places, in "where any outcries, shouts, or suddain alarms should be given. Then having set open a gate, he "sendeth those forth, whom he had arranged in that street which leadeth directly to the camp of "the enemies. The Romans (according as they were commanded by their Leader himself) in the "beginning gave ground a little and retired, to the end, that during the time of skirmish and con"flict, they might be neerer to the supply of succours, which were to be sent to second them from "behind. And verily at the first they stood to it stoutly on both parts, and there was no odds percei"ved. But afterwards, the Romans being still freshly reenforced from out of the camp, not only
 "discomfited the enemies, and put them to flight, but pressed on them so hard, as they fled disordered "and out of array, that if Scipio had not founded the retreat, it seemed, that they would have inter"mingled themselves pell-mell with those that ran away, and rushed into the City with them. With"in the City throughout there was no less fear than in the battel. Many courts of guard and other "places were abandoned, the curtain of the walls was left naked, and every man made what shift he "could to leap down and escape. Which when Scipio perceived (who now was turned to a mount "which they call Monte Taurator) and namely, that the walls were void of all the defendants,
 "he commanded all his souldiers to issue forth of the camp, to set forward to the assault, and to bring "ladders to scale. Himself in person, defended with the shields of 3 tall lusty young men going be"fore him (for by this time they let fly afresh from the walls a mighty volley of shot of all sorts)
 "approached the City. There he exhorted, encouraged, and commanded them to do what was re"quisite in this service. And that which made most to enkindle the courages of the souldiers, he was "there personally as an eye-witness and beholder of each mans valour or cowardise. Whereupon
 "they stuck not to run upon the very shot, and to receive many a wound: and now nothing could "keep them back; neither the strength of the walls, nor the armed men that stood thereupon, but "they scaled striving who could mount upon the walls first. At the same time, that part of the City
 "also which the Sea beat upon, began to be assailed by the ships. But from thence, it should seem,
 "they made more ado with houting and hurrying, than effected ought by any forcible assault. For "whiles they came close to the walls with their ships, whiles they put forth their ladders and their "souldiers: whiles every man laboured to gain the Land, the neerest way he could: what with their
 "striving and hast-making, they hindered one another. And by that time Mago had filled the walls
 "full of armed men, who let fly arrows, Javelins, darts, and all kind of shot, wherewith they had "gathered together exceeding great store. But neither men, nor arrows and darts, nor any things else "defended the wall so much as the very wall it self. For few ladders they had that could reach up to "the top: and the longer any of them were, the more weak also they were. Whereupon, by rea"son that they who were climed up to the highest rounds, could not gain the parapet and discharge
 "the ladder, and yet some or other still clambred up after, the ladders being overcharged with the "weight, brake in pieces. Some again there were, that notwithstanding the ladders under them "held still and stood unbroken, yet when they looked down from on high, their eyes so dazzled, and "were overcast with a mist, that they lost their sight, and fell from the top to the ground. But when "ladders here, and men there, came tumbling down, and the enemies upon their good speed grew
 "to be more barty and hardy, the retreat was founded: which gave to the besieged within the Town
 "not hope only of present rest and intermission of so great labour and toil, but also assured them in "manner, for the time to come, that the City was tenable against all escalades, although it were "invested therewith round about. And as for fabricks and mounts to be raised and planted against "it, they were not only difficult and hard to be performed, but also would ask some long time: and "Minister in the mean while, space sufficient for the other Generals of their own to come to the "rescue. But scarce was the first assault fully ceased, when Scipio commanded other fresh and "unfoiled souldiers, to take the ladders of them that were wearied already and wounded, and
 "with

A with greater violence to give a new Campaign. Himself, so soon as he understood that it was ebbe and low water, having been advertised by certain fishermen of Tarraco (who sometimes with light boats used to row, and other whiles when their vessels spotted the ground, to wade all over the lake upon firm ground) that men might easily wade to the walls on foot: rather to that place he brought all his soldiers to the assault. It was now almost noon-tide of the day: and besides that the water of it self naturally fell with the ebbe into the Sea, there was a good round northern wind arose, which drew the water out of the lake (which now was well full) after the tide, and discovered such shallows, that whereas in some places therof they went up to the navel, in some again they waded scarce knee-deep. Which their Spies knew well to be an ordinary thing in natural reason: and therefore with good intent had made provision accordingly to take that advantage, yet he turned it to a miraculous and prodigious accident, attributing all to the immediate handy-work of the Gods: as who an gulf passage and passage to the Romans, had turned back the course and current of the Sea, discharged lakes of their water, and opened ways unto them, that never before were troden with the sole of man's foot: and therewith he willed his soldiers to follow Neptune, the guide and Leader of the way, and to passe boldly through the midst of the lake close to the very walls. On the Land-side the assailants had exceeding trouble in standing under the walls: for not only they were hindered by reason that the custels was so high: but also as they went, they lay open and under their shot, and were wounded both waies, to wit their flanks and sides were more annoyed as they approached under, than their faces and fore-front of their bodies. But on the other part, as they were quietly and easily through the meere to the wall, so they climed forward as securely to the very top thereof. For neither was it strongly fortified with bul-warks, nor raised to any height by industry and art of man, so being supported by natural situation of the place, and the standing lake besides, strong enough and sufficiently defended: nor any guard of armed men were there in watch and ward, opposed against the assailants: whiles every man was busy, and wholly intended to help there, from whence some danger was seen. The Romans being thus entered the City over the walls without any skirmish, marched from thence with what speed they could, unto that gate, shott which all the night and day skirmish was already begun: for there not only all their minds were bent and united, but also their eyes and ears were occupied and possessed: whiles some fought, others looked on and encouraged the fighters: in such sort, that there was none of them all once perceived or perceived how the City was taken and surprised behind them, before the darts flew about their ears too high upon their back parts, and when they had the enemies both before and behind. Then not only the walls were taken (when the defendants upon a twofold feat, were driven to abandon them) but also the great town withinforth and without, began to be broken down: and anon, after continual running and beating against it, the leaves thereof perforce flew aspeere, because there might be nothing to impeach or let them in their entrance: then the armed soldiers broke in most furiously. Many already had leaped the walls, and got over, but they turned and betook themselves every where to massacre and make havoc of the Townsmen. But the main host, which entered in at the gate with their Captains, orderly by companies and files in their array, marched forward through the midst of the City to the market place. From whence Spies might see the enemies fled waies, some to the fortresse upon the hill aforesaid, which standeth in the East, and was kept with a guard of five hundred soldiers: others into the citadel, into which Mago himself, with all the armed men in a manner, who were driven from the walls, had retired and fled for to save himself. Whereupon he drew a part of his forces to win the said Hill, and himself in person led the rest to the Citie. And as he fort upon the Hill was taken at the first assault and shot given, to Mago, after he had a while made some means to defend the Citie, seeing all places full of enemies, swimming every where, and no other hope, yielded himself, the Citie, and the garrison. Until the Citie was surrendered and given up, there was nothing but murdering and killing all over the City, and not one spared that seemed to be of any use or use, and as if they came in their way. But then, upon the threat of Emperors the execution ceased, and the conquerors fell to forage and pillage, which at all forth of the night by torch-light. Of five hundred that were of male sex, there were taken prisoners eleven thousand. Then, so many of them as he found to be natural citizens of Carthage, he dismissed and let go free, and reduced unto them not only the City, but also their own goods, which the first fury and rage of war had broken and scattered. These rest of African and Libyan men, some two thousand, which by an oath he promised to be his, and as he had, thus he employed, to serve the Common-wealth of the people of Rome: yet with some hope, that finally they might obtain their freedom again, in case they performed good service, and showed themselves diligent in battles and offices of war. The rest of the multitude of inhabitants, such as were able and young lusty men, as also the stout and sturdy bondsmen, he awarded them to the ships, for to furnish up the number of Galley-slaves and Rowers, and with the eight ships of war, which he took captive in the haven, he increased his own Armado. Besides all this multitude, there were also the hostages of the Spaniards above mentioned, of whom he took as great care, and as good regard, as if they had been the children of Alors and associates. A mighty deal of warlike artillery and ordinance was there found and seized on. Of Catapults of the greatest size 20 of a lesser sort 23. Balists some greater, some smaller of them 33, of these 12. Of Scorpions and Cross-bows without number, as well great as small, and likewise of defensive armour, and offensive weapons a huge deal, and a most glorious quantity. Military ensignes 74. Of gold and silver there

A and a third comes with his two thousand, and no more. I meet with one record which reporteth, that there were 10000 taken prisoners: and another, that there were above 25000. Of Scorpions or Crosbows, great and small, I should say there were gained some 60, if I would take for mine another Silennus, a greek writer: but if I follow Valerius Antias and go by him I should tell you a tale of six thousand of the greater sort, and thirteen thousand of the smaller. See how little rule they had of their tongues to over-reach, or stay of their pens to set down so loud lies upon record. Nay, they are not well agreed so much as upon this point, who were the great Captains and Commanders. Most of them say, that Lulius was L. Admirall: there be again that would have M. Junius Syllanus to be the man. And Armet was Captain of the Punick garrison, and yielded to the Romans, if ye list to beleeve Valerius Antias: but by the testimony and credit of others, it was Mago. Moreover, the records accord not about the number of ships that were taken, nor of the weight of gold and silver, nor yet of the sum of money that was raised of the pillage. To conclude, if we must needs beleeve some one or other, the mean between is the best, and carrieth most likelihood of the truth.

B But to return again to Scipio: "When he had called forth the hostages into his presence first he had them all in general to be of good cheer: for why? they were now in the hands of the people of Rome, who ever desired to bind men unto them by favours and good turns more than to awe them with feare and dread: and to have forraign nations knit and joyned in faithful amity, rather than held in subjection by heavy servitude. Then after he had taken the names in writing of their severall Cities, he also reviewed the number of the prisoners, and counted just how many belonged to every State. Which done, he dispatched messengers home into their countries, willing their parents and friends to come and receive every man their own. Happily any Embassadors of their Cities were present, he restored unto them their own hostages without delay: for all the rest, he gave expresse charge to C. Flaminius the Treasurer to see unto them in all kind, courteous, and liberrall usage. Whiles he was busie in taking this order, there happed to come from among the hostages, even out of the midst of the company, an aged gentlewoman, the wife of Mandovius, brother to Indibilis, a Prince and great Lord of the Ibergetes. She shed tears, and fell down prostrate at the feet of the L. General: and withall began to beseech him most instant-ly, to give a more special charge, concerning the custody of the women-lex, and to recommend them to their keepers, for to be guarded with a careful eye, and to be kept and attended on more tenderly. Why? quoth Scipio, I warrant thee good woman, they shall want for nothing that is meet for them. Then replied this Dame again, We stand not so much (quoth she) upon these terms: for a little thing, God wot, may serve and content them in this poor estate and low condition: my care is for another matter, when I consider and behold the young and tender age of these maidens here. As for my self, I am now past date, and without danger of that injury, which our sex is subject and exposed unto. Now there stood about her the daughters of Indibilis, virgins in the fresh prime and flower of their age, and passing fair and beautiful withall: besides some other Ladies as nobly born as they: who all honoured her as their natural mother that bare them. Then Scipio, "I would (quoth he) in the ordinary course as well of mine own discipline as of that which is established by the people of Rome, have a respective consideration, that no one thing among us should suffer abuse, which elsewhere in any place of the world is held inviolable: this would I do, I say, for mine own credit, and for the honour of Rome: but to have a more special eye that way, your own vertue also and worthiness bindeth me: who in the midst of these your calamities and miseries have not forgot your womanly carriage and the honour of your sex. And thereupon he delivered them over to the custody of a man of approved honesty and integrity, commanding him to guard them with no less reverence, modesty, and continency, than if they were the wives or mothers of their nearest friends that gave them entertainment. After this, there was presented unto him by his souldiers a damoel and virgin of ripe years, taken also prisoner: but so well favoured and surpassing in beauty, that wheresoever she went every mans eye was upon her, in admiration of so rare and perfect a creature. Scipio having enquired of her country where she was born, and the wife of what parents she was descended: among other things learned, that she was espoused and affianced to a young Prince of the Celtiberians, whose name was Allucius. Postwith he sent home to her parents and foresaid spouse, for to repair unto him: and in the mean time he understood that her husband that should be was wonderfully enamoured of her, and ready to die for her love. So soon as the young Gentleman was come, Scipio entred into a more familiar speech with him, than he did either with the father or mother of the maiden, and in these terms he entertained him: "I am a young man (quoth he) as well as your self. Come on therefore, let us young men both devise and commune together more freely, and not be too nice, coy, and bashfull one to the other. After that your espoused wife, taken captive by my souldiers, was brought unto me, and that I heard of the exceeding fame and affection that you cast upon her, I beleeved it full well for her singular beauty deserveth no less. Now forasmuch as my self, it might be allowed to use the pastimes of youth, (I mean no other wise than in honest and lawful love) and were not called away by the Common weal, & employed wholly in other affairs of state, I would think to be pardoned and held excused, if I had an extraordinary liking to a spouse of mine own, and loved her extremely. I must therefore needs favour and tender your love, which is the thing I can, considering that I may not the other in any wise. Your sweet heart and best beloved I have entertained as well, and as respectfully, as she should have been

The rare continence and courtesie of Scipio.

"been with your father and mother in law, who are her own kind and natural parents. Referred "the hath been kept for you alone, that you might receive her at my hands, unspoiled and un"touched, and a present becoming me and you both. In lieu and recompence therefore of this "hoon and gift, which I now bestow upon you, I require at your hands again this only pro"mise and faithful covenant, that you will be a friend and well-willer to the State of Rome. And if "you take me indeed to be a good and honest man, such as these nations and people here have "known my father and uncle to have been before me; know you thus much, that in the City of "Rome there are many more like unto us; and that there cannot at this day a nation in the world
 "be named, which you would wish less to be an enemy to you and yours, or desire more to en"tertain as your friend. The young Gentleman being abashed for very modesty, and yet right "glad and joyfull withall, held Scipio by the hand, called upon all the gods, and besought them in his "behalf to thank and recompence him therefore, since it lay not in his own proper power, in any "proportion or measure to be thankful and make requitall, either as himself could wish, or as Scipio
 "had deserved. Then were the parents and kinsfolk of the maid called for: who seeing the damo-
 "sell freely rendered and given them again, for whose ransom and redemption they had brought "with them a sufficient sum of gold, fell so intreating and requesting Scipio to vouchsafe for to ac"cept the same at their hands, as a gift and token of their good will: assuring him, that in so doing,
 "they should take themselves no less bound and beholden unto him, than for the restoring and "delivering of the virgin untouched and undefiled; Scipio seeing them so earnest and importunate, "promised for to receive it, and withall, commanded that it should be laid down at his feet: and "calling Allucius unto him, "Here (quoth he) over and besides all your other dowry which your "father in law must pay you, have from me thus much more money to mend your marriage with;
 "take this gold therefore to your self, and keep it for your own use. And so after this rich reward
 "given, and great honour done unto him, he was dismissed; and departed home with much joy and "hearts content: where he made report unto his countrymen and people of the praise-worthy
 "vertues of Scipio, and the favours from him received; saying moreover, there was come into Spain
 "a young man resembling the immortal gods in all respects: who as well by bounty, liberality,
 "and bestowing benefices, as by martiall prowes and force of arms, is in the very way to win and con"quer all. So when he had assembled and mustred all his vassals and tenants, he returned within few
 "daies, accompanied with a train of fourteen hundred of the best and most choicest horsemen of his "country.

Scipio keeping Lalins still with him, until by his advice and counsel he had disposed of the cap"tives, hostages, and other prizes and pillage: after he had serled all in good order, appointed a "Galiace of five banks of oars, wherein he embarked the prisoners, with Magus and some fifteen "Senators besides, who together with him were taken, and sent them to Rome with a messenger to "carry tidings of this victory. Himself determined to sojourn a few daies in Carthage, which time "he spent in training and exercising his souldiers, as well of land service as at sea. The first day he "caused the Legions to run to and fro in their armour four miles out in length. The second day he "commanded them to scout and furbish their harness and weapons before their tents. Upon the "third day they joyned and encountered in battell-wise, and practised to fight with blunt wasters
 "and bastons; yea, and lanced one at another darts and javalins, rounded at the point end with
 "balls in manner of foils. The fourth day they rested and reposed themselves. On the fifth day again "they ran at turnament as before, armed. This order they kept, exercising, labouring, and resting "by turns, so long as they abode at Carthage. And thus much for the Legionary souldiers. The "sea-servitors and mariners used in calm water and still weather to row up onto the sea, and there
 "to make triall of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, representing shewes of sea-fights and "skirmish. Thus without the City, they endured their bodies, and quickned their spirits and coura-
 "ges both on land and water. Within the town there was nothing heard but preparation of war-
 "furniture. All the publike shops and work-houses full of smiths, engineers, and all other artifi-
 "ers for the purpose of their work, and never going from it. The General himself, as supervisor "with equall and indifferent care oversaw all. One while he would be with the Amado, in the har"bour; another while, he conversed among the Legions, and surveyed with them. At times he would "set by foot to visit the works about the walls, and see how they went forward. Other whiles he "would be in the shops aforesaid, among the multitude of the Carpenters, and Smiths, and other
 "Artisans, viewing what they did there; and in the arsenal and ship-docks, observing and marking
 "how much they went forward day by day, striving by way of emulation as they did, who would do "most and quit himself best. Having thus set them a work, repaired the walls which he had battered "and shaken, and placed certain guards there, for the defence of the City, he took his journey to "Tarragone, and all the way he was visited and plied with sundry embassages. Some of them he an"swered and dispatched as he was in his journey; others he put off, to give their attendants at Tar-
 "ragone; for thither he had summoned all the allies and confederates, both new and old, to meet "him. And in manner all the Cities and States on this side Leuras, and many also of the farther Pro"vince of Spain, there assembled.

The Carthaginian Captains and Commanders at the first of set purpose, suppressed and stop"ped the rumour of the winning of Carthage. But when the thing was too too apparent, it could "not be hidden and smothered, they used all the words they could to elevate it, and make the mat"ter less than it was. To wit, "That by a hidden invasion and expedition of the Romans in one day

A " (as it were) by stealth, it chanced that one of the Cities of Spain was surprized; that the insolent and foolish young man bearing himself prodigally proud, and jocund beyond all measure, would seem to make up the measure or so small a catch that he had got, with a great shew of a brave victory: but when he shall hear once that there are three Generals coming toward him, and three victorious armies of enemies, he will soon pull in his horns: he will then tell us another story when presently he shall call to remembrance with grief of every vain in his heart, the death of his father, of uncle, and other progenitors. These and such like speeches they gave out among the people and common sort, knowing in their own conscience what a blow they had caught, and how much their strength was decayed by the loss of new Carthage.

C CNEUS Fulvius the Pro-Consul, was slain, and with his army utterly defeated by Annibal at Herdonea. But Cl. Marcellus, the Consul, had better fortune in a battell against him before Numistro. From whence Annibal distoged and departed by night. Marcellus pursued after him, and ever as he fell off, followed him hard still, until he gave him battell. In the former fight Annibal had the victory, but Marcellus in the later. Fab. Max. the father being Consul, had the Tarentines yield up unto him by treason. In Spain, Scipio fought a battell with Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, at Batula, and won the field. Among others there was a boy taken prisoner of royal blood, and of incomparable beauty: whom he sent with rich gifts unto Masaniella his uncle by the mother. Claudius Marcellus and T. Quinctius Crispinus the Consuls, who chanced to go out of their Camp so disorderly, as espials, the country, were forelaid by an ambush of Annibal, and entrapped. Where Marcellus was slain, Crispinus fled. This book containeth a so the wars and exploits achieved by P. Sulpicius the Praetor, against Philip and the Achaens. The Consuls held a solemn survey and numbering of the Citizens, and purged the City, for which survey there were found of Roman Citizens 137168. By which account it was seen how many the people of Rome had lost, by the adverse fortune of so many battels. Asdrubal, whom with his army had passed over the Alps for to fight with Annibal, was slain, and with him 56000 men besides, by the conduct of M. Livius the Consul, but without the equal good service of Cl. Nero the other Consul: who being appointed to make head against Annibal, left the Camp so, as the enemy was able to thrust in with an little power of hardy men, environed and enclosed Asdrubal about, and so defeated him.

E Thus stood the affairs in Spain. In Italy the Consul Marcellus having recovered Salapia by composition, won by force two towns from the Samnites, Minturne and Minturne. Where there were slain three thousand of Annibal's soldiers, who had been left there in garrison. Some good portion of the pillage was shared among the soldiers. Of which booty there was found there 12000 measures called Modii, and of bulley 100000. But the joy from hence was not so great as the loss and damage received within few daies after, not far from the City Herdonea. C. Fulvius the Pro-Consul lay there encamped upon hope to regain that City, which after the defeat at Clunia, had revolted from the Romans. He was neither fortified in a place of safety, nor yet well furnished and manned for defence. The Captain thereof (En. Fulvius aforesaid) was by nature ever negligent, but grew much more so this now, presuming upon a vain hope that he had of them within, in that he perceived how the townsmen already began to fail in their devotion and faithful allegiance to the Carthaginians: especially, after they heard that upon the loss of Salapia, Asdrubal was departed out of those parts into the Lucanian country. Annibal had intelligence of all this brought unto him from Herdonea by secret messengers, which, as it caused him to have a carefull eye to the saving and keeping of a friend City, so it ministered good hope unto him for to surprise his enemy in unawares and unprovided. Whereupon with his army highly appointed, he took long journey, and made haste to Herdonea, so as he prevented almost the time and breath of his coming. To And to strike the more terror into his enemies, he thither marched in battell array. The Roman Generals, as adventures and bold as he every way, having nothing at all to possesse, nor so strong brought his force forth in more haste than good speed, and gave him battell. His fifth legion, and the left wing of corner of Cavalry began the skirmish, and charged hotly. But Annibal had given his horsemen direction, that when the Infantry was in the midst of skirmish, with mind & eye wholly occupied that way, they should wheel about and fetch a compass, and while some of them assailed the the Camp, the rest should play upon the back of their enemies: himself iterating chibons unto the name of Cn. Fulvius, for which sake, because two years before in the very same quarter he had vanquished another Cn. Fulvius, who was Praetor also, assured them of the like success in this conflict. And verily this conceit and hope of his proved not vain and frustrate. For when at in close fight and skirmish of the footmen many of the Romans were slain down and slain, but so, as yet the ranks stood unbroken, and the ensignes upright, behold a sudden fresh charge of the horsemen on their back, and a great shout of the enemies with all decried and heard from the camp, first discomfited the first legion, which being marshalled in the second battailon, had been put in disarray before by the Numidians, & then the fifth, & so consequently even those that fought in the forefront of the vanguard before the ensignes. Some fled amain, others were killed in the midst between, where Cn. Fulvius himself with twelve Tribunes of Knight marshals were left dead in the place. Of Romans and Allies how many died in that conflict, who is able to set down for certain: seeing in some records I find the number fifteen thousand, and in others not above seven thousand?

The conqueror Annibal was Master likewise of the Camp and all the pillage there. As for the town Herdonia, because he understood for truth, that it minded to have revolted unto the Romans, and would not continue fast in their fidelity, if his back were once turned: after he had conveyed away the multitude of the inhabitants to Metaurum and the Thuriens, he set it on fire and burnt it quite. The Nobles and principall Citizens, who were known to have had secret talk and conference with Fulvius, he put to death. The Romans, who out of so great an overthrow escaped, made shift by divers and sundry waies to flee, half naked as they were, to Marcellus the Consul into Samnium. But Marcellus nothing dismayed and affrighted at this so great defeat, addressed his letters to the Senat at Rome, with advertisement of the loss of the Captain Generall, and the army at Herdonia: giving them yet to understand how himself even he who after the Cannan field had tamed and danted Annibal, as lusty and proud as he was upon that victory, was minded presently to encounter him, and make him take no long joy and pleasure, wherein he now so wanted and exalted himself.

And at Rome verily as they mourned much for the loss past, so they feared as greatly the future dangers. The Consul having passed out of Samnium into the Lucans country, laid down before Metaurum, in the very sight of Annibal, and there in a plain encamped himself, notwithstanding the enemy was possessed before of the hill, and had the vantage of the ground. And for to make more show of his own confidence, and how little he feared, he first brought forth his men, and marshalled them in order ready to bid battell. Annibal so soon as he saw the ensignes advanced forth of the gates, said not behind. And they arranged their battels in such manner, as that the Carthaginians with the right wing took up part of the hill, and the Romans displayed their left wing in length, to the very walls of the town. After they had continued fight from the third hour of the day unto night, and that the vanguard on both sides were weary with maintaining of skirmish so long: then the first legion of the Romans, with the right wing of their horsemen the Spanish souldiers also of Annibal his part, the Balazian slingers likewise, together with the Elephants, began the fight, while the rest were already in hot conflict, and close together. For a long time the fight shrank not of any hand. The first legion of the Romans was seconded with the coming in of the third: and among the Carthaginians there came in new souldiers that were lusty in place of the soiled and wearied. Whereby, of a lingering and long skirmish there began all on a sudden a new hot and cruel battell, by reason that the Carthaginians were first slain their bodies in heart. But the night parted the fray and left the victory doubtful in the midst. The morning after the Romans from their right hand arranged in the field would it was far day: and seeing none of the enemies appare and show themselves, they fell to gathering up the spoils by leisure, and heaped upon one place all the bodies of their own men that were slain, and made one great fire, and burnt them to ashes. The night coming Annibal dislodged secretly without any noise, and departed into Metaurum. And Marcellus so soon as day light discovered the flight of his enemy, leaving his horse and wounded people at Metaurum with a small guard, and Publius Fulvius a Consul to be their Captain, followed him by his steps, and at Teramo overtook him. There fourteen daies passed for battles from the guards of both armies, while both horse and foot and with another rather made flight, skirmishes, than any set battels: and lightly the Romans had always the better hand. From thence the armies were conducted through Apulia, with many memorable fight at all, by reason that Annibal in the night season ever set forward, seeing some opportunity of forelaying and entrapping his enemy: and Marcellus never followed but abroad day light and sent out his spies before to clear the coasts.

In this mean while Flaminius spending the time at Arpinum in making port-forts for the problems goods, and in setting and letting out so far as the land which was confiscate and taken to the common wealth of Rome (and all for a rent of seven) there happened a new complot and practice which lay hidden for the time, as he detected and made it light, to the end that he might never want due matter or other to take occasion for to plague and torment the Campains. He had taken order that his souldiers should remove out of the houses within the town, partly for that as well the retirement of the said town within as the lands without should be cleared forth and partly for that the spreading pleasant and desirable seat of that City should effeminate his army, as it had done the host of Annibal before times: and commanded them to build themselves about the Consul, called by the foresaid letters of the Senate, after he had received the charge of the Province and the Army unto Carthage the Prætor, and sent M. Fulvius Mellior the Admirall of the Navy, with a certain number of ships into Africa, as well to fetch in prizes as to spy and learn what the people of Carthage did and went about: himself with ten sail took the seas, and having a prosperous fore-wind cruised at Rome. And being come presently he assembled the Senat, where he declared what acts and deeds he had performed in his Province, namely, "Whereas for the space almost of threescore years there had been war in Sicily both by land and sea; and the same oftentimes fringed with great loss and many deaths: that he now had brought those troubles to an happy end, and set the Province in quiet. That there was not in all Sicily one Carthaginian left; nor one Sicilian, of all them that for fear had been chased and driven out from thence, but was returned and there replanted: that they were all brought home again to their own Cities to inhabit, to their own lands, to plough and sow: that now at last the fore-let and waste ground was husbanded again, and made fruitful not only for the profit and commodity of the occupiers and owners thereof, but also for the most assured relief and sustentation of the people of Rome, both in war and peace. After this, Mellior, and the rest who had deserved any thing well of the City of Rome, were brought into the Senat: unto whom, both all and some (for the credit of the Consul, and to disgrace him of his promise unto them) there were rendered all sorts of honorable monuments. Mellior also was enrolled Citizen of Rome, and a Bill was preferred in that behalf to the people, by the Judgment of the Commons, and with the grace and authority of the Senat.

During these affairs at Rome, M. Fulvius Mellior arrived in Africa with a fleet of 50 sail, and being landed on morning before day, first shewed and answered to the people of the country, made a rode into the territory about Sicca: and having foraged it far and near, taken many men and women prisoners, and reaped a great booty of all sorts of things besides returned to the Armado, and cruised the seas back for Sicca, and arrived again at Leptis upon the thirteenth day after he loosed from thence, and took the fort last. On the twentieth (after straight examination) he learned how much (which also he set down exactly in writing) and sent unto the Consul Laevinus, that he might be acquainted likewise with the state of the affairs in Africa, namely, "that there were in Carthage five thousand Numidians, under the conduct of M. Juba the son of Gilva, most forward young men, and a right valiant warrior: that there were other souldiers also throughout all Africa waged and hired Numidians, ready to be transported and sent over into Spain unto Asdrubal, so the said king by such a most puissant power might with all speed pass over into Italy, and to the conquest of Rome: that in the executing of this designment the Carthaginians were chiefly persecuted, whose numbers, moreover, that there was a mighty party of rigging and decking for so many ships again, and as they truly thought, it should pass the fear very hardly.

These news being read by the Consul to the Senat, and directed the Senat, that they thought there was no tarrying for the ordinary session of Magistrates, summoned and called by the Consul, but that they should assemble a Dictator of purpose, to assemble that solemn Session, and the Consul immediately to return again into his Province. The business grew some debate and question for a time, while the Consul said, that he would nominate and create Dictator M. Fulvius Mellior, who was then in Sicily, and Quintus Fabius of the first line the LL. replied again and said, that a Dictator might be elected ordered without the Territories of Rome, and those were all within the limits and number of Latin, but that Quintus Fabius (a Tribune of the Commons) had put this controversy to question before the Senat for debate, and decided by their opinions: then the Senat granted audience. Then the Consul before he departed from the City, should put up a bill or supplication unto the body of the people, that it would please them to elect a Dictator, and whatsoever they by the Dictator should be pronounced and declared for the Dictator, and in case the Consul refused to do so, then the Prætor of the City should propose the same unto the people: and if he be worthy, that the Tribunes should propose it unto the Commons. But when the Consul stood forth before the people, being a thing meetly belonging to his authority and place, and likewise expressly forbade the Prætor to do so, then the Tribunes of the Commons took the matter upon them: whereupon the Commons decreed, that Q. Fabius, who then was in Capua, should be nominated Dictator for the next day: that very day that this assembly of the Commons was to be holden, the Consul departed Rome, and took his journey toward Sicily. The Nobles thus being disappointed and distressed, thought good to send letters unto Marcellus, for so had his father's hand now unto the Commons, well thus forsaken and abandoned by his College, and to declare him for Dictator, whom the people had by their voices elected. So Q. Fabius was pronounced Dictator by Marcellus the Consul, and by verue of the said act of the Commons, P. Lucius Crassus the Arch-Prelate, was by Q. Fabius nominated Generall of the Cavalry.

The Dictator after he was come to Rome, sent C. Sulpicius Blasus his Lieutenant, whom he had at Capua, to the Army into the Province of Herratia, in stead of Q. Calpurnius the Prætor: whom by his letters he moved to take the government of Capua, and his army there. And himself sent out precepts for the solemn elections of Consuls, against the first Comitial day that he might by Law. But by reason of a contention that grew between the Tribunes of the Commons and the Dictator, it could not pass and be performed. For the Century Galeria of the younger sort, as I am not ignorant, that some there be, who have affirmed that it hapned the next year following. But methinks, it was an unlikely manner, that Scipio should spend one whole year in Spain, doing just nothing.

Now when Q. Fabius Maximus was Consul the fifth time, and Q. Fabius Pictor the third time, on that very day upon which they entered their office (which was in the Ides of March) both of them by decree of the Senat, had the government of the Province Italy: but so, as their jurisdiction was set out by the countries: so as Fabius should was about Tarentum, and Fabius in the Lucans and Brutians countries. M. Claudius continued still in government one year longer. The Pretors had their Provinces parted between them by lot, unto C. Calpurnius Tribulus fell the jurisdiction over the Citizens, unto L. Metellus Phil. over Carthage together with Galla, T. Quinctius Crispinus ruled Greece, and C. Anthonius governed Sardinia. The armies were divided among the Provinces in this wise: unto Fabius were assigned the two legions which M. Fabius Levinus had in Sicily: unto Q. Fabius, those in Italy, which were commanded by C. Calpurnius. The City army was appointed to follow those Legions in Italy: and C. Calpurnius was ordained to sit in the government of that Province, and to have the leading of that army which Q. Fabius had. It was agreed moreover, that T. Quinctius Crispinus should be Consul of Spain, and have the charge of the army there. And that C. Calpurnius should receive the jurisdiction of C. Anthonius the Pro. Pretor, over the province of Sardinia: and with his army, unto M. Marcellus the same legions were allowed, whereunto he had wanted to formerly when he was Consul, unto M. Fabius Levinus and L. Cincius (for they also continued one year more) got out in Sicily with the army remaining after the battle of Canusium: and they were commanded to supply and make up all the companies thereof, out of the numbers that were left of the legions of C. Fabius. For the Consuls caused them to be brought one and gathered together, and sent them into Sicily: and discharged them with the Army that kind of Immunis soldiers, in which the Carthians learned: as also those who remaining of the army of C. Fabius the Pretor had been therewith sent by order from the Senat, for wages and discharges: that they should be at the call. Unto C. Anthonius, the same legions were given by decree in Sardinia, whereunto P. Manlius Vulso had ruled and governed that Province. And P. Scipio having his government prolonged for one year longer, was commanded to sit in Macedonia with the same legions, unto M. Fabius Levinus the Consul. With the rest of the Army it was agreed and ordered in deed, that M. Fabius Levinus should have himself put over two Legions: for the Carthians and the Libyans, unto L. Cincius M. Fabius Mezala, whether of them he would have the government of, so that there was no alteration, save only this, that Scipio and Metellus should continue in Spain one year, and for a year at the next, till such time as they should be called from thence by order from the Senat. Thus were the Provinces divided, and thus were the years followed in the next.

Among other things of great consequence, the Electors of the high Curia, or chief magistracy, who were to be chosen in the month of May, were divided into two parties, and at last got again an old contention between themselves, which was for the Patricians and the Commons. Jun. Brutus (who was the only man of the Commons that stood for it) was eligible, and thereunto he was elected: forasmuch as never any before obtained that honorable dignity, but one of the Senators calling. The Tribunes being called upon for their assistance refused the matter to the Senat. And the Senat put it unto the people, who were divided by them. So C. Manlius Metellus was the first Comitatus that ever was created Magistratus Curie, i.e. the grand Independent over all the Comitatus of the Legion. And P. Manlius the Arch. Bishop of Carthage was created Comitatus for his virtues and ceremonies, and for his services instead of Q. Manlius Scipio in last Decade. The cause and occasion of instituting this Magistracy by contract and composition I would willingly have considered and inquired of, but that the ill hour, wherein I was, turned me forward to good thoughts. This Placuit for his case, look and observe decreed in his youth in regard of which his court of law he was witness to his own natural brother L. Flaccus, and other his kinsfolk, was for the same cause chosen Flamin by P. Manlius the Arch. Bishop. This man, so soon as his mind was employed about Church duties and religious ceremonies, so he lived all at once changed his life, and cast off his old behavior, that there was not one of all the young men in Rome more accurate and careful, nor better loved of the chief of the Magistracy and Legion of the Senat, as well those of his own house and kind, as others that were strangers unto him. And when he saw himself grown generally into that good opinion and reputation among men, he began to have a very good opinion of his own mind and worthiness, inasmuch, as he brought up an old custom again, and was so bold as to take his place in the Senat House (a thing, which for many years space had been intermitted and discontinued in regard of the base unworthiness and insufficiency of the former Flamins.) When he was entered into the Senat chamber, C. Licinius the Pretor willed him to go forth, as being no place for him, and therewith drew him out: whereupon the Flamine called for help of the Tribunes of the Commons, pleading the ancient right and preeminence of that Pacifice dignity, and alleging that C. Flaminius in times past enjoyed that place, together with the pall, or embroidered rich robe, and the Ivory chair. The Pretor on the other side came upon him again, and said, Thy right was not grounded upon old examples past all date, sought out of Chronicles time out of mind:

A but he would needs have it to be carried by the most fresh practice of the newest and latest custom; affirming, That by prescription of the time, either of our fathers or grandfathers daies there was no Flamin of Jupiter usurped that privilege. The Tribunes, who were to moderate this question, gave their judgment thus, That if a thing were foretold and discontinued through the supine negligence of some Flamin, it was worst for themselves and they deemed it no reason, that it should hurt or prejudice the whole priesthood. Whereupon the Prætor himself forced not greatly upon the point, nor stood much with him, and so they admitted the Flamin into the house with great consent of the Nobles, as well as of the Commons. And all men thus conceived of it, That the Flamin had obtained the thing, rather in regard of his sanctimony and holiness of life B than in the right of his sacerdotall dignity.

The Consuls before that they went into their Provinces, enrolled two legions of Citizens, for to supply and make up sufficiently the defect of all the other forces. The old City army Fulvius the Consul committed unto C. Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant; (and brother he was besides to the Consul) for to be led into Hetruria; with direction, that the Legions already in Hetruria should be brought to Rome. And Fabius the Consul caused the residue of the army of Fulvius to be sought up and rallied, which arose to the number of 5936: and commanded his son Q. Maximus to lead them into Stilly, unto M. Valerius the Pro Consul, and of him to receive the charge of two Legions, and the thirty galliaces aforesaid, bearing five ranks of oars. The withdrawing of these Legions out of the Island, nothing diminished nor abridged the garrisons of that

C. ing of these Legions at the Inland, nothing examined nor lodged the garrisons of that Province, either in strength or show. For besides the two old legions, well and sufficiently filled and furnished, he had a great power, as well horse as foot, of Numidians, such as were fled from the adverse part unto the Romans: and took up and levied besides for new souldiers, even those Sicilians also, who had been of the army of Epicides and the Carthaginians, men of approved valour, and skillfull warriors. These forrain aids, when he had put to each of the Roman legions, he kept still the form of two compleat armies. With the one he gave order to L. Cincius to defend that part of the Island which had been the Realm of King Hiero; with the other he maintained the rest of the Island, divided sometimes by the confines of the Roman and Punick dominions. There was a fleet also rigged and trimmed, consisting of seventy ships, for to guard and defend all the maritime coasts, along the tract of the sea side. Himself in person, with the horsemen of Martines, rode about all the Province, for to visit the lands and grounds, and to take note which were filled and well husbanded, which lay forelet and untilled, and to commend or chastise and rebuke the landlords and owners thereof accordingly. The care and regard of corn, thus far forth did good, that the Province was able both to send good store to Rome, and also to convey unto Carthage sufficient to maintain the army that was to lie in standing Camp that summer about Tarentum.

But the soldiers who were transported over into Sicily (and for the better part they were Latines and other Associates) were like to cause a great rising and commotion: whereby we may see, that of small occasions and beginnings oftentimes arise great matters of important consequence. For the Latines and Allies in all their Diets and Councils at home, began to mutter and grumble. That now for ten years space they were with continuall musters and payments of soldiers wages consumed and spent, that there was not a year in manner went over their head but it cost them some great loss and overthrow in battell. Many were slain in the wars, other died of diseases. So that a Citizen of theirs, if he were taken and prest once by the Romans; for every soldier was more sure to perish, than if he were taken prisoner by the Carthaginians: for the enemy sent their captives back again gratis, and without ranfome, home into their country: the Romans bored and picked them away out of Italy, as confined to a place of banishment (I so speak truly) rather than appointed to serve in warfare. For, how the soldiers, remaining after the field of Enna, have continued there, and waxen old these eight years already, and no doubt there were they like to lay their bones before that the enemy (who never so distressed, nor was so strong as now) would depart from thence. In case then that old soldiers returne not into their country, and new still be chosen, within a while there would be none left behind. And therefore be it were for them, before they were come to extreme poverty and destitution, presently to weary the people of Rome, that, while some what is left, which shortly they must be driven to do of very necessity when all is gone. And if the Romans see their Allies once agree together, and take this counsel, they will then verily be like themselves, and grow to some terms of making peace with the Carthaginians. For otherwise be sure as long as Anni- ba hath a day to live Rome will never be clear of wars. These and such like speeches passed in their Diets above said. There were at that time thirty Colonies of the people of Rome: and whilst the Embassadors from them all were at Rome, twelve of them denied the Consuls strictly, and said they were not able any longer to find either men or money. And those were these, Ar- dea, Arifia, Sutrinum, Chorin, Alatrin, Corfick, Stessa, Sora, Verulan, Calat, Narnia, Intervallum. The Consuls amazed at this strange and unexpected accident, being desirous to drive them out of their mind, and to keepe them from a desperate resolution; supposed they should prevail more by chafing and rebuking, than by fair and gentle dealing: and therefore told them a gain, that they had presumed to speak thus unto the Consuls, which they again were abashed and could not find in their hearts to deliver and relate in the Senat-house. For surely (say they) this is not a refusal of soldiery and war service, but a very meer revolking from the people "of Rome, and no better than an open rebellion. Therefore they were best to return again speedily

 "into their several Colonies, and to consule with their neighbors & countrymen, whiles the mat"ter remained yet all whole, as men who had rather let fall some words rashly at adventure, than "resolved indeed to attempt and commit so hapious an act: yea, and to tell them, and put them in "mind, that they themselves were neither Campani nor Tarentini, but meer Romans, from them "descended, and of their race: from thence sent as Colonies into the lands that were won by "conquest, for to breed, increase, and multiply; and to admonish them, That whatsoever duties
 "children owe to their parents, the same they owed unto the Romans, if there remained in them "any kind and naturall affection, any remembrance of their ancient native country: and to ex"hort them to consider better of the matter, and to lay their heads together anew. Forasmuch as "those designments of theirs tended to betray the State and Empire of Rome, and to deliver the "victory of all unto Annibal. When the Consuls one after another had dealt and been in hand "with them a long time in this manner: and the Embassadors nothing moved with their words, "made answer again, That neither they knew what other message to bring home; nor their Senat
 "what new counsell to take: since that they had not any more men to be mustred for souldiers,
 "nor money to be paid for wages: the Consuls seeing them so stiffly and obstinately bent, made re-
 "lacion thereof before the Senat, whereupon every man was stricken into so great fear and trouble "of mind, that many of them gave out, that the Empire of Rome was come to an end. The like, say "they, will the rest of the Colonies do, and surely all our confederates and allies are combined and "agreed to betray the City of Rome unto Annibal. But the Consuls comforted the Senat, and bid
 "them be of good chear, saying, That all the other Colonies besides would continue loyall and fast
 "in their duty and alleageance: and even those also which had failed in their obedience, if there "might be Embassadors sent amongst them, to rebuke and chastise them, and not to speak them
 "fair and entreat them by way of prayer, would no doubt have a respectue reverence of the majes"ty of the Roman Empire. Now when the LL. of the Senat had committed the ordering of this "matter wholly unto them for to manage and handle, according as they should think good for the "weal-publike: after they had thoroughly sounded the hearts and minds of all the rest of the Colo"nies, they called and cited all the Embassadors, and demanded of them whether their souldiers "were in readines, according to the capitulations of the covenant. Then M. Sextilius of Fregella
 "made answer in the behalt of eighteen of them, "That not only their souldiers were ready ac"cording to the form of the covenant, but also if more were needful, more they would allow, and "whatsoever else the people of Rome imposed upon them, and wished them to perform, the same
 "would they strain themselves to do to the utmost: for, as yet they had people store, and a purse "good enough: and as for their heart, it was much better than their ability. The Consuls after "they had made a short speech unto them by way of a preamble, saying, that they thought it not "sufficient for their desert to be commended from their mouth only, unless all the LL. generally "in the Senat-house gave them condign thanks with one voice and common accord, willed "them to follow after them thither. The Senat having thanked them in as honourable terms as "they could possibly devise, and entertained them with most gracious words, gave order to the "Consuls, to bring them forth also in the face of the whole people of the City: and before them,
 "among other singular favors and kindnesses which they had shewed both unto them and also un"to their ancestors, to make rehearsall of this late good desert of theirs, which they afforded un"to the Common-wealth: to the end, that now also, after so many ages and lives of men past they "should not be forgotten and buried in silence, nor defrauded of their just praise and due com"mendation. And these were they that remained true hearted and fast unto the City of Rome:
 "The Signini, Nolani, and Norbani: the Saticulani, Brundisini, and Fregellani; the Lucani; "Venusini, and Adriani; the Firmans, and inhabitants of Ariminum. And from the other side
 "the Pontiani, Pestani, and Costani: and of mid-landers, the Beneventani, Esernini, Sulmini, "Placentini, and the Inhabitants of Cremuna. Upon the aid and succour of these Colonies, the "Roman State at this time rested and stood maintained: and these all were highly praised "both in the Senat, and in the assembly of the people. As for the other twelve Colonies, which "had refused to do their obedience, the LL. of the Senat gave expresse commandment that they "should not be so much as once minded or named: and that the Consuls, should neither give "them their dispatch, nor retain them still, nor so much as speak unto them. This silent kind of "rebuke without word giving, seemed to stand most with the majesty and grandeur of the people "of Rome.

While the Consuls were diligent in providing and making ready all other things requisite and meet for the wars, it was thought good to bring abroad the vicefinary gold [to wit, the twen"tieth part of all their tributes and revenues] which had been laid up and reserved apart in a more "secret closet of the City-chamber, against an hard winter (as they say) to serve for what need so ever
 "the Common-wealth should stand in. So there was taken forth four thousand pound weight of "gold, whereof three hundred pound was given to the two Consuls apiece, and so likewise to M.
Marcellus, and P. Sulpicius the Pro-Consuls: and to L. Volumnius the Praetor, unto whole for the "Province of France befell. And Fabius the Consul had in addition besides himself above the rest of "one hundred pound weight of gold for to be carried into the Castle of Tarentum. The rest of the "gold they disbursed for to make ready payment down upon the nail unto them that undertook to "provide apparel for the army in Spain, which to their own fame, and the honour of their General,
 "served there in the wars.

Moreover, it was thought good, that before the Consuls departed into their Provinces the prodigious tokens should be purged and expiate. On the Alban mount there were smitten with fire from heaven the Image of Jupiter, and a tree standing near unto the Temple: likewise the lake at Hoffia, the wall at Capua, and the Church of Fortuna: and at Sinuesa the wall and gate of the town. These, I say were, blasted with lightning, and smitten with thunderbolts. There were some also brought word, that the water at Alban bloud. And at Rome within the sanctuary of the chappel of Fortuna, a little image that stood upon her coronet, fell of its own accord from the head of the goddess into her hands. And at Priverium it was for certain reported and known of a truth, that an Ox spake, and that a Vulture or Grue flew into a shop in the market place, wherein it was full of people. And at Sinuesa there was an Infant born of doubtful sex, between male and female, (which the common sort call Androgynoi, as for the most part greek names, admit more easie composition of two words than the Latine) and there it rained milk, and a man-child was born with an Elephants head. These strange and fearfull signs were expiate, and satisfaction made for them with greater sacrifices: and a solemn procession in all the Churches and Chappels, with prayers and supplications was proclaimed for one day. Besides, a decree was granted, that C. Hostilius the Prator should vow and set out the games and plaies of Apollo, in such manner as of late years they had been vowed and set forth.

About the same time Q. Fabius the Consul held an assembly for the creation of Censors, and elected Censors were M. Cornelius Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, who neither of them had ever had been Cens. And by a grant or commission from the Senat, there was a bill preferred unto the Commons, and the same passed, that these Censors should set, and to farm let the territory of Capua. The review of the Senat and choice of new Senators was hindered and laid by reason of a contention between the two Censors, who should be the president of the Senat. Now the choosing of him lay in Sempronius his hand. Howbeit Cornelius alledged, that the custome and tradition of fore-fathers should be followed, namely, to elect him for President, who of all them that were now living, had both first the office of Censor. And that was T. Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius replied again, and said, that as the gods had given him by lot the first place, so they had granted him free liberty to choose whom he would. And therefore he would elect Q. Fabius. Manlius whom at that time he was able to prove to be the principal man of all the City, without exception, and take Annibal himself for the Judge. After much variance and contesting of words, at length Sempronius by relenting and permission of his Collegue elected Q. Fabius Man. the chief Senator. Then the Senat was changed, and new Senators chosen, and eight were overpassed and left out, among whom was L. Caelius Metellus, he that gave the infamous and shameful counsel, to abandon Italy after the defeat at Cannae. In doing likewise and disgracing the Knights and Gentlemen, the same cause was considered of, and took effect, but very few there were of them that were touched with that shame: but all those horsemen belonged to the Cannian legions who were in Sicily (and no small number there was of them) had their horses taken from them. And to aggravate this sharp punishment and note of disgrace, they were plagued also with time of long warfare, for so many of them as had served with horse allowed by the City, should not reckon upon the years passed already, but were to follow warfare ten years forward, and find themselves horses. Moreover, these Censors after diligent search and survey found out and met with a great number of those that ought to have served on horseback: and look how many of them were fifteen years old and upward at the beginning of the war, and had not been employed in the wars, those all they dismissed, and made Erarii or contributaries. After this, they obtained by the great for the repairing and re-edifying again of those edifices which had been consumed by fire about the Forum, for market place, namely the seven shops, the Latin Stables, and the Kings Hall, or royal gallery.

Thus when all things were finished which were to be done at Rome, the Consul set forward to the wars. And first Fabius went before to Capua: and some few daies after Fabius followed, who belonged both his own Collegue by word of mouth most earnestly, and also Marcellus by eff. Annibal letters, to make sharp war upon Annibal, and to keep him occupied, while he assailed Tarentum. Which City, he were once taken from the enemy he were then driven out of all, & having no place to put his head in, nor which he might make account to stand fast and trusty unto him, he should have no reason at all once to stay in Italy. He dispatched also a messenger to Therunt, upon the Captain of the fort and garrison, which by Leontius the Consul was there placed against the Bruttii, and there were eight thousand men. The greatest part of them were of these good fellows, and that damnable crew, whereof we spake before, who used to live by robbing and stealing, and were brought thither from Acathia out of Sicily. Unto whom there were adjoynd many of the Bruttii and natives from thence, and as good as themselves every way, both for audaciousness, and also for readiness to let down any bold adventure whatsoever. This power of men he commanded should be sent to watch and upon the Bruttian country first, and then to lie against the City Canusium, and to assault it. They having performed this service, not only willingly & cheerfully, but also with greediness: having also chased away and rided the husbandmen and peasants of the country, and the City with all forcible means. Marcellus stirred up and provoked by those letters of the Consul: and having a good opinion of his own that of all the Roman Captains there was not one so able to match Annibal as himself, left his wintering standing Camp, so soon as ever there was forage and grain in the country, took the field: and encountered Annibal

as Cannus. Now was Annibal in hand with the Cannusins, and sollicitied them to revolt. But hearing once that Marcellus approched, he dislodged from thence. The country thereabout was plain and open, without any covert places to bestow an ambush, and to lay trains in: therefore he began to retire himself from thence into the woodland parts. Marcellus tracked him still, and followed him hard at heels, and encamped close unto him: and ever as he had fortified and entrenched himself, he brought forth his men into the field, ready for battel. Annibal entertaining small skirmishes with certain Cornets and troops of horsemen, and with light appointed footmen, that lanced darts and javelins, thought it not necessary yet to come unto a pight set battel, and venture all upon one throw. Howbeit he was drawn to a fight, maugre his head, howsoever he laboured to avoid it. For being gone afore one night, Marcellus overtook him upon a plain and open ground: and as he was pitching his tents he kept him from fortifying, by charging his pioneers and labourers on every side. Whereupon they came to a very battell, and fought with all the forces they had on both sides: and when it grew toward night, they departed asunder on even hand: but before it was dark they had encamped not far one from another, and in great haste made shift to fortifie themselves. The next morning by day light Marcellus came forth into the field with all his power: neither refused Annibal the challenge, having with many words comforted and encouraged his souldiers to remember Thrasymenus and Cannas, to cut the comb and bear down and tame this fell stomach and lusty courage of the enemy: who presteth still (quoth he) and seeketh upon us, not suffering us to march on quietly in our journey, nor to pitch our tents: giving us no leave to breath our selves, nor time to look about us. There is not a morning, but so soon as the sun is up in the horizon to give light to the world, the Roman army is out in the field to give us battel. If we could draw blood of him once, and set him out of the field with blood about his ears, he would for ever after fight more quietly, and take better leisure with him. With these and such like comfortable words and effectual remonstrances they were well animated; as also provoked seeing themselves thus molested by the enemy, who day by day never ceased to challenge and brave them still: whereupon they began a fierce and cruell battell. They had now continued fight above two hours, and then began the Roman Cavalry from the right wing, and the extraordinary souldiers that flanked the main battell, to give ground and dismarsh. Which Marcellus perceiving, he brought forward the eighteenth legion in the vanguard. And while some retreated back fearfully, others come forward but slowly, the whole battell was put out of order, and disarrayed; and so at length it was discomfited; and for that fear unmounted shame, they turned their backs and fled away again. Slain there were in the conflict and in the rout together some 2700 Citizens and Allies: with another, among whom, there were four Roman Centurions, and two Colonels, Marcius Licinius, and Martius Fulvius. Of military engines, there were four lost of that right wing which first shrunk and lost ground: and two others of that legion which came to succour their fellows that gave back and retreated. Marcellus after that he was returned into the Camp, welcomed his souldiers with such a bitter and sharp Oration, that the very words of the Generall in his anger and wrath were more heavy and grievous unto them, than the conflict it self, which they had unfortunately endured all the day long before. "I yield praise yet, and render thanks to the immortall gods, (quoth he) as I may in such a case, that our enemies having vanquished & conquered you in the field, and driven you in so great fear to run headlong within your trenches & gates, came not with all at once to assaile the camp. For surely in the same fearful fright that you forsook battel, you would likewise have abandoned your tents & pavilions. What fearfulnes is this? Whence cometh this terror? What means this oblivion of yours? How cometh it to pass, that ye should so forget all on a sudden, both your own selves, and them with whom ye have to fight? Why surely, they are the same enemies & no other, whom the summer past, you did nothing but either vanquish & overcome, or else pursue & follow in chase: whom for these certain daies past, ye have been ready to tread on their heels as they fled, and run away before you both by day & night: whom in light skirmishes ye have discomfited, whom no longer ago than yesterday, you suffered neither to march forward, nor to pitch their camp. I forbear to speak, and I pass in silence those things which in good right ye may stand upon & make your boast. I say nothing of that whereof ye ought to be ashamed & displeased with your selves, namely now but even yesterday ye brake off the fight on even hand, and retired out of the field, when the enemy had got no advantage? What hath this one night, or what hath one day done to you off? Are either your forces in this meantime abridged & diminished, or your enemies augmented & encreased? Now surely, me thinks, I speak not to mine own army, nor to Roman souldiers. Only ye carry about you the same bodies & armour that ye were wont. For if ye had but the same minds and hearts with you, should the enemies ever have seen your backs: should they have taken either banner from any company, or ensign from cohort, and squadron? As yet the enemy never vanted and made boast of the defeat of our Roman legions. You are the very first that this day have given him the honour of discomfiting and putting to flight our army. Then they all cried out, and besought him to pardon that daies default, and to make trial once again of his souldiers courages when and wheresoever he would. Mary, and that I will (quoth he) my souldiers: I will put you to it: even to morrow I will bring you abroad into the field, and after ye have got the victory ye shall obtain that pardon which ye now crave. So he gave order, that those cohorts which had lost their ensignes should have the allowance of barley in stead of wheat: and as for those Centurions of the bands or companies, whose banners were

his souldiers.

A were left, them he degraded in this manner: He caused them to be disarmed, and their skins to be drawn naked and taken from them, and so let them go and shake their ears. And withal, he made proclamation, that the next day they should all present themselves in readiness, as well footmen as horsemen; which done, he dismissed the audience; and they all confessed and acknowledged, that they were justly and worthily thus checked and rebuked: and that there was not that day one man in the Roman army, setting aside the General himself only, but he was bound to make amends and satisfaction, either with spending heart's blood, or achieving a noble victory. The morrow after they all shewed themselves unto him in their armor, and well appointed, according to his commandment. The General commended them for their forwardness: and gave them to understand, that he would set those in the forefront of the vanguard, which the day before began to run away; as also those cohort likewise that lost their ensigns. And now he gave them warning, and charged them all to fight it out lustily, to win the field: and to endeavour and strain themselves both all and some, that the news of yesterday's flight came not to Rome before, and prevented the fame of this day's victory. Then he willed them to go to their meat and to strengthen their bodies: that in case the fight should hold long, they might be able to endure to the end. Now when all was said and done, that might encourage and stir up the hearts of soldiers, they went out & advanced their ensigns into the field. Annibal being advertised hereof, "Now believe me (quod he) we have to deal with an enemy indeed, who is of that nature, that he can neither brook his good fortune, nor away with bad. If he hath won at any time, he pursueth those whom he hath vanquished, cruelly. Contrary-wise if he have lost, he beginneth to fight with the conquerors again right freshly. Then he commanded the trumpets to sound, and brought forth his power in battal array. A field was fought there on both hands more sharply a good deal, than the Carthaginians strived to keep the honor and reputation of yesterday's service: the Romans strived to wipe away the ignominy and shame of that day's foil. On the Romans side, the Cavalry of the left wing, and those cohorts which had lost their ensigns, fought in the vanguard; and the twentieth legion was marshalled and ranged in the right point of the battel. L. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Fabius Niger had the leading of both these wings. M. Marcellus himself commanded the main battel, and withal his personal presence encouraged them, as a witness of their valour and courage. Now, when as the fight had continued long, and the victory inclined no ways, Annibal commanded the Elephants to be put forth upon the very forefront of the battel, as if that object might possibly work some terror and confusion among the Romans. And as the first they disordered the ensigns, and troubled the ranks, so as partly by treading under foot, and partly by scattering their for fear, that were all about, they had laid naked and open the battel in one place, and in more places than so: had the Romans fled, but that C. Decimus Flavius, a Colonel, having from the first band of the Hannibals, caught up the banner in his hand, commanded the company thereto belonging to follow him; and thither he led them where the foresaid Elephants were gathered round, and made fouler work, and charged them to fling their darts and javellins at them. All this short light sure, and missed them not, yes, and some stuck in them: and no marvel, for the beasts were near at hand, the bodies great and standing thick in a plump together. But as they were not all wounded so they that had the darts stuck in their backs and sides, were as ready (such is their nature, dangerous to meddle withal) for to hurt their own matters, as the enemies: and all turned upon their fellows, that were unthrust, and drove them back. So as now, not that entire band only, but every soldier else for his own part, who was able to reach the herd (as it were) of the Elephants, as they fled, did his best to lance javellins and short darts at them. And so much the more furiously ran the beasts upon their own, and made a far greater havoc there, than they had done among the enemies. By how much more fiercely fear and fright let them agitate and sent them forward, than the will of their masters that lay upon them, was able to rule and restrain them. The Roman footmen perceiving this advantage, came forward with their ensigns and banners upon that battail too, which was put in dismay by the running to and fro of these untuly dumb creatures, and without much ado and further skirmish, put them to flight, after they were once broken out of their ranks, and let in a flight. Then Marcellus sent his Cavalry after them, to pursue them as they fled, and to follow the chase, and never gave they over huncing and coursing them, until they had lodged them in great fear within their camp. For besides all other things, which made them thus feared and affrighted, there chanced two Elephants to fall down in the very gate to entrance thereof, so that the soldiers were forced to rush into it over the trench and rampier. In that place was the greatest slaughter made of the enemies. For there were slain eight thousand men, and five Elephants. Neither was the Romans a bloodless victory of it: for of the two legions there died full upon 1700, and of the allies more than 1200. Besides many a citizen and confederate were wounded. And Annibal the next night dislodged and departed. Marcellus although he was desirous to follow upon him, yet he could not for the multitude of his hurt men. Theophilus that were sent out to pursue him in his march, brought word back the next day, that Annibal took his way into the Brittain country. Near about the same time, the Hispanians, Lucians, and Volscents, after they had delivered up the garrisons of Annibal, which they had in their Cities, yielded themselves also to Q. Fulvius the Consul, and were received to mercy with great clemency by the said Consul, after some rebuke given them in words, only for their trespass and error past. The Britians also had the like hope of pardon, when Q. Fulvius two brethren, of the noblest house of that nation, came from them

them to sue for the same condition of yielding and surrendering themselves, which was granted unto the Lucans.

Q. Fabius the Consul, won by assault a Town in the Salernine countrey called Munduria; Prisoners were taken there 4000, and some good store of other pillage. From thence he went to Tarentum, and in the very mouth of the haven, lay against the City. Those ships which Fabius had for to wait the convoy of victuals, he partly charged with engines, and other ordnance to assault Towns withal, and partly furnished with artillery, with stones, and shot of all sorts: the ships of burden likewise, and not the Gallies only which were guided by oars; to the end, that some might bring Engines and Ladders unto the walls, and others aloof from out of the ships wound and hurt those that defended the City. These ships were ordained and appointed from the open Sea to assault the City. And clear was the Sea of all danger from the Punick navy, which was sent unto Coraera, at what time as Philip minded to assail the Ætolians. In this mean while, the assailants of Canusio, a little before the coming of Annibal, for fear lest they should be surpris'd betook themselves to a little hill; which as it was (for the present danger) a place of safety, so it wanted all things else. Fabius, as he lay at siege about Tarentum, was much helped to achieving of a matter of great importance, by a trifling thing to speak of, and of small moment in itself. The Tarentins had a garrison of the Brutians, sent from Annibal to defend the City. The Captain of this garrison was greatly enamoured and ready to die for the love of a woman, who had a brother that served in the army of Fabius the Consul. He being certified by letters from his sister, of this new acquaintance that she had with that forrainer and stranger, so wealthy and so honorable a person among his country-men; conceived some hope by means of his sister, that her lover might be brought to any thing, and wrought as they would: and so acquainted the Consul with his conceited hope. And this seemed no vain imagination. Whereupon the young man was sent to Tarentum in habit and quality of a fugitive, and by the mediation of his sister, grew into some favour with the Captain aforesaid: and at first practis'd secretly to understand and sound his mind, and afterwards seeing the weakness and inconstancy of the man, he prevailed with him so much, through the flattering speeches and allurements of the woman, as to betray the keeping and guard of that place whereof he had the charge. After that the manner how, and the time when this plot should be put in execution, was agreed upon, the said souldier was let out of the City closely by night in a place between the corps de guard, and informed the Consul what was done already, and in what sort every thing was to be done. Fabius at the first watch, after he had given a token and watchword to them in the Castle, and to those likewise that had the keeping of the haven, himself set a compass about the said haven and lay as closely as he could to that part of the City which lieth to the East. Then all at once the trumpets sounded from the Castle, from the haven and ships, which in the open Sea rid neer at hand. Great shouting there was, and much ado on her purpose from all these quarters, whereas indeed there was least danger or none at all there. In the mean season the Consul kept his men in. Whereupon Democritus, who had beforetime been Admiral of the Armado, and whose chance it was to have the guarding of that place, against which the Consul lay close, seeing all thereabout quiet enough, and no stirring at all, and hearing all other parts to ring again and resound with such alarms as otherwhiles it seemed the City was taken and won, and fearing lest if he sat still and bestirred not himself, the Consul would make some Camisado, and give the assay to enter the City with banner displayed; withdrew his guard toward the Castle, from whence was heard the greatest and most terrible noise. Fabius when he perceived once by guessing at the time, as also by the silence it self in that place (for where but a while before they kept much ado, raising up one another, and calling to arm, there now all was hush, and not a word) that the guards were beat away from thence, he commanded that the ladders should be brought to that side of the wall where the brother & broker both of the treason, had brought word that the cohorts of the Brutians were quartered and kept their guard. Thus on that part was the wall won by the means of the Brutii, who were ready to help and take them up, and so they got over into the City. Then was the next gate broken open, that the army might come by companies under their several colours. Whereupon they set up a shout, and slide before break of day they marched as far as into the market place, and met with none to make head against them, and caused all them that fought at the Castle and the haven, to turn upon them. There, in the very entrance of the market place, began a great skirmish, rather fought hotly than maintained thoroughly. For the Tarentin souldiers were nothing comparable to the Romans, either in courage of heart, or goodness of armour; in skill and knowledge of war, or in lustre and strength of body. And therefore when they had only shot their darts, even before they came to hand strokes, they turned back and slunk away through the lanes of the City, where with they were well acquainted, some to their own home, and some to their friends houses. Two of their Captains, Nico and Democritus, fought manfully, and were slain. Philomenus, who was the principal head that wrought the revolt unto Annibal, fled out of the skirmish as fast as ever his horse would carry him: but a while after his empty horse was seen & known wandering astray in the City, but his body could never be found. It was commonly believed, that he flung himself headlong from his horseback into a certain open pit. As for Carthago, Captain of the Punick garrison, he cast away his armour and weapon, and as he was coming to the Consul with a goodly tale, recounting and remembering his fathers friendship and intertainment to the Romans, there hapned a souldier to meet him and strike off his head. Then by some or other in every place, the Carthaginians and Tarentins showed his revolt and running from the adverse part upon confusion and necessity, this made heart of searching and embracing the passage shone upon the first opportunity presented. I know full well (quoth he) that the very name of a fugitive is odious and detestable to old Allies, so is it suspicious to new. And I cannot greatly blame the manner of men in so doing, in case it be not the best chance, but the double dealing that causeth the hatred. Then he reckoned up his own good turn and doings done unto the Carthaginians on the one side, and recounted their civilities and justice on the other side together with their injurious dealings with himself and his people. And therefore, quoth he, this body of mine only hath converted among them until this day, but my heart and affection hath long since been with them, where I believe verily, that right, justice and religion is regarded and maintained: for even so do we sit, as suppliants in humble manner to the Gods almighty, when we can no longer endure the violence and wrongful outrages of men. Beseeching Scipio this one thing, which that this misfortune from the enemy, and ranging with him, he would neither blame and condemn presently as a transgression, nor honor and commend as a good desert of his, but as he should find both him and the rest, by good proof from that day forward, even so to make reckoning of them accordingly, and not otherwise. Scipio made answer again, That in truth he would so do: neither would he take them for fugitives and runaways, who judged that they were not bound in conscience to maintain the society and alliance with their as good and lawful, who made no count at all to observe inviolable, any promise or duty, to God or man. Then were their two wives and children brought forth into their sight, and delivered unto them, whom they received, and shed tears abundantly for joy, and so for that day they were had to their lodgings. The morrow after, which was plight and contracted between them, and the same confirmed by covenant: and they were dismissed to bring their forces, and to shew them before him: and so they quartered and lodged in the same camp with the Romans, until by their guidance and direction they came unto the enemy. The army of the Carthaginians next unto them was under the conduct of Asdrubal, near unto the City Dinwile. Before his camp, he kept certain standing guards of horsemen. Upon them the light sones for loss hope of success and dangers of the Roman host which went before the battail to skirmish, likewise they of the forefront and winguard, charged forcibly with their shot, yet so contentedly, and in scornful wise, even presently upon their travail in journey, and before they had chosen a place of ground to encamp in, that it was soon seen what heart there was in both parts. For the Cavalry of the enemies fearfully fled, and were driven into the camp: but the Romans advanced with better confidence, had in the very gates, and so for that day their stomachs were only up and provoked to fight, and then the Romans pitched their tents. Asdrubal in the night retired his army to a covert, which in the top had a broad plain. Behind this hill there ran a river, the fore from the rock and the sides all about the skirts were compassed with were, with a steep bank standing plumb upright. There lay under this hill top another plain lower than the other, which also was enclosed round about with the like bank, as difficult for access as the former. The next day Asdrubal, after he saw the enemies standing arranged before their camp, sent down his Numidian horsemen, the light armed slanders also of the Balears, and likewise the Africans. Then Scipio rode about all the regiments, ensignes, and ranks of his army, marshalled as they stood in battail wise, and shewed unto them their enemies, how they departed afore-hand to fight on equal and even ground, how they taking the vantage of the hills, braved and shewed themselves, presuming and trusting upon the place, and not upon their own valour and strength of arms. Howbeit (quoth he) Carthage had higher walls, and yet the Roman souldiers were able to scale and get over: neither Hills nor Castle, no, nor the very fort, stood in their way then, nor stopped them of their entry. And as for these high places which the enemies are possessed of, they haply may serve their turns well, when they shall see their flight and leap from off the steep banks and run down hill apace, and so get away. But I know, I shall order them there, and lay a block in their way on every side. Whereupon he commanded two squadrons, the one to keep the heights of the valley, through which the river runneth: the other to beset the passage that leadeth from the City into the fields, and crosseth over with the hill side above said. Himself led the light appointed vancurriers, who the day before had discombed the guards and wards of the enemies, to assist the light armed souldiers, that were quartered in the necker brow of the hill. And first they passed through the roughs, and were not impeached nor hindered otherwise than by the difficult passages. But afterward, when they were come within shot, as the very first they were welcomed with a mighty volley of all sort of stones (as it were) like hail upon them. Himself answered them again, and recharged upon them, firing drive and discharging the stones which lay strewed all over the ground, and were such a manner all, as might be welded and sung from them with ease. And not only the souldiers, but lictors and boye-boys, as such as followed the camp, were encompassed among the armed companies.

 And albeit the ascent up the hill was hard, and they were pelted and almost overwhelmed with darts and stones, yet being so injured as they were to climb walls, and resolve withal, they mounted up first to the top, and so soon as they had got forth a vantage ground, where they might have free footing, they found the enemy, (who was light and nimble, and able both to run and to fight himself, and thus well when he was far off, all the time that they skirmished aloof, and plied upon one another with light shot) now that they came to close fight, and at hand strokes, was able to stand his ground: and so they drove him from his place, and with great slaughter chased him and

A for him back to the very battel, that stood upon the highest hill. Then Scipio having given commandment to these, for to follow on the train of their victory, and to enter up still upon the main battel of the enemies, parted the rest of his forces, together with Laelius, willing him to coast along and wheel about on the right hand of the mount, until he found some way of easier ascent himself on the left hand, fetched no long circuit and compass, until he came cross overthwart the flank of the enemies. Hereupon first began their battel to be disordered, while they were desirous to turn their wings, and to oppose their ranks and squadrons against the noises and shouts which rang every where about them. In this tumultuous trouble, Laelius also was got up; and while the enemies drew backward and gave ground, because they would not be charged behind on their back, the vanguard of their part was displayed and lay open; and so the Romans even of the middle battel also, had a late and spacious room to get up and enter upon them: who never had been able to have gained the ground, and won the plain above, (considering the disadvantage of the steep bank) so long as the ranks had stood unbroken, and the Elephants were opposed against them before the Ensigns, in the forefront. Down went the enemies now on every side, and were pitcously killed: and Scipio, who with his left wing encountered the right, charged and plaid especially upon the naked sides of the enemies. And so by this means they had no way left them to flee and escape clear. For the Roman guards on both hands, as well on the left as the right, had beset all the passages. And as for the gate of the camp, the General himself, and the other Captains and officers of the Camp, had taken it up as they fled that way: besides the combersome trouble of the Elephants, whom being now affrighted, they feared no less then their enemies. So there died of them 8000. Asdrubal, who before the conflict had made sure work with all the money, and taken it with him, sent the Elephants before, and having rallied as many as he could, of them that fled and escaped out of the camp, he made haste along the river Tagus, toward the mountain Pyrenaeus. Scipio being now master of the enemies camp, after he had given to the soldiers all the pillage and spoil, but only the prisoners, such as were freemen: when he came to take the number of the captives, found they were ten thousand footmen, and two thousand horse. Of which number, as many as were Spaniards he set at liberty and sent them home without ransom. But as for all the Africans, he commanded the Treasurer to make money of them. Then the whole multitude of the Spaniards, as well those that before had yielded themselves, as they that were taken prisoners the day before, saluted him with great content and general voice, by the name and title of King. Whereupon Scipio, after silence made by the crier, said, "That he took the name of 'L. General or Commander, to be the greatest of all other names, by which his own soldiers used to call him. As for the title of King, howsoever in other places it was great and honorable, at Rome surely it was odious and intolerable. For his own part, he minded indeed he carried of a King, and if they deemed it to be the highest honour that can fall to the nature of man, let them judge so in their own hearts secretly, and please themselves with that title: only he wished them to forbear the word and term thereof. These very Spaniards, as barbarous as they were, perceived by this speech how haughty and magnanimous he was, who in the height of spirit contemned that as a base thing. Whereat in admiration only of the very title, all mortal men besides are amazed and astonished. After all this, he bestowed upon the Princes and great Potentates of the Spaniards, sundry gifts. And of the horses, whereof he had taken in the field and camp great store, he gave Indebilis the choise of three hundred where he would. When the treasurer was selling the Africans, according to the General his commandment, he hapned upon a young springall and stripling, of rare and singular beauty: and hearing that he was of royal blood, he sent him to Scipio. And when Scipio demanded of him who he was, and what country-man, and wherefore at those years he was in camp among rude soldiers: "I am (saith he) a Numidian born, and with that his eyes stood full of water; and in my country they call me Masani. Being left and orphan and fatherless, I was brought up with my grand-father by the mother side, Gala the chief of the Numidians. And with my uncle by the mother, Masani, who was lately come with a power of horsemen to aid the Carthaginians, it was my hap to fall over into Spain. And never to this day, have I been in any danger, by reason that Masani would not in regard of my tender age, suffer me in any hand to go to the wars. Howbeit that very day when the battail was fought with the Romans, unwares to my said uncle, I secretly got in horse under me, and ambur upon my back, and went forth into the field: where my horse chanced to fall, and cast me down headlong on the ground, and so it was my fortune to be taken by the Romans. Scipio gave order that this Numidian youth should be kept safe, and so proceeded to finish matters that were brought before him, as he sat upon the Tribunal in martial court. And after he was come back from thence into his royal pavilion, he called the party before him, and asked him, whether he were willing to return again to his country. Whereat the tears gushing out of his eyes for joy, yes, full faith (saith he) and with all my heart. Then after he had given the young gentleman a ring of gold, a coat embroidered with purple, and with a Spanish souldier's cap, a golden clasp or button, of a brave colour, with all the furniture or caparison thereto belonging, he sent him away, and commanded certain horsemen to follow and accompany him to far as he would himself. Then Scipio fell to consult about the war. Some there were that advised him presently to pursue Asdrubal, but he supposing that to be a dangerous course, for fear lest Masani and the other Numidians should joy their forces to him, he sent only a good guard to keep the passage of the hill Pyrenaeus, and employed the rest of the Numidians, in receiving homage and fealty of other States of Spain.

Within few dayes after the battell at Batula, when as Scipio in his return to Taracum, was gone past the chafe or forest of Cistula: Asdrubal the son of Gisco and Mago, the two Generals, arrived out of the farther province of Spain unto Asdrubal the son of Amilcar. But they came a day after the fair, and too late to help an overthrow past already: yet in very good time, to give counsel for the managing and executing of the war behind. There, as they conferred together concerning the disposition of the Spaniards, and how they stood affected in the countries of each province, only Asdrubal the son of Gisco was of opinion, and periwaded, That the utmost tract and coast of Spain, which lieth upon the Ocean and Gades, was hitherto unacquainted with the Romans, and therefore fast enough and sure to the Carthaginians. But the other Asdrubal and Mago, were of another mind, and agreed in this, That Scipio with his favours and benefits had possessed the affections and hearts of all men already, both in general, and also in particular, and that there would never be an end of sliding from them, and siding to the Romans, before that all the Spanish souldiers were either removed into the farthest parts of Spain, or conveyed over into France. And therefore albeit the Senar of the Carthaginians had not granted out any such aid and commission, yet there was no remedy, but that Asdrubal must go over into Italy, where Annibal was the head of the war, and in whom lay the main chance of all: by which means also he might withdraw out of Spain all the Spaniards, far enough from the naming and hearing of Scipio. For Asdrubal his army, as well by daily falling away and revolting to Scipio, as also by the late defeat much empaired, was to be replenished again with new souldiers. Moreover, that Mago should deliver his army to Asdrubal the son of Gisco, and himself in person cross over into the Baleares Islands, with a great sum of money, to wage new aids and succours from thence. And that Asdrubal the son of Gisco, with his army should retire farther up into Portugal, and not encounter the Romans at all in any hand. And that out of all the Cavalry there should be chosen out the very flower and strength, to the full number of 3000. for Masaniissa, and that he should range and overrun all the higher Province of Spain, partly to help the distressed Allies, and partly to spoil the enemies towns, and forrage their lands. After these orders and directions let down, the Generals departed shunder to the execution of their determined designments. Thus yeice what were the affairs and occurrences of Spain for that year.

At Rome the fame of Scipio grew greater every day then other. Fabius for the winning of Tarentum, albeit he gat it rather by craft and policy, then by force and vertue, was glorious therefore. The name of Fulvius began to age and decay. Marcellus grew also into an ill name and some obloquy, both for that at first he had a foil, and also because he suffered Annibal to range over Italy at his pleasure, and himself at mid-summer had retired his souldiers to Venusia to take up there (as it were) their winter quarters. He had a fore adversary in the City, one C. Publius Bibulus, a Tribune of the Commons: who from the very first time of that discomfiture, with continual speeches and Orations brought Claudius into hatred and animosity with the common people, and now was in hand with them to deprive him of his government. Howbeit, the friends and kinsfolk of Claudius obtained thus much, That Marcellus leaving his Lieutenant at Venusia, should repair to Rome for to make his purgation, and acquit himself of such crimes as his adversaries objected and laid against him: and that during his absence, they should not treat nor debate about his deprivation.

It happened much about one time, that both Marcellus came to Rome (to meet with the shameful slander that ran on him, and to save his honour) and also Q. Fulvius the Consul, about the new election for the year following. The question touching the government of Marcellus, was debated and handled in the lists or Circus, called Flaminianus: and a great assembly there was, and much concourse of the Commons, and of people of all degrees and calling. The Tribune accused not Marcellus only, but all the nobility: by whole fraudulent practise, and by whole cold and deloyal proceedings, it was come to pass, that Annibal now these ten years had remained in Italy (as it were) in his province continually, where he had had led a greater part of his life, then at Carthage in his native country. And now (quoth he) the people of Rome taste the fruit, proceeding of presuming and continuing of government still in one person. For see what is come of it: Marcellus his army hath been twice defeated and fallen upon the enemies sword, and now, forsooth, is housed in Venusia for sun-burning. But Marcellus to confuted this acculatory speech of the Tribune, by recounting his own worthy noble acts: that not only the Bill preferred for the deposing him out of his room, was disannulled, and the neck of it broken, but also the next day after, all the Centuries with one general voice created him Consul. There was joined with him companion in government L. Quintius Crispinus, who then was Pretor. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit P. Lucius Calpurnius Piso, who was at that time the Arch-bishop, P. Licinius Stans, Sex. Julius Celer, and Q. Claudius Flamen.

During the time of this solemn Parliament or Session for the election of Magistrates, the City was much disquieted for the revolt of Hetruria: C. Calpurnius who ruled that province as Pretor, had by his letters given notice that the beginning thereof arose from the Aurunci: and therefore immediately M. Marcellus the Consul elect, was further sent with commission, to look into the matter, and (if he thought it requisite) to lend for his forces, and to translate the war out of Apulia into Umbria. For fear whereof, the Umbrians paid in their hearts, and were quiet.

The Tarentine Embassadors made suit for peace, and that together with their freedom they might enjoy their own laws. And this answer was returned by the Senar, That they should come again when Fabius the Consul was returned to Rome. The Roman Games, and also the plays called

For none might be Tri-bun or Edile, whose Father was living.

A called Plæbii, were exhibited that year, and renned one day speece more then ordinary. The Ediles of the chair were L. Cornelius Caudinus, and Servilius Sulpicius Galba; but those of the Commons were C. Servilius, and Q. Cecilius Metellus. As for Servilius, it was denied, that he had been Tribun of the Commons before, or now Edile by right and order of law, because it was now for certain known, that his father (of whom the opinion went currant for ten years that he was slain by the Boians about Mutina, at what time as he was Triumvir for the divilion of lands) was now living, and in the hands of the enemies in slavery and bondage.

In the eleventh year of the Punick war, M. Marcellus entered his consulship the fifth time (to you reckon upon that Consulship which he never bare through, because there was an error committed in his creation) and with him T. Quintius Crispinus. To both Consuls the Province of Italy was assigned, and both armies of the Consuls the former year. There was a third army then at Venusia, whereof M. Marcellus had the conduct. Of these three, they were to chuse two, which they would; and the third remaining, was to be committed unto him, who was by lot to have the government of Tarentum, and the Salernins. The rest of the Provinces were thus divided amongst the Pretors. P. Licinius Varus had the jurisdiction civil, and P. Licinius Crassus (then Pontifex Max.) that of the fortaignets, and to go whither soever the Senat should think good to send him. Unto Sex. Julius Caesar befell Sicily, and to Q. Claudius Flamen the City of Tarentum. Q. Fulvius Flaccus had his commission renewed, to continue in government for one year longer; and he was appointed to govern Capua, which had been the charge of T. Quintius the Pretor, and to have under his hand the command of one legion. Likewise C. Hostilius Tubulus remained still in office, and that as Pro-pretor he should succeed C. Calpurnius, and have the conduct of two legions. Moreover, L. Veturius Philo had his authority & government confirmed to him anew, that as Pro-pretor he should sit Lord Deputy in the same province of France, and have the same two legions as before, when he was Pretor there. The like decree that was granted for L. Veturius, passed also in the Senat for C. Aurunculeius, and a bill was propounded unto the people for the proroguing and continuance of his office, who as Pretor ruled the Province of Sardinia with the strength of two Legions. And for the defence and guard of the said Province he had an addition of fifty ships of war, which P. Scipio had sent out of Spain. P. Scipio likewise and M. Syllanus, held still, by vertue of a decree, their provinces of Spain, and commanded the same armies for one year longer. As for Scipio, he had direction to send over into Sardinia fifty ships, out of those eighty which he had under his hand, either taken with him out of Italy or won from the enemy at Carthage, because there ran a rumor, that there was great preparation at Carthage for a navy that year, and that the Carthaginians would take up, and fill all the sea coast of Italy, Sicily and Sardinia, with an Armado of two hundred sail. In Sicily the government was divided in this manner, Sex. Julius Caesar had the leading of the Cannian army, M. Valerius Messius (for his government also was confirmed for a year longer) the charge of that fleet of seventy ships, which rid about Sicily: with commission to add thereto those thirty ships which the former year lay before Tarentum; and with this Armado consisting of one hundred sail, to put over into Africk, if he thought so good, and thereto forrage and fetch booties. Over and besides, P. Sulpicius was for one year longer to continue in office, and to govern the provinces of Macedonia and Greece, with the force of the said Navy which he had before. As touching the two legions which remained about the City of Rome, there was no alteration. Only the Consuls were permitted to levy, and enroll a new supply as need should require. Thus the Empire and State of Rome for that year was maintained with the power of 21. legions. P. Licinius for the Pretor of the City, was charged to repair those thirty old ships, which lay at Holstia, and to furnish them with new hulk, with sailers and mariners, that with this Armado of fifty sail he might be able to defend all the sea coast neer unto the City of Rome. C. Calpurnius was forbidden to remove his place from Arretium, before a successor came in his place. The same order was given to Tatius, and to have especially a vigilant eye, that no commotion arose from thence. And then the Pretors went into their provinces.

F As for the Consuls they were troubled, inward and made some scruple of conscience to go to their provinces, upon the report of some prodigious and ominous signs; and because also in their sacrifices they found not the gods to be propitious and favorable unto them. For out of Campania news came, that in Capua two Temples, one of Ferens and Mens, and also some Tombs and Sepulchers, were haunted with lightnings, and besides (beside on win, and preposterous superstition, impute even the least trifling thing to the hand of God) that certain Mice, forsooth, in a Chappel of Jupiter gnawed the gold. Also that in Capua, a great swarm of Bees settled in the very market place. Moreover, that the Walls and roof of the Gates of Holstia was blasted and stricken with lightning. That in Arretia a Gripe fell into the Church of Jupiter. That at Holstia, there was a Pool flowed with blood. In regard of these strange and wondrous tokens, there was a devout supplication for one day. And for certain days together, greater beasts were killed for sacrifices, without any good token; and for a long time the grace and favour of the gods could nor be obtained. For yet the fortune of the Commonwealth stood still upright, and all this anger and mischief was moved by those monstrous sights upon the head of the Consuls alone; and their death executed all the rest. The Playes called Atellares in the year of Q. Fulvius and Q. Claudius Consuls had been by A. Corneli, Sulla Pretor of the City, first exhibited; after whom all the Pretors, even after did the like. But they moved them a year before, and performed them on a day uncertain. The same year happened a grievous plague both in the City and in the Counties about, which

yet in the end turned rather to long and chronick diseases, then to sharp and deadly maladies. For this pestilence there was not only toleman going in procession, in all the high streets, carters, and cross ways throughout the City: but also P. Lucinius Varrus Pretor of the City, was commanded to propound unto the people, that the Playes above said should be vowed for ever against a set and determinat day. Himself therefore was the first that vowed them, and exhibited them upon the third day before the Nones of July, and the same day ever after was observed and kept holiday for that purpose.

5 day of July.

As the rumor of the Aretins revolt encreased dayly greater, so the L.L. of the Senat were careful about it every day more then other. Letters therefore were sent unto C. Hostilius, that he should without delay take pledges of the Arentines: and C. Terentius Varrus was sent with commission, to receive the said hostages at his hands, and to bring them to Rome. He was no sooner come, but Hostilius presently commanded that one legion, which lay in camp before the town, should enter the City with banner displayed, and there he put sufficient guards in places convenient. Then having called and summoned the Senators to appear in the market place, he demanded of them hostages. And when the Senat requested but two days respite to consider of the matter, he made proclamation, that either they should deliver them presently, or else the next day he would seize upon all the Senators children every one. Then he commanded the Colonels, the Captains of the Allies, and the Centurions, to ward the Gates, that none might go forth of the City by night. But this was Hackly and negligently executed, for seven principal Senators, before the warders were set at the gates, escaped forth with their children before night. The morrow morning by break of day, when the Senat began to be cited into the Common Hall, these parties were missed, and their goods confiscat, and sold in port-sale. Of the rest of the Senators, their children were taken hostages to the number of 120. and were delivered to C. Terentius, for to be conveyed to Rome: who when he was come into the Senat, made such relation of the matter, that the suspicion of their revolt was much more pregnant then before. And therefore, as if some insurrection had like presently to grow from Tuscany, C. Terentius himself was commanded to conduct one of the two legions about the City of Rome, unto Aretium, and there to lie in garrison with it for to keep the town in order. And it was thought meet that C. Hostilius with the army besides, should survey and visit the whole Province, and to be careful and circumspect, that no occasion nor opportunity might be given unto them, that were minded to seek alteration and to rebel. C. Terentius so soon as he was come to Aretium with the legion, when he called unto the Magistrates for the keys of the gates, and they made answer that they were but miscast aside and could not be found: supposing that they were rather carelessly laid out of the way for the nonce, than lost by negligence, caused other keyes and locks to be made, and set upon every gate and took as great heed and care as he could, to have all under his own hand. He gave especial warning also to Hostilius as touching the Tuscans, and told him, that he should never hope to rest in security, that they would not rebel, unless he took order with them beforehand, that they possibly could not rebel.

After this, there was much debate and contention in the Senat about the Tarentines, even before Fabius, whilst himself excused and defended them whom he had conquered and subdued by force and arms: but others were mightily offended with them, yea, and most of them gave out plaint, that they were full as faulty as the Campanians, and deserved no less punishment. And so there was an act of the Senat granted according to the opinion and advice of M. Acilius, that the town should be held with a garrison, and all the Tarentines kept from stirring out of the City: and that the matter should further be debated and decided when another time, when the state of Italy stood in better terms of peace and quietness. And the like contention and variance was among the L.L. of the Senat touching M. Lepidus Constable and Captain of the Castle of Tarentum, whilst some were of mind to condemn him as in great fault, because through his carelessness and folly, Tarentum the City was betrayed to the enemy: others again awarded him good consideration and reward, for that he kept the fort so well by the space of five years, and by his means especially and by none else Tarentum was recovered. But some were of opinion between these and that, that the discussing and determination of that matter pertained properly to the Censors and not to the Senat: of which judgement Fabius also himself was. And this moreover he said withal, that he must needs confess, that true it was, which Lepidus his friends in the Senat stood so much upon, and iterated so often, namely, that he was the only man that Tarentum was recovered: for in good faith, quoth he, it never could have been regained, if it had not once been lost before.

T. Quintius Crispinus one of the Consuls, went to the army which Q. Fabius Pictor had with a new supply into the Lucans country. But Marcellus still was laid behind, upon occasion of new scruples of conscience, and sundry objects that troubled his mind, and kept a hammering in his head one after another. Amongst which, this was one, that having vowed in the Gauls war at Clasidium, a Temple to Honor and Fortus: the dedication of the said Church was hindered by the Bishops, who said, that one Chappel, by right and according to their ceremonies, served but for one Saint, and could not be consecrated unto more. For in case it should be blasted and smitten by fire from heaven, or otherwise some prodigious token hap therein, hardly could the right expiation and purging thereof be performed, because it might not be known, to which of the saints or gods the sacrifice should be done: for by order one sacrifice could not serve twain, unless there were some particular and especial gods named. So there was said to be another Chappel built

A halibot Pharus and great haff there was made for the rearing thereof, and yet it was not his forantecover to bedicate those chappels. So at length he set forward and put himself on his journey with a supply unto the army which he had left the year before at Venusia.

When Crispinus minded to assault Locri in the country of the Brutians, because there went a great name of Fabi for the affailing and winning of Tarentum, he sent for all kind of artillery and engines out of Sicily, and ships also were brought from thence, for to batter that part of the City that lieth to the Sea side. But the enterprize went not forward, because Annibal had removed, with all his forces to Lucinium. And besides, the news went that his colleague had already brought out his forces from Venusia, with whom he was desirous to joyn. And therefore he returned out of the Brutians country into Apulia: and so between Venusia and Brutia, the Consuls encamped severally, within three miles one from the other. Annibal likewise was retired into the same country, considering that the war was turned from Locri. There the Consuls (hot men of nature both) almost every day led forth their men into the field, not doubting but if Annibal once met them (having two Consular armies joyned together) to make a dispatch of the war once for all. Annibal because the year before, he had twice affronted Marcellus, and both given and taken the foil: like as he had great reason, as well to fear as to hope, if he were to encounter and fight with him alone: so he thought verily, that he was never able to make his part good with both the Consuls together. And therefore laying off his Lyons skin, he took himself wholly to his old Foxes coat, and sought all means and opportunities to lay a train for to encamp them. Howbeit there passed some light skirmishes between both their camps, with variety of fortune and interchangeable success. By which, the Consuls thinking that they should hold out and keep the enemies play, during the summer season, and yet nevertheless be able to assault Locri, wrote unto La Cincius, that he should take the Seas, and cross over with his fleet out of Sicily to the City of Locri. And to the end that the Town might be likewise assailed from the Land side, they commanded part of the army which lay in garrison at Tarentum, to be conducted thither. Annibal having intelligence afore-hand of these things, by certain Thurins, sent forth certain of his forces to bely the wayes from Tarentum. And there under the side of the Petelian mount, he bestowed secretly in ambush two thousand horse, and three thousand foot. Upon whom the Romans (marching without their espials sent afore them) chanced to light, and were slain to the number of two thousand, and upon twelve hundred taken alive: the rest were scattered and fled over the fields and forests back to Tarentum. Now there was a little hill between both the camps of the Carthaginians and Romans, and the same all overgrown with wood, which at first was possessed and kept, neither by one nor other: because the Romans knew not the situation of that side which lay toward the enemies camp: and Annibal supposed verily that it was a place fitter for to lay an ambush than to encamp in: and therefore he sent by night for that purpose, certain troops of Numidians, and bestowed them closely in the mids of the wood, and nor one of them stirred all the day long out of their standings, for fear lest either their armour or themselves might be espied afar off. In the Roman camp, every man generally was of mind, and let not to say, that the said hill was to be seized and fortified for their use, with a good fortress built upon it, for fear lest if it were first gained by Annibal, they should have the enemy as it were over their heads, redy to annoy them. And Marcellus himself was of the same opinion: whereupon, Why go not we ourselves in person (quoth he, to his colleague) with some few horsemen, to view and consider the place, where our eyes shall be our judges: and seeing the ground once, we shall resolve more certainly what course to take. Crispinus liked well of the motion: and so they went forward accompanied with two hundred and twenty horsemen of which forty were Fregellans, the rest all Tuscan. There followed after them, M. Marcellus, the Consul his son, and Aulus Manlius, two Colonels: also L. Arminius and M. Aulus, two Captains of the allies. Some Authors have set down in writing, that Marcellus the Col. sacrificed that day: and when the first beast was killed, the liver was found without an head: howbeit in the second, all things appeared that were wont to be seen. But in the head of that liver there shewed I wot not how, a kind of extraordinary excrecence: which the Soothsayer had no liking to, because after those inwards which seemed before short, unperfect, and misliking: now those again were seen too well fed and overgrown. But the Consul Marcellus was so hot and desirous to fight with Annibal, that he thought himself never encamped near enough unto him. And even then also as he went forth out of the camp, he gave order to his soldiers to be ready at a short warning, and have their eye upon the place: that presently, if he liked the hill, for which they went to view, they should dislodge, truss up bag and baggage and follow presently. Now there was a little flat and plain ground before the camp, from whence the way that led unto the said hill, was on every side very open and evident to the eye:

 where that day a scout or spie, set of purpose to discover any of the enemies gone far from the camp, straggling and ranging abroad either for fowel or forage, that they might be intercepted: and nor for any hope of so great effect as fell out. This fellow gave sign unto the Numidians, that all at once they should arise out of their lurking & hiding holes. And they that from the top & ridge of the hill were to rise & show themselves a front, never appeared & made head, before that they had set a compass about for to strike up the passage at the back of the Romans. And then from all parts they began to start up & with a main shout charged & ran upon them. The Consuls now were in that valley, from whence they neither could possibly get up to the witch of the hill, possessed aforehand by the enemy, nor had any place of safe retreat behind, for that they were environed & hemmed in on every side. Now but they might have maintained skirmish and held once good while, but that the Lucani began to run away and put all the rest in a bodily flight. Yet the Patullians followed as they were of the Tuscans, gave not over but fought manfully. (So long as the Consul stood on foot unhurt) & received the charge of the enemies, encouraging their people, and fighting themselves right valiantly. But when they saw once both their Consuls wounded, and Marcellus also run through with the push of a lance, and falling from his horse ready to die: then they were (and few of them God was remained alive) together with the Consul Crispinus (who was wounded with two javelins) and young Marcellus, who was himself also fore him, fled away and escaped. There were slain in this skirmish, A. Manlius a Colonel, of the two Captains of allies, M. Anibal was killed out-right and L. Arminius taken prisoner. As for the Lieutenants belonging the Consuls, five of them then fell alive into the hands of the enemies: the rest were put to the sword, or escaped with the Consul. So there were three and forty horsemen died either in the conflict, or in the flight, and eighteen taken prisoners. In the camp there was much ado, and crying out for to go and succour the Consuls, when they saw one of them, and the other his son grievously hurt, and the poor remnant of that unfortunate expedition coming toward the camp. The death of Marcellus was much pitied, and lamented in many other respects, but for this especially: that he, a man of this age (for he was now above threescore years old) and who should have had more wit, an old Captain and Leader (I say) that should have had more wisdom and foresight, so unadvisedly had brought both his colleague together with himself, and also in manner the whole commonwealth into so desperate a danger. I should make much circumstance, and fetch many turns and compasses about one point, if I would rehearse all that writers have diversely set down, as touching the death of Marcellus. But to let all others go, L. Calpurnius delivereth the thing three manner of ways: the one by hearsay only, and a general report: the other extant in an Oration of the praise of Marcellus, penned by his own son, that was himself present at the action: the third, which Calpurnius himself adderth upon his own knowledge, and after diligent enquiry into the matter. But howsoever the voice and fame varieth in some circumstances, most of them jump in the narration, That he went forth of the camp to view the place: and all agree of the event, That he was encompassed and so slain. Anibal supposing that the enemies were mightily terrified, as well by the death of the one Consul, as the hurt of the other: because he would take all advantage, and omitted good opportunity offered, forthwith removeth his camp, and pitcheth upon the very hill where he had fought. There he found the corps of Marcellus, and caused it to be entombed. Crispinus, affrighted both at the death of his companion in government, and also at his own hurt received, dislodged in the dead time of the night following, and in the very next morning that he could come into, encamped and fortified himself upon an high ground, and fairly taxed on every side. There the two Generals of both parts beat their brains, and occupied all their wisdome, the one to lay trains, and the other to avoid them. Anibal together with the body of Marcellus, had gotten his ring or sign manual. Crispinus, fearing that Anibal might produce some crafty fetch, and beguile some body by the means of that signet, sent messengers to all the Cities next adjoining, giving them notice, that his brother Consul was slain, and that the enemy had gotten his seal ring, and warning them, that they should give no credit to any letters written in his name, or signed with his seal. This message was not so soon brought to Salapia, but straight after that came letters thither from Anibal, framed and indited in the name of Marcellus to this effect. That he would the next night that immediately followed that present day, be in person at Salapia: willing the garrison soldiers to be in readiness, for to be employed in some service that should be thought needful. The Salapians perceived whereabouts he went, and supposing that it was a perillous plot, whereby Anibal sought some opportunity to be revenged of them and to punish them; for anger, not only that they were revolted from him, but because they had killed his horsemen: they therefore sending the messenger back again, (who was a Roman fugitive and renegade, and had fled from them to Anibal) to the end, that their soldiers might effect that which they were minded to do, without the knowledge of the messenger, and not be eased by him, bestowed all the Townsmen along the walls and in sundry convenient places of the Town, to keep a standing corps de garde. The watch and ward they tended that night very carefully, and about that gate where they supposed the enemy would come, they appoyled the strongest and most able men of all the garrison. Anibal near about the time of the relief of the fourth watch came to the City. In the vanguard marched certain Roman Rebels and Renegates, with Roman armor upon them: who when they were come to the gate, called up the watch, and bade all to let in upon them, willing them to let the gates open, for that the Consul was come. The watchmen making semblance as if they were roused and awakened at their call, began to beat it themselves, to make hast with much ado, as busy as ever they might be. The Port-cullis which had been let down a good yet that, then they began somewhat to heave and to weigh it from the ground with levers & poles, whereto draw it up with ropes unto that height, that men might go upright under it. The passage was scarcely made open, as yet wide enough, when the fugitive traitors came rushing in at the gate upon them, having who might come first. And when there were almost 600 of them got in, thereore made to go, at which the port-cullis hung as it fell down with a mighty noise. The Salapians then coming upon the fugitive Romans, shewd laid carrying their armor loosely and foolishly, having upon them no orderly, as well as their own faring soldiers in a peaceable country of their friends, so that the turn of the game putted the traitors with stones, & pushed them with A with punction poles, or with darts and javelins flew them. So Annibal caught in his own snares, was fain to depart.

He went from thence to Iery and raise the siege before Locri, which Town Cincius beleaguered streightly, and assaulted most forcibly, having raised fabricks about it, and planted all kind of engines, artillery, and ordnance against it, which were brought thither out of Syrily. Mago who began already to distrust that he should not be able to defend and keep the City, conceived now the first hope of better, when he heard once of the death of Annibal. And then there came also a messenger with news, That Annibal having sent afore him the horsemen of the Numidians, followed after himself in person, as fast as he could, with the power of the footmen. And therefore so soon as he perceived, by a sign given from the hill tops, that the Numidians approached, himself at once let the gate open, and suddenly sallied forth upon the enemy with great violence. At the first the skirmish was doubtful, more because he came upon them at unawares, than for that he was equal to match them in strength; but afterwards, when the Numidians charged them besides, the Romans were so terrified that they fled here and there in every place to the sea and their ships, leaving their fabricks and engines wherewith they had shaken and battered the walls. So by the coming of Annibal the siege brake up before Locri.

Crispinus, after he was advertised that Annibal was gone into the Brutians countrey, commanded Marcus Macellus a Colonel or knight Marshal, to lead a way unto Venusia, the army which had been commanded by his Colleague now deceased. Himself went to Capua with the legions, scarce able to endure the thogging and shaking of the horse-litter, for pain and grief of his wounds.

C From whence he wrote letters to Rome, giving notice, That his brother Consul was dead, and in what danger himself was. Signifying also, that he could not himself come unto Rome against the election, because he thought he should not be able to endure the travel of the journey: and besides, he was in great care for Tarentum, lest Annibal from out of the Brutians countrey would turn thither with all his power. Moreover, he gave the Senat to understand, that it was requisite there should be sent as Embassadors or Agents unto him, men of wisdom and discretion, whom he might confer with, and acquaint with his will and mind, as touching State-matters. The reading of these letters, caused them much to lament and mourn for the death of the one Consul, and greatly to fear what would become of the other. Therefore they not only dispatched Q. Fabius the son, unto the army in Venusia, but also sent unto the Consul three commissioners, Sex. Julius Caesar, L. Cincius Pellio, and L. Cincius Alimentus, who but a few days before was returned out of Sicily. These had in commission to signify unto the Consul from the Senat, that in case he were not able himself to come to Rome against the Election, he should nominate within the Roman territory a Dictator for to assemble the people for the said Election: also that their pleasure was, in case the Consul went to Tarentum, that Q. Claudius the Pretor should withdraw his legions from thence unto those parts, whereas he might defend most Cities of the Allies.

In the same summer M. Valerius took the Seas, with a fleet of a hundred sail, and from Sicily passed over into Africa: and having disembarked and landed his men near the City Clupis, wasted the countrey all about, and met no armed men, so speak of, to make head and withstand his invasion. Then these rovers and foragers retired in hast unto their ships, because on a sudden there was a rumour blown abroad, That the punick Armado was coming, consisting of 83 sail. The Roman Admiral fought fortunately with them not far from Clupis. And after he had boarded and taken eighteen of their ships, and put the rest to flight, he returned to Lilybauni, with a rich Land-booty, and much pillage found in the ships.

The same summer Philip also sent aid to the Achaes, that earnestly besought his help: whom not only Macellus the Tyrant of the Lacedaemonians, grievously afflicted with war upon their confines, but also the Aetolians, who having crossed the Straights or narrow Sea, between Thrace and Asia, (which the inhabitants there call Rhinus) and lay over a power of armed men, had spoiled their territory. Moreover, there went a great rumour and speech that Attalus King of Asia the less, would fall over into Europe, because the Aetolians in their last Parliament or general Diet had conferred upon him the sovereignty, magistracy and rule of their nation. For these causes

F Philip came down with a power into Greece, and at the City Lamia, the Aetolians encountered him with their Captain Phylax, who for that year was created Pretor together with Ninus Attalus in his absence. They had in their army certain aid from Asius and almost a thousand Romans one of the Roman Armado sent from P. Scipio. Against this Captain and these forces Philip fought two battails with prosperous success, and in both slew very many of his enemies: and when the Aetolians were driven for fear from thence, into the City of Lamia, and within the walls thereof saved themselves, Philip retired his army into Phalera. This is a place situate in the gulf of Asolus, sometimes much peopled, and frequented for the passing fairhaven, and many good harbours, and safe roads for ships, besides other special commodities as well of Sea as Land. Thither

G repaired sundry Embassadors from diverse parts, to wit, from Antiochus King of Syria, from the Rhodiens, the Athenians, and inhabitants of Chios, and also to treat about a pacification, to take up the war between Rome and the Aetolians. And of neighbour-borders there was in the behalf of the Aetolians as peace-makers, Antiochus King of the Asians. All of them were not so careful and earnest for the Aetolians, who were more fierce, stout and imperious than the Nation of Grecians naturally is: as they laboured this point, that Philip with his Kingly sovereignty, to the prejudice of their liberty hereafter, should not be interested, nor meddle in in the affairs and State of Greece. As concerning peace, the consultation was put off and referred to the general Council of the Achai: and for the said Diet or Council, was a place appointed, and a certain day set down and published. And in the mean space, a truce obtained for thirty dayes.

Then the King departed from thence, and through Thessaly and Boeotia, came to Chalcis in Euboea, for to put by Atalua (whom he heard there to be coming with a navy for Euboea) from arriving in any haven, or landing in any place on the sea coast. Then leaving a guard behind for to withstand Atalua (if haply in the mean season he should chance to pass over) he marched himself forward with some few horsemen and light armed footmen, and came to Argos. There by the suffrages and voices of the people, the honour of exhibiting and celebrating the solemn games, called Herae and Nemeae, was recommended unto him, because the Macedonian Kings give out & say, that they are descended from that City. After he had performed the solemnity of the Herae, presently he went from the very games and pastimes to the Council of his allies long before proclaimed, as is above said. Much debate there was for a small end of the Aeolians war, that neither the Romans nor Atalua might have any occasion to come into Greece. But the Aeolians marked all this before the time of the truce was well expired: by occasion that they heard, that Atalua both was come to Egina, and the Roman navy anchored at Nausipetum. For being called into the Council of the Achai, in which the same Embassies were, who before at Phaleria had treated for peace, first they complained, that some things had been done, during the time of the truce, against the faith of the covenant and accord. But at last they flatly denied and said, That there could not possibly be an end of wars, unless the Achai rendered Pylus unto the Messenians; and peace were granted and restored to the Romans, and likewise to the Achaeans, to Scerdilatus, Plaurinus, and Archides. Whereat Philip was very wroth, and thought it a foul indignity, that conquered persons should take upon them to article and capitulate with him their conqueror. "But neither heretofore (quoth he) gave I audience to the treaty of peace, nor yielded consent to truce up: many hopes I had, that the Aeolians would ever be quiet: but to this end, that all comederate friends might bear witness, that I sought means of peace, and they sought occasions and pick quarrels for war, so without conclusion of any peace, he dissolved the Diet: leaving four thousand soldiers for the defence and guard of the Achaeans, and receiving of them five ships of war, (which if he had joyned to the armada of the Carthaginians, rarely left unto him, and also to those ships which were coming out of Bithynia from King Prusias, he determined to assail the Romans with ship fight, who had a long time been mighty masters of the Seas) himself presently from that Council departed back to Argos: for now the time drew neer of the games Nemeae, which he was desirous to celebrate and honor with his presence. When the King was occupied in the preparation of these games and pastimes, and placed himself during these festival holidayes, with more liberty of mind and repose, than he should in time of war; P. Scipio having loosed from Nausipetum, arrived with his fleet between Sicyone and Corinth, and wasted that goodly territory, most renowned of all other for fruitfulness of all things. The noise and rumor of this occurrence awakened Philip, and caused him to leave his disports: and so he took his Cavalry with him in haste, and set forward, having given order that the Infantry should follow freighted where he found the Romans stragling here and there all over the country, laden with booty and prizes, (as who feared nothing in the World less) set upon them, and drave them to their ships. Thus the Roman fleet nothing well appaid for the booty they had gotten, returned to Nausipetum. And Philip greatly augmented the solemnity and magnificence of the games that were behind, by the same of a victory over the Romans at that time, how much or little (as it is now) And with great joy and mirth were those holy dayes kept: and so much the more, because the King for to please the people withal, laid aside the disdem of his head, put off his purple robes and other princely and royal habitation, and in outward port bare himself equal to others, and so better passing right acceptable and pleasing to free States, as nothing can be more. By which deed of his, he had given great and undoubted hope unto all men, of liberty and freedom: but that he stained and marred all again with his intolerable lust and foolishness of life. For he used to go ranging up and down with one brewer of his favorites in company, and did nothing else but haue suspected himself by the sea side, and in other dissipated manner. And thus by debasing himself to the meanest use of a private person, the less he was suspected and known, the more dissolute he grew: and whilst he pretended unto others a vain shew of freedom, he abused all to his own lasciviousness. Neither paid his parts for all his pleasures, nor with flattering persuasions and fair speeches obtained he his desires: but to accomplish his wickedness, he used oftentimes forcible violence: and dangerous it was both to husbands and parents, to be any thing freighted, and make it good by tedious delay and unreasonable severity, to seem but to stay the unbounded lust and appetite of the King. From one of the Priests also of the Acheans named Aratus, he took his wife away called Polyaratus; and upon hope and tokens of marriage with the King, drew her away with him into Macedonia. Having thus with these lewd and wicked pranks passed the time of the solemnity of the Nemean games, and some few dayes over and above, he went to Dyme for to visit the garrison of the Aeolians, which they had sent for and received into the City [of Dyme] from the Diars, Cyclades (who was the Governor or chief magistrat of that state) and the Achaeans the King at Dyme: who as they hated the Eleans, because they differed from the rest of the Achaeans, so they were maliciously bent against the Aeolians, whom they were persuaded, above all others by many degrees, C. Claudius Nero excelled and was the only Paragon. But a H cooperation with him in the government they were likewise to seek for. As for him, his friends, they deemed him a singular man and brave Captain; but yet more forward and eager, than the quality and occasions of his war required, or to be matched with such an enemy as Antiochus was.

 And therefore they thought good to join with him for his colleague, a sober, wise, and prudent man, who might temper and qualify that fierce nature and disposition of his. Now M. Livius, many years ago had been upon his Consulship condemned by the judgement of the people. Which ignominy and reproach he took so grievously to the heart, that he departed into the country, and for many years together, forsook not only the City, but to converse and keep company with men. And almost eight years after his condemnation aforesaid, M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Valerius Laevinus the Consuls, reduced him again into the City. But he used to go in old and worn apparel, letting the hair of his head and beard grow long, carrying in his very countenance and array, the fresh and notable remembrance of the disgrace before received. But D. Brutus and P. Scipio the Censors, compelled him to cut his hair, and lay away his vile and unkempt weed, to come into the Senate, and to meddle again in civil matters and Affairs of State. And yet in so doing, he would never proceed further, than to say Amen to other men's opinions, and speak but one word, yea and nay; or else nothing at all, but shew his mind by passing on his feet to one side or other. Until such time as a business of his own, M. Livius Marcius, being in trouble, and his name and honour called in question, caused him to stand up in the Council-house and deliver his opinion. And when after so long discontinuance, he was seen and heard once to speak, he turned every man his eye upon him, and ministr'd occasion also of speech in these terms, namely, "That the people had done the man exceeding great wrong, yea, and hurt the common weal-
 " much, in that during the time of so dangerous a war, there had been no employment of so wor" thy a person, either for his travail and pains, or his advice and counsel. But to return again to the Lords of the Senate, they knew well, that neither Q. Fabius, nor M. Valerius Laevinus, could possibly be joynd as companions in government to C. Nero: forasmuch as it was not law-full that both should be chosen out of the Nobles of Patricians. And the same was T. Manlius his case also. Besides that, as he once refused the Consulship when it was offered unto him, so no doubt he would not accept thereof the second time if it were tender'd unto him. But if they should sort Manius Laevinus and C. Claudius together, there would be an excellent example of Consuls indeed. Neither stood the people at this assurance, thus moved first by the Lords of the Senat. The only man in the whole City, that denied it, was the very party himself, unto whom this dignity and honourable place was pretended. Who much blamed the levity and inconstancy of the City, saying, "That they had no pity of him, when it was, namely, while he was in ex-
 " sile and exiled, and during the time of his trouble wore poor and simple garments: for now " against his will, they asked him a glittering, white robe suit'd for a Consulship. This (saith
 " he) they punish and deprecate, they also hope to advance the same person. If they took me " for a good and honest man, why condemned they me as I did, for a wicked one and a guilty?
 " If they found me naughty and faulty, what cause have they to trust me with a second Consulship,
 " who used the former so badly, which was committed unto me? As he argued and made com" plaints in this wise, the Lords of the Senat reproved him, and replied again: setting before his " eyes the example of M. Fannius, who in times past was called home out of exile: and when the " state was decayed and lying along, set it upright again in her former place and pristine glory.
 " And like as the cruelty and rigor of punishment, is to be mollified by pity, even so the hard-
 " and shrewd dealings of a mans country, is to be dulced and mitigated by bearing and sufferance.
 So they all stuck close together, and chose M. Livius Consul, with C. Claudius. Three dayes after, they went to the election of the Pretors. And there were created Pretors, L. Porcius Cato, Caius Manlius, A. Hostilius, and C. Hostilius, both Cato's. When the election was finished, and the games celebrated, the Dictator and General of the Cavalry surrendered their places, C. Terentius Varro was sent into Hispania as Pro-pretor, to the end that out of that province, C. Hostilius should go to Tarentum, unto that army which T. Quinctius the Cons. had. That L. Manlius should go beyond Seas as Ambassador, to see how the world went there: And whilst considering this in summer, there were to be solemnized the famous games at Olympia, which were celebrated with a most frequent resort and meeting of all Greeks, in case he might safely and without impeachment of the enemy, he should visit that great assembly: to the end that if he could light upon any Hel-lians, who were fled and banished their country, or any citizens of Tarentum, confined in their and sent away by Antiochus, they should repair home again into their own countries; and know, that whatsoever they were possessed of, before the wars began, the people of Rome would restore the same, and make good again unto them.

Because it was like to be a right dangerous year, and no Consuls were invested fully in the Common weal, all men depended upon the Consuls elect, and were desirous that they should with all speed, call lots for their Provinces: and every man was willing to know beforehand, what Province each one should rule, and what enemy he was to deal withal. Moreover, a motion and speech there was in the Senat-house, that the Consuls should be reconciled and made friends, and Q. Fabius Max. propounded that first. For there had been notorious enmity and variance between them aforesaid, and the calamity of Livius made the same more grievous and un-portable unto himself; in regard that he was perswaded, how in that misery of his, he was despised

A despised of his adversary. Whereupon he grew to be more implacable of the twain, and worse to be intreated. "There needs (quoth he) no reconciliation neither is it material and to any purpose. For they will do all with more diligence and better spirit, who ever stand in fear that their adversary and concurrent shall grow great and be advanced by their default. Yet the authority of the Senat baze such a stroke with them, that they laid aside all malice and old grudge, and with one mind, consent and counsel, admitted the affairs of the common weal. Their Provinces were not intermingled, nor their government extended into one another's country, as in former years, but, distant asunder and divided by the remote frontiers and farthest marches of Italy. For unto one of them were assigned the Brutians and Lucans country against Annibal: unto the other, Gallia against Asdrubal: who as the rumour and bruit went, was come forward neer unto the Alpes.
 B Of those two armies which were in Gallia and in Hetruria, he whose fortune was to go into Gallia, was to chuse which army he would and have besides that other of the City. And he whose lot should be to go into the Brutians country, besides the new legions entolled of citizens, was to take unto him, the army of whether Consul he list, of the former year. Also Quintius Fabius the Pro-consul had the charge of that army which the Consul refused: and his authority was renewed for one year longer. As for C. Hostilius, whose Province Tarentum they exchanged for Hetruria, they altered his Province again, to wit, Capua instead of Tarentum. Unto him was allowed that one legion which Fulvius the last year commanded.

Now increased their care every day more than other, concerning the coming of Asdrubal into Italy. And the Embassadors of the Massilians had brought news hirt, that he was passed over into Gallia: and that the minds of the Gauls were mightily cheered up by his coming, because the speech went, that he had brought a huge deal of gold with him, for to hire and wage souldiers for aid in the wars. Then afterwards, Sax. Amisius, and M. Ravius, who were sent Embassadors back with them from Rome, for to see whether it were so indeed, had made relation unto the Senate, that they had sent certain of purpose guided by the Massilians, who by means of their especial friends, the Princes and Lords of the Gauls, might learn the trnth, and bring word back accordingly. By whose report it was for certain known, that Asdrubal having levied already a puissant army, was minded the next spring to passe over the Alps: and that there was nothing else staied him, but that it had been done already, saving only the passages of the Alps, which were closed up with the winter snow.

D In the room of M. Marcellus, L. Aquilius Patus was created Augur, and so consecrated. And likewise Cn. Cornelius Dolabella was inaugurat or installed King of the sacrifices, instead of Marcus Manlius, who died two years before. In this very same year the City was purged, and there was a general survey and numbering of the people, by the Censortaken, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. There were reckoned and entred into the Censors books of Citizens, 137108. A smaller number by much ods, than before the war. It is recorded in the Annals, that this year first after that Annibal came into Italy, the Comitium was built over head and covered. And that the Roman Games were once renewed by the Ediles of the chair, Q. Metellus, and C. Servilius: and that the other Games called Plebeii, were renewed two dayes by Q. Manlius, and M. Caecilius Metellus, Ediles of the Commons: who also offered three images and let them up in the Chappel of Ceres. And the solemn festival dinner of Jupiter was celebrated by occasion of those Games.

Then C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the second time, entered their Consulship: who (because while they were but Cossi, elect, they had cast lots for their Provinces) commanded the Pretors to do the like. And to C. Hostilius fell the jurisdiction over the citizens, who had that likewise over strangers and foreigners: to the end, that the other three might go forth into their Provinces. To A. Hostilius was allotted Sardinia: to C. Manlius, Sicilia; and to L. Porcius France. In sum, the legions were in number three and twenty, divided into the Provinces in this sort: to wit, the Consuls had two apiece, Spain four. The three Pretors for Sicily, Sardinia, and France each of them twain. C. Terentius in Hetruria commanded two. Q. Fulvius in the Brutians contry, other two. Q. Claudius about Tarentum, and the Salentins conquered twain: and Caius Hostilius Turbulus at Capua, one. Last of all, two were entolled for the City. In the four first legions, the people chose all the Colonels or Marshals; but to all the rest the Consuls sent new, to make up the defect.

Before the Consuls went forth there was a Novendial sacrifice celebrated because at Vest it had rained stones from heaven. And after one prodigious sight was once minded and spoken of, there were (as it is commonly seen) others also reported: namely, that in Minerva the temple of Jupiter, and the sacred grove of Maria was smitten with lightning: and at Atella the wall and gate likewise, was blasted with fire from Heaven. The men of Minerva spake also of a more fearful and terrible thing than that, to wit, that there ran a river of blood in their very gate. Last of all, at Capua a Wolf entred the gate at night, and worried and dismembred one of the watchmen.

C These wonderful signs were expiate with sacrificing of greater beasts, and a supplication was holden for one day, by virtue of a decree from the Prelats. Then was the Novendial sacrifice once again renewed, because it was seen, that in Arministrum it rained stones. And mens minds were no sooner freed of one religious scruple, but they were troubled again with another. For word was brought, that at Frusino there was an infant born as big as ordinary a child is at four years of age. And the thing was not so strange for the bigness of the body, as for that it was born doubtful, whether it were male or female, like as two years before, at Sinuessæ. The wifards that were sent for out of Hetruria, said, that this of all other was a foul and filthy monster, and that it should be had forth of the Dominion of Rome, and drowned in the deep, so as it might touch no ground: Whereupon they put it alive into a coffer, and when they had carried it a good way into the Sea, they flung it in. Moreover the Prelats made a decret, that certain Virgins in three companies, having nine apiece, should go through the City, and sing certain Canticles. And whiles in the Temple of Jupiter Stator, the Maidens were a learning their song by heart, devised and framed in verbe by Livius the Poet, the Temple of Queen Juno in the Aventine hill, was stricken with lightning from Heaven. And when the Aruſpices had declared that this prodigious token touched the matrons and dames of the City, and that the goddess was to be pacified with an oblation: they were (by vertue of an edict granted out by the Adiles of the chair) called all into the Capitol, as many as had any house, either in the City of Rome, or within ten miles every way. And they among themselves chose five and twenty, into whose hands all the rest should put some small portion of their dowry. Of which there was made a fair and large golden basin, for to be presented unto Juno: and it was brought into the Aventine; and withal, the dames offered unto her purely and chastly their sacrifices. And straight after the Decemvirs proclaimed a day for another sacrifice of the same goddess, the manner and order whereof was this: There were two white heifers led from the Temple of Apollo into the City, through the gate Carmentalis: after them were carried two Images, representing Juno, made of Cypres wood: then went there seven and twenty Virgins in long ſide garments, chanting hymns and songs to the honour of Juno. These songs in verbe were peradventure commendable, and passed for good with those rude and groſs wits then living: but if they should be rehearsed now a dayes to our fine heads, they would seem but simple stuff, and composed without rime or reason. After this row of Maidens, followed the Decemvirs deputed for sacred Ceremonies, with chaplets and garlands of Baies, clothed in vesture and robes embrodered with purple. From the gate above named, they passed by the street Jugarius into the Grand-place, and there rested this solemm pomp and train. Then these Virgins taking hold of a cord, which went through all their hands, sung a song, and danced the measures, footing it artificially according to the note. From thence they went by the Tuscan-street and Pelabrum through the beasts market, and so forward into the Clivus Publicus, until they came to the Temple of Juno. There the Decemvirs sacrificed two beasts, and the Images of Cypres wood were offered and set up in the Temple. When the Gods and Goddesses were duly pacified, the Consuls took musters more ſtreightly and with greater preciseness, than any man could remember in former years. For both the fear of the war was two-fold, by reason of a new-come enemy into Italy, and also there was less store of youth, out of which the souldiers should be enrolled. Whereupon they compelled the inhabitants of the Colonies by the Sea side, who were said to have an especial immunity of warfare (by a sacred law) for to find souldiers: and when they denied, and stood upon their priviledge of exemption, they set them down a certain day, upon which every man should repair into the Senate, and shew what cards they had for their immunity and vacation. Upon the day appointed there presented themselves before the Senat these Commonalties following, to wit, of Hostia, Alſia, Antium, Anagnin, Minturna Sinuessæ, and Sena from the upper Sea. When every one of these States exhibited and read their charter of immunity, there was none of all them dispensed with, but they of Antium and Hostia, in regard the enemy abode in Italy: and so the young and serviceable men of those Colonies, were put to their oath and ſware, that not above forty of them should lie one night forth of the walls of their Colony, so long as the enemy continued in Italy.

When all the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that the Consuls were to go forth to the wars with all speed possible (for that both Asdrubal was to be encountered coming down the Alps, for fear he should sollicite the Gauls on this side the Alps: and the Tuscans likewise who hoped and looked every day for a change and alteration: and also Annibal was to be kept occupied in his own war, that he might not go forth of the Brutians country, and meet with his brother) only Livius made some stay and drew back, as reposing but small trust in the armies belonging to his own Provinces. And as for his Colleague, well he wist, that he had the choise of two notable Consular armies, and of a third, whereof Q. Claudius had the charge at Tarentum. Whereupon he had made some motion of calling the Volones [or voluntaries] again to their colours, and to serve in the wars. The Senat granted the Consuls a large and free commission, both to make supply from whence soever they would, by chusing out of all the armies whom they pleased, and to make exchange with whom they would, yea, and to draw out of the Provinces whomsoever, according as they should think it good for the Common-weal. And all this was executed with the exceeding concord and unity of the Consuls. The Volones were enrolled into the nineteenth and twentieth legions. Some Authors have written, that Scipio sent unto Livius from out of Spain, a strong power of auxiliaries for that war, to wit, eight thousand of Spaniards and Frenchmen, two thousand legionary footmen, and eighteen hundred men of arms, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards: and that Marcus Lucretius brought these forces by Sea: also that C. Manlius sent out of Sicily four thousand archers and slingers.

The fear and troubles in Rome were much increased, by occasion of letters sent out of Gallia from L. Porcius the Pretor: purporting thus much, That Asdrubal was removed out of his wintering harbours, and was passing over the Alps: that there were eight thousand Ligurians levied

A levied and ready in arms, to joyn with him so soon as ever he was come into Italy, unless some one were sent against the Ligurians, to prevent and keep them otherwise busied with war. As for himself, he would with that weak army that he had, go forward, as far as he thought he might with safety. These letters caused the Consuls to dispatch the musters in great hast, and to go forth into their Provinces, sooner than they had purposed: with this intent, that both of them as well the one as the other, might in his several province keep the enemies occupied, and suffer them not to joyn, and lay their forces together. And verily the thing that helped them most in this their designment, was an opinion and persuasion that Annibal had: For albeit he was assured that his brother would that summer pass over into Italy, yet when he called to remembrance what a toil he had himself, and how much trouble and travail he endured in the passage, one while of the river Rhodanus, another while of the mountains of the Alps, and how for the space of five moneths together, he was forced not only to fight with the people, but struggle also with the difficulties of the places, he never looked that Asdrubal could so easily and so speedily pass over as he did: which was the cause that he dislodged out of his wintering places so much the later. But Asdrubal found better expedition, and all things more easy and speedy than either himself hoped for, or others expected. For the Arverni, and other nations (by their example) both of France and also about the Alps, not only received and entertained him, but also accompanied him to the war. Over and besides, as he conducted his army by those passages which were prepared and made open by his brothers journey, and had been afortime unpassable wilds and craggy fags: so against his coming, the Alps were much more easy, by reason of twelve years continual passage to and fro those wayes: and the nature of the peasants more civil and tractable. For the people before, being not used to any strangers and aliens, nor accustomed to see passengers or travellers coming into those parts, were in manner unfociable, savage and wild, and could not away with the society of men. And at the first not knowing whether Annibal intended to go, they supposed that he came for to surprize their holds in caves and rocks, to take their fortresses, and to drive away their people and carry all as booties. But afterwards, the same that went of the Panick war (wherewith now twelve years Italy was plagued and vexed) had taught them sufficiently, that the Alps were nothing but the way for the Carthaginians to travail through. And by this time well they knew, that two most puissant Cities and States, divided and removed one from another by a great space of Land and Sea between, strived together and warred for their greatness and Sovereignty. Upon these occasions, Italy, the Alps were open and passable to Asdrubal with ease. But look what time he gained by speedy journey, the same he lost again by stay about Placentia, while he lay there in vain, rather besieging than assailing it. He was carried away with a persuasion, that the Town seated upon a plain and champaign country, might soon be forced and won: and the great name that went of that noble Colony, induced him to believe, that by the overthrow and rasing of that City, he should strike a terror to all the rest. But in lying against that Town, he not only hindered himself much, but also staid Annibal, who having heard that he was passed over the Alps, and come down into Italy, so much sooner than he looked for, was upon the point to dislodge out of his standing wintering camp, for he considered and cast in his mind, not only what a long and tedious piece of work it is to besiege and assault Cities, but also well remembered how himself after his victory at Tekia, assailed to force that colony in his return from thence, but might not prevail.

The Consuls being departed from the City, and gone divers wayes as it were for two hundred wars at once, distracted mens minds with many cares and troublous imaginations, as well in remembrance of those losses and overthrows, which they had received at Annibal his first coming: as also in thinking, what gods should be so propitious and favourable to the City and empire of Rome, as to prosper the affairs of the State and Common-wealth, at one time in both places. For until then, their success had been variable and alternative; and their prosperity always delayed with temblable adversity: and again, their losses were recompensed with equal gains. For when in Italy the Common-wealth of Rome went one way downward headlong to the ground at Thrasymenus and Cannae: the fortune wars another way in Spain, let it upright a gain. Afterwards, when in Spain one overthrow and defeat happened in the neck of another, at what time as two noble Captains were slain, and two valiant armies in part destroyed, the happy and lucky hand in Sicily and Italy, made up those breaches, and set the reeling state on foot again. For why? the very distance of the place so far remote (because one of the wars was maintained in the farthest part of the World) yielded time and respite to breath themselves and gather new strength. But now, two wars at once are entertained within Italy, two most brave warriors and renowned Captains enclose between them the City of Rome: all dangers come huddle together, all the heavy load and whole burden beareth upon one and the self-same place: and no doubt, but whether of those two Captains first shall get a victory, he will within few dayes after joyn his forces to the other. The fresh and lamentable remembrance also of the very last year, wherein two Consuls lost their lives, mightily strighted the hearts of the people. So as, in these perplexities and troubles of mind, they accompanied the Consuls as they departed and went into their several Provinces. It is more over in some records found, that when Q. Fabius advised and warned M. Livinus being upon his journey toward the wars, not rashly and hand over head to give battail to the enemy, before he knew his nature and qualities, he full of anger still and discontentments with his fellow citizens, made this answer, That so soon as ever he could have a sight of his enemies army, he would fight: and being asked again, why he would make such hast? Mary (quoth he) either shall I by victory of mine H enemies win singular honor and renown: or by the overthrow of my fellow Citizens gain some hearts: ease and contentment; if not honest in all respects, yet at least-wise such as they have deserved.

Before that Claudius the Consul was come into his Province, C. Hostilius Tubulus accompanied with certain cohorts lightly appointed, encountred Annibal as he led his army and matched by the utter confines and marches of the territory of Lavinum, which leadeth to the Salentins; and charging upon his disordered army, put them to great trouble, slew four thousand of his men, and carried away nine Ensigns. Q. Claudius who had certain garrisons planted in all the Cities of the Salentins country, hearing of the enemies coming, had removed out of his wintering camp and therefore Annibal, because he would not fight with two armies at once, by night dislodged out of the territory of Tarentum, and withdrew himself into the Brutians country: and Claudius turned with his army to the Salentins again. Hostilius in the way to Capua, met with the Consul Claudius at Venusia. There, out of both armies, the Consul picked forth forty thousand choise Footmen, and 2500 Horsemen, for to war with Annibal. The rest of the forces Hostilius was commanded to lead unto Capua, and to deliver them to Q. Fabius the Pro-consul.

Annibal having assembled his forces from all parts, as well those which he had in camp during winter time, as those that lay in garrison in the Brutians country, came as far as Grumentum in the territory of the Lucans, upon hope to recover the Towns, which for fear, had revolved to the Romans. Unto the same place the Roman Coss. making out his espials before to discover and clear the wayes, marched from Venusia, and about a mile and half from the enemy, K encamped himself. The Carthaginians had fortified themselves, and cast a trench close in a manner to the walls of Grumentum: and between the camp and the Romans was some half mile. A plain lay in the midst: and on the left hand of the Carthaginians, and the right hand of the Romans all along between, the hills overlooked them, bare and naked, and of neither part suspected, by reason that they had no wood growing upon them, nor any lurking places to hide an ambush in. Into the plain between they used to put out certain bands and companies from the Corps de guard of both sides, and made light skirmishes not worth the talking of. And it seemed that the drift of the Roman Consul was to keep the enemy in, and not to suffer him to go his wayes. But Annibal desirous to be gone, entered the field with all his power in order of bat-tail. Then the Consul borrowing a little of his enemies cunning, for that in so open hills there was less fear and suspicion of ambush, gave order that five Cohorts and Horsemen, reinforced with as many bands of footmen, should by night get over those hills, and in the Vallies behind, sit down closely: with direction to T. Claudius Asellus a Colonel of footmen, and P. Claudius a Captain of allies whom he sent to conduct them, as a certain time to arise out of ambush, and to charge the enemy: himself by day light led forth all his whole power as well foot as Horse into the field. Within a while after, Annibal likewise put forth the signal of battail: and all the camp over they let up a cry, running all about to their armour and weapons. Then Footmen and Horsemen both rushed apace out of the gates who could be soonest forth; and scattered as they were all over the plain, made hast to the enemies. Whom when the Consul saw thus disordered, he commanded C. Aurunculeius a Tribū or Colonel of the third legion, to put out the Cavalry belonging to that legion, for to charge the enemy with all the violence he could: for that like sheep they were to spread over the plain without all form and fashion, and might be surprised, discomfited, and beaten down, before they could be brought into array and set in order of bat-tail. Annibal himself was not come forth of the camp, when he might hear the noise of them fighting together and hard at it: and excited with this tumult, he led in great hast all the rest of his forces against the enemy. By this, the vanguard and forefront of his battail was frighted with the Horsemen of the enemies: yes, and the first legion of the Infantry and the Cavalry of the right wing began to charge. The Carthaginians disordered as they were, fought at a venture, as they chanced to meet either with Footmen or Horsemen. The conflict grew hotter, by reason of new supplies and fresh succours, and increased still by the number of them that continually ran out to the fight. And surely Annibal, notwithstanding this tumult and troublesome fear, had set and marshalled his men in good order as they were fighting (which had been no easy thing to do, but that the army was of old soldiers, and their Captain well experienced and beaten to it) if it had not been for the shout of the cohorts and bands above-said, which they heard at their backs, as they from the hills behind ran down upon them: and set them in great fear, lest that they would thrust in between them and home, and so shut them out of their camp. Hereupon I say they were affrighted, and began to flie here and there. But the slaughter was the less, because the camp was neer, and far they had not to run thither and save themselves in this their fearful flight. For the Horsemen plaid upon their backs still, and gave not over: the cohorts from the open Mountains ran easily down the hill, and charged crosse upon their sides and flanks. Howbeit, there were slain more than eight thousand men, and above 60 taken Prisoners: nine Ensigns won and carried away: of Elephants also (whereof there was little or no use) in a sudden and tumultuary skirmish four were killed, and two gotten alive. Of Romans and Allies, there died two hundred. The next day after, Annibal lived nor. The Roman Consul having brought his army forth into the field, and seeing none to come abro d and make head against him, commanded the slain enemies to be disarmed and despoiled, the spoils to be gathered up, and the bodies of his own men to be brought together into a place and buried. For certain dayes after continually, he pressed so hard at the camp gates, that he wanted but little of entering thither with banner displayed. In so much as Annibal at the third watch of the night, leaving behind him many fires burning, and divers tents standing, on that side especially which looked toward the enemies, and some few Numidians, to make a shew upon the Rampier and at the gates; dislodged, and purposed to go into Apulia. The next morning by day light, the Roman army embattailed, approached the trench and rampier. The Numidians of set purpose shewed themselves in the gates and upon the rampier: and when they had a good while dallied thus and played with the enemy, they mounted on Horseback, and spared no Horse-flesh until they had overtook their fellows. The Consul perceiving that all was quiet within the camp, and seeing not so much as those few appear any where, who in the morning betimes had walked their stations, sent forth two Horsemen into the camp as espials. After he understood for certain that all was safe, and the coasts clear, he commanded his ensigns to make an entry. And staying no longer there, than whiles his souldiers ran up and down to pill and spoil, he sounded the retreat: and long before night, brought his army back again. The next morrow after, he set forward by the dawning of the day, and with long journeys, following his enemies by the voyce of the country, and tracing them by their footstepps, he overtook them not far from Venusia. There also was a kusling skirmish between them, and not so few as two thousand Carthaginians slain. From thence Annibal ever marched by night, and journed through the mountains, because he would give his enemy no vantage of sight, until he came to Metapontum. From whence Hanno (for he was Captain of the garrison there) was sent with some few in his train into the Brutians country, to levy a new army. And Annibal after he had joynd those forces to his own, returned again to Venusia, by the same way that he came from thence; and so forward he marched to Cannusum. Nero never left the enemy, but was ready to tread on his heels, and as he marched himself toward Metapontum, he had sent for Q. Fulvius to repair into the Lucans country, because those parts should not be disurnished of defence.

In this mean space, there were four French Horsemen, and two Numidians, sent to Annibal with letters from Asdrubal, after he was removed from the siege of Placentia: who having travailed in manner all the length of Italy, through the mids of the enemies, whiles they follow after Annibal in his retire unto Metapontum, missed of their way, and light upon Tarentum: where they were encountered by the forragers of the Romans that ranged about the fields, and by them were brought before Q. Claudius the Propretor. At the first they entertained him with slim flams, with doubtful and intricate answers: but when the fear of the rack and other tortures, had forced them to tell a truth, they confessed, that they had letters about them to deliver from Asdrubal to Annibal. With those letters sealed as they were, they were committed unto L. Virginius a Colonel, for to be conveyed unto Claudius the Consul. And two troops or Cornets besides of Samnit Horsemen were sent to guard them. So soon as they were come unto the Consul, and the letters read by an interpreter, and some examination taken of these captives: then Claudius considering that the common weal was not now in that good case, nor the occasion such, that each Governor needed no more, but to make war by the ordinary course of commission, within the compass and limits of his own Province, with the help of his own army alone, and against an enemy assigned unto him by the Senate: but that some unlooked for adventures must be enterprised, some new designments and unexpected put in execution, which when they are begun and attempted, might make no less wonder and fear among their own friends, that terror among the enemies: and being once performed and done, might turn the former fear into as great joy and gladnes: sent the letters of Asdrubal to the Senat at Rome: and withal, himself acquainted the Lords of the Senate what he intended to do. And forasmuch as Asdrubal wrote unto his brother to meet him in Umbria, he advised them to send for the legion at Capua to Rome, to take musters also at Rome, and to oppose that army of the City, against the enemy at Narnia. Those were the contents of his letters to the Senate. He dispatched likewise messengers before, through the territories of the Latinats, Marucins, Ferentins, and Prentians, (by whom he meant to lead his army) for to give notice, that all the inhabitants of those parts, should out of their Villages and good Towns, provide and bring forth victuals into the high wayes, for to refresh his souldiers: also to come with their Cart-horses, draught-oxen, and other beasts for carriage, together with wains and carts, that the wearied souldiers might ease themselves thereby. Himself out of his whole army, as well of citizens as allies, chose forth the stout and most picked men of all, to the number of six thousand foot, and one thousand horse, and gave it out openly, that he minded to surprize the first City that he came next unto in the Lucans country, and withal, the garrison of Carthaginians that lay there: and therefore commanded them to be ready for the journey and expedition. Thus when he had set forward in the night, he turned his way into Picennum. And the Consul made no more ado, but with long journeyes highed him as fast as he could, and led his army directly to his colleague, leaving Q. Titius his Lieutenant, to guard and command the camp.

At Rome, they were no lesse terrified and troubled, than they were two years before, at what time as the Carthaginians were encamped before the walls and gates of the City. And men wist not well, what to make of this adventurous and audacious journey of the Consul, whether they should should praise or dispraise it. And it seemed that they would measure it and report thereof according to the event, than which surely there is nothing more unjust and unequal. But thus they whispered, "That the camp was left with an army, and without their General, near unto the enemy Annibal; yea, and the same gilded of all the strength and flour thereof: that the Consul pretended an expedition into the Lucans country, when indeed he went toward Picenum and Gallia; leaving the camp by no one thing more safe and secure, than by the error and mistaking of the enemy, who is altogether ignorant, that the General is gone from thence, and part of the forces with him. But where would they be then, and in what taking should the camp be, in case that were known abroad; or if Annibal would either with his whole army follow after Nero, being gone with no more than six thousand? or assault the camp, lest as it were for a prey unto him, without forces, without conduct, and without the fortune and good luck of the General to protect it? The old defeats received in this war, the fresh remembrance of two Consuls slain but the last year, increased mens fear. All which misfortunes hapned, when there was in Italy but one Captain General, and one single army of the enemies. Now, of one war of the Carthaginians there are made twain: and two Annibals (as a man would say) be both at once in Italy, right valorous and renowned warriors. For even Asdrubal also, was Amilcar his son as well as Annibal, as valiant and redoubted a Captain every way: as who for so many years together in Spain, hath been exercised in the Roman wars, and born the name of achieving a twofold victory, and defeating two armies, with two most noble and famous commanders: and as for expedition and speed in his voyage out of Spain, and for raising the Nations of France up in arms, he may make his boast much more truly than Annibal himself. For even in those very places, where Annibal had lost the greater part of his souldiers, with hunger and cold, (which kind of death of all others is most miserable) this Asdrubal hath levied a power of armed men. Moreover, they that knew Spain well, and the affairs which had passed there, said besides, That he had not to deal with Nero, as with a warrior whom he knew not already; for why? he had when it was, made a Child of Nero, by a good token, That when Asdrubal was by chance in a wood, and could not get out, was put to his shifts; but whiles he trifled out the time with Nero in booking deceitful conditions and capitulations of peace, he shewed him a coufening Carthaginian call, gave him the fair slip, and escaped out of his hands. And to conclude, in all their discourses at Rome, they magnified every thing on the enemies part above all truth, and debated all their own means of help beneath all reason: both was their fear, which interpreteth and construeth all to the worst.

The speech of Nero to his
souldiers,

Nero when he had now gained so much ground, and was gone so far from the enemy, as it had not mattered much if his designs had been revealed and made known unto him, for any danger that might ensue thereof; called his souldiers before him, and spake some few words to this or the like effect. "Never was there designment (quoth he) of any General in the field, in outward shew more dangerous, in deed and truth more safe and secure, than this of mine. I lead you to a certain and assured victory, even to that war, unto which my colleague would not go before the Senate had allowed him to his full contentment, a greater power both of foot and Horse, and the same better fer out and more furnished, than if he should have gone against Annibal himself: and therefore whatsoever small posse and addition of forces you bring thereto, you shall sway thereby the whole, and as it were weigh down the ballance. For when the enemies ready embattailed to fight, shall hear (and before that time, I will take order I know, that they shall not hear) that another Consul and another army is come, no doubt the day will be ours, and they shall yeeld us the victory. For it is a fame & name only, that fighteth the field & determineth battails. And small matters many times carry away the game, and cause mens minds both to stoop for fear, and to rise with hope. And verily, of a well fought field you are they that shall reap the fruit & gain the glory. For alwayes it is seen, that a little help that cometh last, is more than all besides, & seemeth to effect the whole. And you see your selves, with what concourie, with what admiration, with what affectionat favour all men do entertain & regard you by the way. And in very truth, as they marched along in their journey, it was a world to see, how both men & women flocked out of all the villages of the country to see them, how they sorted themselves into companies & degrees to welcome them, and how as they passed as it were in a lane through them, they made vows in their name, they poured out their prayers in their behalf, & dealt praises among them: calling them the very guard & defence of the Common weal, the saviours & redeemers of Rome & the Roman Empire: acknowledging that the lives and liberties of themselves and their children, lay in their right hands, and depended upon the force of their arms: praying to all the gods and goddesses, and to all the holy halows of Heaven, to vouchsafe them a lucky journey, a fortunate fight, and a speedy victory over their enemies: wishing heartily, that they might be bound and condemned (as it were) to pay and perform their vows, which in their name they had undertaken & promised: desiring earnestly, that as now they went along, & accompanied them with careful minds for fear of the peril which they went unto, so after few dayes they might meet with them upon the way with joyous hearts, as they return with Triumph for their victory. Every man for himself in particular invited them friendly, offered them frankly, entreated and besought them importunately, that all things whatsoever they stood in need of, either for themselves or their beasts, they would receive at his hands especially, as being ready to afford them all most liberally, heapful, and with the better. The souldiers again, for very modestly strove to take no more than was very needful and necessary.

A no stay they would make with any, nor one jot depart from their colours. Their meat they took by the way as they went, journeying night and day, and scarce allowing their bodies rest and sleep to content their weak nature that looked for it. Now had Nero sent afore-hand to his brother Consul certain Courriers, to give him advertisement of his coming, and to know again from him his mind, whether he should come openly or secretly, by day time or by night, and lodge in one camp with him, or in another apart by himself. Livius his advice was, and he thought it the better of the twain, to enter into his camp, closely in the night season, and had given a watch-word, and made it known throughout all the camp, that every Marshal and Colonel should lodge a Marshal or Colonel, every Centurion entertain a Centurion, every knight or man of arms receive a knight or horseman, and every footman take unto him a footman into his pavilion and cabin.

B For it was not expedient that the camp should be enlarged and set out wider, for fear that the enemy might take knowledge of another Consul coming: and so much the more easily might many of them be bestowed in the streight room of their pavilions, because the army of Claudius had brought in manner nothing with them in this expedition, save their armour only. Moreover, in the very way as they came, the company was well mended and much encreased; by many voluntaries that offered themselves willingly of their own accord, as well old souldiers, such as had served out their years, as young and litty men: whom Claudius perceiving so to strive for to have their names entered if he saw them personable and strong of body, and like to do good service, had enrolled into the muster book. The other Consul lay encamped before * Sena, and * Senagaglia, Asdrubal some half mile from him. And therefore Nero, being now approached and come neer, far him down close among the mountains, because he would not put himself within camp before night. And when they were comethither they were welcomed every man according to his degree, by them of their own place and calling, and brought into their tents and pavilions, and with a general joy of all friendly entertained as their loving guests. The next day following they assembled together to counsel: at which meeting, L. Porcius Licinius the Pretor was present: who was himself encamped close unto the Consul's leaguer. He before their coming, by leading his army over the high places, and one while keeping the narrow streights of the Forrest to impeach and stop the passages, another while charging upon the flanks and sides, or else upon the back and rail of the enemy, had by all the devices and policies of war, mocked him and kept him play. This man, I say, was at the foresaid counsel. Many men there were of opinion, that the day of battel should be deferred for a time, whiles Nero might have some few dayes respite, both to refresh his souldiers, wearied with long travail and much watching, and also to know the quality somewhat better of his enemy. Nero not only persisted still to perswade, but also began most earnestly to intreat, "That they would not by long delay make that design of his to seem rash and dangerous, which speediness in execution had made safe and secure. Considering, that whiles Annibal, upon ignorance and error (which is not like to continue long with him) lay still asleep and benumbed, neither once thought upon it, to assail the camp left without a General, nor put himself upon the way, to make pursue after me; now before he once stir, I may (quoth he) defeat the army of Asdrubal, and return again into Apulia. But he that by deferring still, giveth the enemy time and respite, betrayeth asmuch as lieth in him, the camp unto Annibal, and laieth the way open for him into Gallia, to joyn with Asdrubal at his good leisure and pleasure. Nay (quoth he) the signal of battel must be given forthwith, and we must into the field. We must, I say, take the vantage and make the best of the error and ignorance of our enemies, both absent there, and present here: that neither they with Annibal may know that they are to deal with fewer: nor these again beware, that they are to fight with more in number, and stronger in power. Thus the counsel brake up, and the signal of battel was put forth, and presently they went into the field. The enemies were already advanced in battel array, and stood with displayed ensignes. The only stay of joyning in fight was this, That Asdrubal riding out with some few Horsemen before the ensignes, chanced to mark some old targets of his enemies which he had not as yet seen, and their Horses more lank and lean, than earst before. And (as he guessed) the number also was greater than ordinary and usual. Suspecting therefore, that which was indeed, he founded the retreat in all haste; and sent out presently to the river where they used to water, to see if they might either light upon some & catch them prisoners, or at least while take good marks by their eye, whether any of them haply were higher coloured, or looked snoburnt, presently upon their late travel. Also he gave them commandment to ride aloof about their camp, and to spie whether the rampier were enlarged or set out farther in any place, and to listen attentively whether the trumpet sounded single or double within the camp. When all other circumstances besides were related in order affirmatively, only the not enlarging of the camp, put them by their hint, and gave the occasion that they were beguiled. Two severall camps they were, like as before the coming of the Consul: the one belonging to M. Livius, the other to L. Porcius. And in neither of them were the rampiers and trenches set out any jot, whereby they might put up more tents, and quarter themselves in larger room. But this one thing troubled this old experienced Captain, and acquainted so well as he was with the Roman enemies, that his espials brought word, how in the Pretors camp they sounded the trumpet once, and in the Consuls twice. For surely that was an evident argument that two Consuls were there. And in thinking how the other Consul had departed from Annibal & given him the slip, he mightily tormented himself. And he could not suspect & imagine that, which was indeed the truth, namely, that that Annibal was deluded and mocked in a matter of so great moment, as to be ignorant what was become of the General, or of the army, to which he lay so close and neer entangled. Surely (thought he) and without all question, he hath received no small foil and overthrow, and in this fright dares not make after and follow the enemy. Nay, he feared much, lest all were lost and gone, and that he should not come time enough to help and succour him: and that the Romans had gotten already the same good hand in Italy, which they had before in Spain. Otherwile he was perswaded, that his letters never came to Annibal his hands, that they were intercepted, and so the Consul made hast to prevent him, and give him the foil by the way. Being perplexed with these careful cogitations, he caused the fires to be put out, and at the signal given at the first watch, to truss up bag and baggage, and to dislodge, and be gone. In this fearful haste and mighty tumult, the guides while they were slenderly looked unto, and small heed was taken of them, one of them sat down and rested close in a secret lurking hole which he had before detected in his mind; the other waded over the river Metaurus, through the floods that he was well acquainted with, and so got away and made an escape. So the army left at random without their guides, first wandered over the fields, and then diverse of them being weary and sleepy with overwatching, laid them down along here and there, and left their colours with few about them. Annibal commanded them to march along the bank of the River, and to follow it, until the day light might direct them the right way: and so going a compass in and out according to the winding reaches and cranks of the River, wandered a great while, and gained but a small ground forward. Now when day light once appeared, he purposed to spie out the first place for convenient passage, and there to get over. But finding no fords, by reason that the farther he was from the Sea, the higher were the banks from the water that kept in the River, he spent all the five long day, and gave the enemy time to follow after him. And first Claudianus Nero came with all the Horsemen, then Porcius followed hard after with the van companies, and light armed footmen. While they made offer to charge their enemies in their march, every way, and plaid still upon them, in so much as now Asdrubal leaving to journey forward (wherein he seemed rather to flee than march) was desirous to take a little hill along the river side, and there to encamp and fortify. Livius was come also with all the main power of footmen, so armed and so orderly appointed and marshalled, as they were not only provided to march in journey, but ready also presently to give battail. But when they were all joyed together, and arranged in battail array, Claudianus had the leading of the right wing, Livius commanded the left, and the Pretor took the charge and conduct of the main battail. Asdrubal seeing no other remedy but to fight, never fortified his camp; but in the fore-front before the vanguard, and in the very mids, placed his Elephants: about them in the left wing he opposed the French against Claudianus; not so much trusting upon them, as supposing verily that the enemy was afraid of them: and in proper person he took up the right wing against Livius for himself and the Spaniards, in whom (being old beaten soldiers) he reposed his most hope. The Ligurians in the mids were bestowed behind the Elephants. But the battail was rather drawn out in length, than stretched forth in breadth. The Frenchmen were defended with the hill that bare out over them. The front which the Spaniards kept, encountered with the left wing of the Romans. And all the battail of the right side, which bare out from the conflict, stood still and fought not. The hill that was opposite against them, was the cause that neither afront, nor as flank, they could charge upon the enemy. But between Livius and Asdrubal there was an hot fight begun already, and cruel bloudshed on both sides. There were both the General Captains: there was the greater part of the Romans, as well foot as Horse: there were the Spaniards, old and experienced soldiers, skilful also in the Roman manner of fight: there were the Ligurians, a tough nation, and hardy in fight. Against this battail were the Elephants turned; who at the first shock and onset troubled and disordered the vanguard, yea, and began to force the ensigns to give ground. But after upon the noise that grew greater, and the battail that waxed hotter; they began to be unruly, and travers between both battails, as it were doubtful to whether side they belonged, much like to ships left hulling and floating without their pilots and steers-men. Then Claudianus cried out estoons to his souldiers: To what end, quoth he, made we such post haste, and took so long a journey? But seeing that he laboured in vain to advance his banners and mount up against the hill opposite unto him, and perceiving that way how it was impossible to come unto the enemy and to enter upon him, he drew forth certain cohorts out of the right wing where he saw they were likelier to stand still than to fight, and wheeled about behind the enemies battail, and so unwares not only to the enemies, but also to his own men, he charged upon the left flank of the enemies: and he bestirred himself so nimble, that when he had shewed himself on the sides, presently he plaid upon their backs: in such sort, that now on all hands, affront, behind, and on their flanks, down went the Spaniards and Ligurians, and were hewn in pieces, yea, and the execution reached to the very French. There with them was least ado; and smallest fight of all: for a great many of their fellows had abandoned their colours, and being slip away in the night, lay asleep all over the fields: and such as were there, weary with travail and watching (as having bodies that of all things cannot away with labour and pain taking) were scarce able to bear their corselets on their backs. Besides, now it was high noon: and what with drought & heat together, they stood gaping for air, & yielded their bodies either to be massacred, or taken captive. As for the Elephants, there were more of them killed by the hands of the governors and guides that fate upon them, than by the enemy that fought against them. For their

to their utterance was to have about them a Carpenters chisel and a mallet, and when the heads began once to rage and to run upon their own fellows, their mallets would let the said chisel between their ears, even in the very joint where the nape of the neck and the head meet together, and with his mallet to drive it as hard as he could: this was found to be the readiest and most speedy way to kill so mighty and huge a beast, when they were put all hope to rule them and keep them in order. And the first inventor and practiser of this feat was Asdrubal, a famous and memorable Captain; as to many other respects, so especially for this battail. He it was that held on to the end, exhorting his soldiers to fight, fighting also himself, and adventuring all dangers: he it was, that when his men were weary and drew back (by reason of long toil and labour) invited them again, one while by fair words and intreaty: another while by sharp checks and rebukes: he reclaimed them again when they were running away: he renewed the fight in divers places when it flaked and gave over. And at the very last, when he saw evidently that the enemy had the honor of the day, because he would not remain alive after so great an army defeated that followed his standards, and were induced by the reputation and name that went of him, he set spur to his horse, and rode among the squadrons of the Roman Horsemen: and there, as he seemed Antiochus son, and Antiochus brother, fighting right manfully, was slain. Never during the time of this war in one field were there so many enemies killed: and it seemed now that for loss of Captain and overthrow of an army, they might well cry quitance with them for the defeat at Cannae. Slain there were 36000 enemies: 2400 taken prisoners: and a rich booty and pillage gained of all sorts, besides gold and silver. Moreover, there were recovered of Roman citizens above four thousand, who had been taken prisoners, and were among the enemies. That comfort they had to make amends for the soldiers that died in this battail: for they won not the victory without bloodshed in this field, wherein to the number almost of eight thousand Romans and allies together, lost their lives. And the Conquerors themselves had so much their fill of blood and slaughter, that the next morning, when word was brought unto Livius the Consul, that divers Cisalpine Gauls, and Ligurians, which either were not at the battail, or escaped out of the execution, and were going away in one company all together, without a certain Leader, without Ensigns, without any order or command, and might all be put to the sword and utterly destroyed, if there were but one corner of Horsemen left out after them, "Nay, quoth he, let some remain alive to tell the news both of our enemies losse and ruin, and of our own vertue and valour." And Nero the very next night after the battail, marched with more speed backward, than he came thither, and within six dayes returned again so far as to his standing-leaguer, and the enemies. All the way as he marched, he was not indeed so resorted unto and frequented by so many men, by reason that there went no harbingers or messengers before: but his coming was welcomed, with so great gladness and mirth, that for very joy, the people were welcoter besides themselves. As for Rome, it cannot be uttered and expressed in words sufficiently, how men were affected the one way or the other: neither how pensive the City was in doubtful expectation of the event, nor how joyous and jocund again, upon the news and tidings of the victory. For never one day (after the rumour once was blown thither, that Claudian the Consul was gone forth in his expedition) from the sun-rising unto the setting, departed either Senators out of the Council-chamber, from attendance upon the Magistrats, or the people out of the Common-hall. The dames of the City, because other help they could yeeld none, betook themselves to their beads and devotions, and in every Church went up and down, and plied all the Gods with prayers, with vows, and humble supplications. As the City was thus perplexed and in suspense: first there came some flying news, that two Horsemen of Narnia were come out of the battail, and returned to the camp, which lay to guard and keep the streights and passages of Subura, who had brought word thither, that the enemies were defeated. At the first, they rather lent their ears to hear these tidings, than bent their minds to entertain the same, as being greater than they might in heart conceive, and more joyful than they could assuredly believe: and the exceeding swiftness of the rumor hindered the credit thereof, because it was reported without, that the battail was fought but two dayes before. Then were letters brought from Jo. Manlius Acidinus, sent out of the camp, which confirmed the arrival of those Horsemen of Narnia. Those letters were brought through the common place, unto the Tribunal of the Pretor: whereupon the Lords of the Senat were sent for out of the Council-house. But the people kept such a bustling and thronging about the doot of the Senat, that the messenger could not passe thither, but was halod and pulled by the people, questioning with him, and calling hard upon him, that the letters should be read at the market cross, and in the Rostre, before they were opened in the Senat. But at the last, they were restrained by the Magistrats and caused to void, and hardly could the joy be contained among so many people, who had no measure nor rule of their affections. Well, the letters were first read in the Senat, and therein the assembly of the people: and there, according to the diverse dispositions of men, some took joy and contentment of mind, as upon a certainty: others would give no credit, before they either heard the messengers speak directly from the Consuls, or saw their letters. After this word came, that there were Embassadors themselves at hand. And then indeed, there ran to meet them, of all sorts, young and old, every one desired to be the first, to see and to hear these so glad tidings. And they went out so far as the bridge Murcia, and all the way along, was full of people. These Embassadors or messengers, were Jo. Marcus Philo, P. Lucius Furius, Q. Cestius Massius. Who being accompanied with people of all degrees and qualities, that flocked about them, came as far as to the city on when a feast was questioned with themselves, others enquired of their train and retinue, what news and how the World went. And as any one had caught an eed from them, that the army and Camp of the General of the enemies was slain, or the Roman legions safe, and the Consul alive, such as he would immediately impart his joy unto others. Muchado had they to come into the City, and more also there was, to keep out the multitude, that they were not mingled among the Lords of the Senate. But at last the letters were read in the Senate. From thence were the Embassadors brought into the general assembly of the people. And L. Claudius after he had read the letters, explained himself from point to point in order, how every thing was done with great applause, and afterwards with a general shout of all the assembly, who hardly could conceive in their minds a greater joy. Then they ran divers ways, some to the Temples of the Gods to render thanks, others to their own houses, to communicate with their wives and children to lucky and fortunate tidings. And the Senat decreed a solemn procession for three dayes together. Inasmuch as M. Claudius the Consul, with the safety of the legions had vanquished the enemies, killed their General, and put their army to the sword. This procession C. Fabius the Pretor published in the open assembly of the people: and it was celebrated and solemnized both by men and women. All the Temples for three dayes fully, were likewise replenished with the people, and the order. For the Matrons and Dames of the City, in their best apparel together with their children yielded praise and thanks to the immortal Gods, as if now they had been freed from all fear, and the war come to a final end for ever. This victory altered the very face and course of the common weal, so as from that time forward, as in time of settled peace, men durst make contracts, buy and sell, borrow and lend, yea, and pay debts to their creditors.

C. Claudius the Consul, so soon as he was entered into the camp again, caused the head of Arabal (which he had preserved with great care and brought with him) to be thrown out before the Corps de guard and Nations of the enemies, and that the African captives should be showed bound as they were in chains: and two of them to be sent loose upon Arabal to desire and recount in order, how every thing happened. Arabal having at once received this double blow, mourning as well for the publick losse of the state, as for the calamity happened in his own house, fetched a deep sigh (by report) and said: Ah, how well the hard fortune of Carthage and dislodging from thence, because he would bring together all his forces (which being dispersed and under, he was not able to hold and maintain) into the utmost angle of Italy (the Rutinas country) he brought thither as well the Merapontins, even the whole state of them, who abandoned their own Towns and Cities, as also the Lucans, as many as were subject unto him, and under his obedience.

The eight and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the eight and twentieth Book.

THE prosperous affairs in Spain, under the conduct of Syllanus the Lieutenant of Scipio, and U. Scipio his brother, achieved against the Carthaginians: as also the acts performed by Publius the Pro-consul, and Attalus the King of Asia [the last] in the quarrel and battles of the Seleucians, against Philip King of the Macedonians, are reported and set down [in this book]. In this story a triumph decreed and granted unto M. Livius and C. Claudius Nero by Cornelius the Dictator, because he had performed the exploit in his own Province, made in a chariot drawn with four steeds: and Nero, because he came unto the Province of his colleague, to help forward the victory, rode after him mounted on horseback: His belt every where, in this habit and manner of triumph, he carried the way to port, and reverence: for so by merit, in this war he had done more good for the state than his brother Consul. The fire went out in the chapel of Vesta, by negligence of a Virgin, who had the lamp and tending thereof, and looked no better unto it. The same Virgin was well whipped. P. Scipio finished the war in Spain against the Carthaginians, when he had served fourteen years, and in the fifth year after that he went from the City of Rome. And having disarmed the enemies, gave of the possession of Spain, he recovered it wholly for the Romans. From Tatemon the husband of Arabal, who failed into Africa unto Syphax King of the Nomians, with whom he concluded a league. Narbal the son of Carthage, for there with him at one table, and they supped together. He exhibited a game and pastime of sword playing at new Carthage, in the honor of his father and uncle: and the game was not performed by common fencers, and sword-players hired servants, but by such as were for the honor of their Country, or to determine some controversy, gave defiance one to the other, and were the lists in combat. Among whom were Lili of the country, who were brothers, fought in day for the sovereignty of the Kingdom. When the City of Alapa was besieged and assailed by the Romans, the Townsmen caused

A cansted a mighty pile of wood to be made, and set on fire, and when they had killed their wives and children, they threw themselves headlong into the fire after them. Scipio himself, whilst he lay grievously sick, and there hapned by occasion thereof a mutiny to arise in one part of his army, when he was amended once, made an end thereof: and compelled the States of Spain (that remained) to come in and yield obedience again. There was likewise an amity and society concluded with Masinissa, King of the Numidians: who also promised him his aide, in case he would come over into Affrick: With the Gadians also, after the departure of Mago from thence: who had received letters from Carthage, that he should pass the seas into Italy. Scipio, after he was returned to Rome, was created Consul. And when he made sure to have the Province of Affrick, Q. Fabius Maximus withstood him: and so he had the government of Sicily: but with commission to sail over into Affrick, in case occasion should be it good for the Common-weal. Mago the son of Amilcar from the lesser Balearic Island, where he had wintered, took the seas and sailed over into Italy.

The eight and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

VVhen it seemed that Spain was eased as much of war, as Italy charged therewith, by the voyage of Asdrubal thither: behold, all of a sudden there arose other troubles there, equall to the former. And as for the Provinces of Spain at that time, they were possessed between Romans & Carthaginians in this manner. Asdrubal the son of Gisco, was retired with his power far within the country, even to the Ocean and Gades. But the coasts bordering upon our sea, and in manner all Spain bending toward the East, was held by Scipio and subject to the Roman Empire. Hanno the new General, being passed out of Affrick with a fresh army, and entered into the room of Asdrubal the Barchine, joyned with Mago: and when he had put in arms within a short time, a great number of men in Celtiberia, which lieth in the midst between the two seas: Scipio sent forth against him: M. Syllanus made ten thousand foot, and five hundred horsemen. This Syllanus made such speed by taking as long journeys as possibly he could (considering how much hindered and troubled he was, both by the roughness of the waies, and also by the straights, environed with thick woods, and Forrests, as most parts of Spain are) that notwithstanding all those difficulties, he prevented not only the messengers, but also the very fame and rumour of his coming, and by the guidance of certain fugitive revolts out of Celtiberia, he passed forward from thence to the enemy. By the same guides he had intelligence, and was for certain advertised (being now some ten miles from the enemy) that about the very way where he should march there were two camps: namely, on the left hand the new army above said of Celtiberians, to the number of more than nine thousand lay encamped, and the Carthaginians on the right. As for this Leaguer, it was well defended and fortified with corps de guards, which watch and ward both night and day, according to the good order and discipline of war. But the other was as much neglected, disolute, loose, and out of order, like as commonly barbarous people and raw souldiers are, and such as fear the less, by reason they are at home within their own country. Syllanus thinking it good policy to set upon them first, gave commandment to march under their ensigns and colours, and bear toward their left hand as much as they could, for fear of being discovered in some place or other by the guards and Sentinels of the Carthaginians. And himself in person, having sent before certain vint-courriers and espials, with his army advanced apace directly toward his enemy. Now was he approached within three miles of them unespied, and not descried at all. For why? a mountain country it was, full of roughs and crags, overspread and covered with woods and thickets. There in a hollow valley between, and therefore secret for the purpose, he commanded his souldiers to sit them down and take their refection. In this mean time the espials came back and verified the words of the fugitives aforesaid. Then the Romans, after they had piled their packs, their trusses and baggage in the midst, armed themselves, and in order of battell set forward to fight. When they were come within a mile of the enemies, they were discovered by them, who began suddenly to be affraid. Mago at the first outcry and alarm, set spurs to his horse, and rode a gallop out of his Camp to succour. Now there were in the army of the Celtiberians, four thousand footmen targettiers, and two hundred horse. This Troop being in manner the flower and very strength of the whole army, and as it were, a full and compleat legion he placed in the vanguard: all the rest, which were lightly armed, he bestowed in the rereward for to succour and rescue. As he led them forth thus ordered and arranged, they were not well issued without the trench, but the Romans began to lance their javelins and darts against them. The Spaniards to avoid this volley of shot from the enemies, conched close under their shields, and defended themselves, and afterwards they rose up at once to charge again upon them. But the Romans standing thick, as their manner is, received all their darts in their targets, and then they closed man to man, and foot to foot, and began to fight at hand with their swords. Howbeit, the ruggedness of the ground, as it nothing availed the swiftness of the Celtiberians (whose guise is to run to and fro in skirmish and keep no ground) so the same was not hurtfull at all to the Romans, who were used to a set battell, and to stand to their fight: only the straight room, and the trees and shrubs growing between parted their ranks and files asunder, so as they were forced to maintain skirmish, either singly one to one, or two to two at the most, as if they had been matched to cope together even. And look what thing hindered the enemies in their their flight, the same yielded them, as it were, bound hand and foot unto the Romans, for to be killed. Now when all these targettiers wel-near of the Celtiberians were slain: their light armed souldiers, and the Carthaginians also, who from the other camp ran to succour, were likewise disarraid, discomfited and hewn in pieces. So there were two thousand footmen, and not above, and all the horsemen (who scarce began battell) fled with Mago and escaped. As for Hanno the other Generall, together with them who came last, and to the very end of the fray, was taken alive. But Mago fled still: and all the Cavalry, with as many as remained of the old footmen followed after, and by the tenth day arrived in the Province of Gades, and came unto Asdrubal. The Celtiberians, that were but new souldiers, slipt into the next woods out of the way, and so from thence fled home.

* Andalusia.

This fortunate victory hapned in so good a time, not so much stilled the present war in the very birth, as it cut off the matter and maintenance of future troubles, in case the enemies had been let alone, and suffered to sollicit and stir other nations to take armes, like as they raised the Celtiberians already. Whereupon, Scipio having highly commended Syllanus, and conceived great hope withall to dispatch quite, and make an end of the wars, in case himselfe lingered not the matter, and made long stay: pursued the remnant behind, and set forward into the utmost Province of Spain against Asdrubal. But Asdrubal, who hapned then to lye encamped in * Betica for to keep his Allies in obedience and faithfull allegiance, all on a sudden dislodged, plucked up standards, and away; and more like one that fled than marched, led his army farther into the country, even as far as the Ocean, and to Gades. But supposing, that so long as he kept his forces all together, himselfe was the only mark which the enemy would shoot at, before that he cut over the straights of Gibraltar to Gades, he brake up his whole army, and sent them away here and there to their severall Cities, both to save themselves within the walls, and to defend the walls by force of arms. Scipio, so soon as he perceived that the war was thus divided into sundry parts, and that to lead about his forces from City to City, was rather a long and tedious peece of work, than either difficult or much availeable, retired back. But because he would not leave that country clear in the hands of the enemies, he sent his brother L. Scipio with 10000 foot, and 1000 horsemen, to assaile the mightiest and wealthiest City in those parts, which the barbarous people call Oringis. This City is seated in the confines of the Melessi (a nation meer Spaniards) the soil fruitful, and the inhabitants there find silver mines. This was the fortress of Asdrubal, and his place of safe retreat, when he made outroads all abroad into the midland countries of the main, and spoiled the people. Lucius Scipio having pitched his Camp under the said City: before that he entrenched and blocked the town, sent certain to the gates, who by parading near at hand, might feel and sound the dispositions of the Citizens, and periwade with them to make triall of the Romans friendly alliance, rather than their forcible violence. But perceiving by their answers no mind at all nor inclination to peace, he cast a trench, and raised a double rampart about the town, and divided his army into three parts, to the end that one of them should ever follow the assault, whiles the other twain took rest and ease. And when the first troop and regiment of them began to give a camisado, there followed a fierce, cruell, and doubtfull skirmish. For they could not easily either come under the walls, or bring scaling ladders to set to, by reason of the shot that light upon them. And such as already had reared up ladders to the wall, some of them were pushed off with certain forks provided for that purpose, others were caught hold of with iron hooks from above, and were in danger to be hung up in the air, hoisted aloft, and fetched over the walls. Scipio seeing that the conflict was unequal, by reason of the small number of assailants, and that the enemies had the advantage besides, in that they fought from the wall top: caused that first regiment to retire, and with the other twain at once gave a fresh assault to the town. This stroke so great a fear into them who were already wearied with fighting, that not only the townsmen suddenly abandoned the walls and fled, but also the Carthaginian garrison souldiers, for fear lest the City was betrayed, forsook also their stations and places of guard, and gathered themselves into one place. But then the townsmen were afraid, lest if the enemies put themselves within the City, they should be massacred every where as they came in their way, without respect and difference who were Carthaginians, or who were Spaniards. Whereupon they set one gate open on a sudden, and in great numbers ran out of the town, bearing their targets before them, against the darts that were shot afar off, and shewing aloft their naked right hands, in token that they had laid aside their swords. But whether the enemy could not well discern them so far off, or whether they suspected some crafty and deceitfull practice, I wot not, but they fell upon them that fled and yielded unto them, and slew them downright, as well as if they had affronted them in the face of a battell, and at the same gate entered the City with bloody banners. In other parts likewise they fell to hewing down the gates with axes, and to break them open with crowes of Iron. And as every horseman got into the City, he rode amain (according to the direction given by the Generall) into the market place, to be possessed thereof. And to these horsemen were assigned the Triarii for aid and assistance. The Legionary souldiers besides ran over all the other parts of the City, spoiling and killing all that ever they met, save such as defended themselves with their armour. All the Carthaginians were taken prisoners and committed to ward, likewise of townsmen about three hundred, such as had shut the gates; but unto all the rest the town was rendred again, and each man had his own goods delivered and restored unto him. There were slain at the assault of that City, of enemies almost two thousand: but of Romans not above fourescore

A fourscore and ten. As by the winning of the town, they that were employed there took great joy and contentment: so in their return to their General himself, and the rest of the main army, they made a goodly shew as they marched with a mighty multitude of prisoners led before them. Scipio having praised his brother in the most honourable terms that he could devise, and namely, for this exploit of forcing Orinx, making him equall in glory to himself for the conquest of Carthage: because winter drew on, that he could neither give the attempt upon Gades, nor yet follow at once upon the army of Asdrubal, so dispersed as it was in sundry parts over the Province, conducted his forces back again into the Province of Spain, that lieth on this side Iberia: and when he had dismissed his legions into their severall standing campe to winter in, and sent his brother L. Scipio to Rome, together with Hanno the General of the enemies, and other Gentlemen prisoners, he withdrew himself to Tarcon.

B In the same year the Roman Armado being set out under the conduct of the Admiral M. Valerius Levinus the Pro-Consul, made a voyage from Sicily into Affrick, and foraged all over the Territories of Utica and Carthage, inso much as they drave booties out of the very utmost Confines of the Carthaginians, and even about the walls of Utica. As they sailed back for Sicily, they were encountred by the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of seventy long ships of war, whereof seventeen were boarded and taken, four sunk in the deep sea, the rest were put to flight and dispersed. Thus the Roman Captain Kalerius, after victories achieved both by sea and land, returned with rich prizes of all sorts to Lilybaeum: and hereupon by reason that the seas were open, and cleared of the enemies ships, great store and abundance of grain was brought to Rome.

C In the beginning of that summer wherein these things shapned, P. Sulpicius the Pro-Consul, and King Antalus, after they had wintered in Agina, as is above said, with a joint navy passed over from thence into the Island Lemnos. The Romans were twenty five Gallies of five ranks of oars, and the King had thirty five. Philip for his part because he would be ready at all allies to meet with the enemy either by land or sea, went himself in person down to the sea-side, as far as Demetria, and made proclamation, that all his forces should by a certain day meet together at Larissa. Upon the same that went of the Kings coming, there repaired sundry Embassies from the confederate States of all parts unto Demetria. For the Etolians having taken heart unto them, as well for the society with the Romans as upon the coming of Antalus, wasted and spoiled their borderers. And not only the Acarnanians and Boeotians, and they that inhabit Euboea,

D were in great fear, but also the Achaeans: whom over and besides the war from the Etolians, Macchidas also the Lacedaemonian tyrant, terrified, who encamped himself not far from the confines of the Argives. All these States made report what perils were like to ensue both by sea and land to their severall Cities, and besought the King his aid. Moreover there came unto him out of his own Realm no good tidings of peace and quietness, for that Scordileus and Pleuratus were gone out and rebelled, and of the nations of Thrace, the Medi especially were ready to invade the frontiers adjoining upon Macedony, in case the King should fortune to be busied and occupied otherwise in any long war. The Boeotians likewise themselves, and other nations inhabiting the more inland parts of Greece, had given intelligence, that the passages of the forest

E Thermopylae, where as the narrow gullet of the streights yieldeth small passage, were stopped up by the Etolians with a trench and pallado, that it might give no access at all unto Philip, for to come and defend the Cities of the Achaes. Thus many troubles coming fast and thick one upon another, had been like to have roused and awakened even a sleepy and slow Captain, and made him to look about him. These Embassadors he dispatched and sent away, promising every one of them help and succour, as time and occasion would permit, and willing them each one for the present to provide those things that were most urgent and important. Then he sent a garrison unto that City from whence news came, that Antalus having passed with a fleet from Lemnos had wasted and foraged all the territory about it. And he sent Polysperches with a small power unto Bentia, and Menippus likewise, one of his own Captains and Councillors, unto Chios, with a thousand targetters, called Peltai, (now the Peltai are certain small bucklers of targets, nothing unlike unto the Spanish Corymbes) unto whom were joyed five hundred Romans,

F that they might be able to guard all the parts of the Island: himself in person went to Scorff, and there he appointed the Renaevones, that in the forces of the Macedonians should be brought thither from Thrace. News came unto him there that the Etolians had summoned and proclaimed a general Diet or Council at Stactea, and that King Antalus would repair thither to consult about the managing of the whole war. And with an intent by his sudden coming to trouble this solemn assembly and meeting of the States, he took great journeys in his march, and led his army toward Stactea: but the Council was newly dissolved when he arrived thither. Howbeit, he destroyed all the standing corn, which was near-hand ripe,

G especially in the vale along the Gulph of the Achaes, and so reduced his army back again to Scorff, and there leaving his whole power, he retired himself to Demetria, attended only with his royal guard. And because he might from thence be ready to meet with all sudden invasions of the enemies, he sent out men on purpose into Phocis, Euboea, and Thrace, to chuse out certain high places for beacons, from whence the fires might be seen afar off. And himself set up one watch tower upon Cissa, (a mountain the top whereof is of an exceeding height) that upon the signal of the beacons on fire from afar, he might in the minute of an hour have intelligence, so soon as the enemies went about any trouble whatsoever. But the Roman General and King Attalus called the seas from Peparethus to Nicea, and from thence sailed with their Armado to Euboea, unto the City Oreum, which as a man beareth his countenance from the gulph of Demetrias to Chalcis and Enripus, is the first City of Euboea that sheweth itself upon the left hand. And thus it was agreed between Attalus and Salpurgus, that the Romans should give the assault from the sea side, and the King with his forces on the land. Four daies after the fleet was arrived, they presented themselves before the City to assault. For that time between was spent in secret talk and conference with Plator, who was appointed by Philip governor and Provost of the City. The City had within it two Citadels, the one commanding the sea, the other situate in the very heart and midst of the town. From thence there is a way under the ground that leadeth to the sea: at the end whereof there stood a fabrick or tower five stories high, a singular bulwark and place of defence. There at first began a most sharp and cruell conflict, by reason that the turret was well furnished with all kind of shot and artillery: and likewise from out of the ships there was planted much ordnance, and many engines bent to impeach and assault the same. Now when every mans mind was amazed, and eye fixed upon this hot and eager fight, Plator received and let in the Romans at the gate of the other Citadel that stood over the sea, and so in the turning of an hand it was surprized and won. The townsmen being expelled and chased from thence, retired and betook themselves into the middle of the City unto the other fortrels. But certain souldiers were set of purpose there to shut the gate upon them: and so being excluded they were killed and taken prisoners in the midst between. The garrison of the Macedonians stood round together under the Castle wall, and neither fled openly again nor yet began to fight, as if they meant to stick to it unto the end. For whom Plator obtained pardon of Salpurgus, and having embarked them, brought them to Demetrium of Phibum, and there let them ashore, and himself returned to Attalus.

Salpurgus bearing himself bold for this to good and speedy success, immediately sailed with his victorious Armado against Chalcis. Where the event in the end answered nothing unto his hope and expectation. The sea lying broad and large on both hands, gathereth in that place to a narrow room, so as at the first sight it maketh a shew of a double peece or haven opening upon two divers mouths, but in very truth there is not lightly to be found a worse harbour, and a more dangerous rede for ships. For not only for the exceeding high hills on both sides of the main, the winds arise suddenly and blow blustering, but also the very straight it self of Enripus which nor and flower seven times in the day, as the voice goeth, at certain and ordinary hours: but without all order, as the winds drive, the sea turneth and rolleth hither and thither, working up and down, and like a flowing stream smiteth forcibly and with great violence, as it were, down a steep hill: so as neither night nor day the ships that ride have any rest and repose. Hence the Roman Armado was thus engaged, with so dangerous a rede: so the town of the one part was environed with the sea, and on the land side surely fortified, besides the defence of a strong garrison there, and the assured loyalty of the Captains and principal heads and rulers: whereby it was chiefly guarded, which at Oreum was but vain, Enripus and Chalcis, by means whereof it was senable and impregnable. The Roman General in this case, considering how he had begun a rash enterprise, and seeing many difficulties on every hand, wrought wisely yet in this one point, that he soon gave over, because he would spend no time in vain, and passed over with his fleet from thence to Cymus, a town of Merchandise belonging to the City of Oreum, situate a mile from the sea. Philip had warning by the beacons on fire that appeared from Oreum: but by the fraud of Plator, the other were with the least loss a burning from the watch tower above said. And forasmuch as he was not strong enough at sea, he could not with his navy have any access unto the Island. So that service was delayed and altogether neglected. But he desired himself quickly to the succour of Chalcis, so soon as ever he perceived the fire from the beacons. Forasmuch as Chalcis it self be a City of the same Island, yet it is divided from the Continent by so narrow an arm of the sea, that there is no more but a bridge between it and the land: and on that side it hath more easie access than by water. Philip having dispersed the garrison here, cut down the fort and discomfited the Enripus who kept the straight passage of Chalcis, came from Demetrias to Chalcis, from whence he departed at the third watch: and when he had taken and chased the enemies in great sort to Hemelia, himself in one day reached to Enripus, where he found above four miles. The very same day in manner the City of Oreum was taken by Attalus and put to the sack. The whole pillage thereof Salpurgus had granted to the King, in regard that some a few daies before was spoiled and rased by the Roman souldiers, and the Kingmen had no share with them. Now was the Roman Armado retired to Oreum, and Attalus not aware of their coming, spent time in exacting monies from the chief and principal Citizens. But to sudden and unexpected was this accident of his approach, that had not certain Creteans by good hap gone forth a foraging far from the City, and detected the march of the enemies, a great way off he might have been overtaken and surprised. Attalus unarmed and out of order as he was made haste again to the sea side for to recover the ships. And even as he and his men were going from the land and anchoring into the sea, Philip came, and from the very shore put the number and sailers in great fear. From thence he returned to Oreum, crying out upon God and man, and blaming his ill luck, that he had missed so narrowly the opportunity of to great an exploit, and let it go, as it were, watched out of his very eyes. In the fit of anger he reproved and rebuked

A the Opuntians for that being able to hold out the siege untill his coming, so soon as they saw the enemy they presently had yielded themselves in a manner voluntary into his hands. When he had set things in order at Opus, and thereabout he took his journey to Tarentum. Attalus at the first retired himself to Oreum: but upon the news arrived, how Prusias the King of Bithynia had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, he left the Roman affairs and the Ætolian war, and from thence sailed over directly into Asia. Sulpicius also retired his navy unto Ægina, from whence in the beginning of the spring he had departed and taken his voyage. And Philip forced and won Torone, with a small ado as Attalus before had taken Opus. That foresaid City Torone was inhabited by certain that were fled and driven out of Thebes in Phthiotis. For when the City was taken by Philip, and they fled for protection unto the Ætolians, (to whom they recommended and commended themselves) the Ætolians gave unto them that place to seat themselves in, being a City wasteful and in manner desolate by the former war of Philip. Then Philip having recovered Torone again, as is foresaid, departed from thence, and won Tricnemum and Drymas, two small and base towns of no account in Doris. From whence he came to Elaium, where he had given commandment, that the Embassadors of Ptolomeus and the Rhodians, should give attendance untill his coming. Where, as they were treating about the making an end of the Ætolian war (forasmuch as those Embassadors to the same effect had lately presented themselves at Heraclea, in the Council and assembly of the Romans and Ætolians) tidings came, that Machanidas purposed and determined to set upon the Eleians, as they were preparing to exhibit the solemn Olympian games. Philip supposing it good to prevent that, courteously answered the Embassadors and gave them their dispatch: saying that as himself was not the cause of that war, so he would not hinder and stay the conclusion of peace upon any equall and reasonable conditions. And so with a power lightly appointed he marched through Boeotia to Megara, and from thence went down to Corinth: where having furnished himself with victuals, he marched forward to Phlius & Pharus. And being now come as far as to Ereia, and hearing there that Machanidas upon the rumour of his coming, for fear was fled back to Lacedaemon, he returned to Ægium, unto the generall Diet and Council of the Achaes: supposing withall, that he should find there the Punic armado, which he had sent for to come thither, because he might be able to do some what also by sea. But some few daies before the Carthaginians had sailed over into Phocaea, and from thence were gone to the havens of the Acarnanians, so soon as they heard once, that Attalus and the Romans were departed from Oreum, fearing that they would make out after them, and lest they should be overtaken and surprised within Chelone, which is the very mouth of the Corinthian gulph. Philip verily grieved hereat, and was wonderfully troubled in mind, seeing what haste soever he made himself in all his enterprises, yet he came too short and effected nothing in due times: as if fortune in taking all things out of his very eye-sight, had deluded, disappointed, and mocked all his speedines and expedition. Howbeit, in that solemn Diet and assembly, he dissembled his grief, but in his passionate affections, and thus with an haughty mind he spake and said, "That he called both God and man to witnesses, that he had forlet no opportunity of time nor vantage of place, but when and wheresoever he heard but any meddling of the enemy, and the least rustling of armour, thither he had made all haste that possibly he might: but he could hardly devise and conceive, whether himself were more venturous in seeking war, than the enemy humble and quick in avoiding the same. So Attalus at Opus, to Sulpicius at Chalcedon, and so the other day Machanidas escaped out of his hands and got away. But surely (quoth he) his running away will not alwaies prosper and speed well: neither is that to be counted a dangerous war, wherein a man may be sure (if he but meet his enemy once) to have the upper hand. That which is the principall point of all, thus much have I got yet at the enemies hands, that they confess thereby, how they are not able to make their paragon good with us: and I doubt not, but shortly I shall achieve the victory of them, and the event and fortune of their fighting with me, shall be no better than their present hope. The Kings allies were glad to hear him speak thus. Then he retired unto the Achaes, Ereia, and Triphylia, and delivered again Aliphera unto the Megalopolitans: for that they proved by good evidence, that it belonged by right to their territory and confines. Thus having received of the Achaes certain ships, to wit, three Gallies or Carvels of four banks of oars, and as many gallies of two ranks, from thence he cut over to Ambracia. And then with seven Carvels of five ranks of oars, and more than twenty barks besides, which he had sent into the gulph of Corinth to joyn with the Carthaginian navy, he made sail to Erythra in Ætolia, near unto Eniphaea, and there disembarked and landed his men. But the Ætolians were advertised beforehand of his arrival and coming ashore: for all the people that inhabited either the country towns and villages, or the Castles near to Panopolis and Apollonia, were fled into the mountains and woods. As for the Citell, which in that hurry and haste that they made could not be driven away with them, those they preyed upon and brought them to the ships. With these and all the rest of the booty he sent Meias the Pretor of the Achaes to Ægium, and sent forward to Corinth: and from thence he commanded that the land forces should be conducted and march by land through Boeotia: whilst himself sailing from Eniphaea along the coast of Attica, above the point or cape of Sunium, passed even through the midst of his enemies armados, and arrived at Chalcedon. Then after he had commended the Citizens there for their fidelity and verne, in that neither fear nor hope was able to change and turn their resolute minds, and exhorted them for the time to come, to continue stedfast in their alliance and allegiance, if they made more reckoning of their own fortune, and loved it better than the condition

A new year: likewise that the Consuls for the time being confirmed this prerogative choice and election of those gentlemen, with their own office and authority the morrow after in a frequent assembly before the people, giving honourable testimony of the valiant and faithfull service of those foretold Lieutenants in that war.

Now the time drew near of election of new Magistrates: and when it was thought good by the Senat that a Dictator should call that solemn assembly for the said election: C. Claudius the Consul nominated for Dictator his Colleague M. Livius. And Livius named Q. Caelius General of the householders: so there were created Consuls by M. Livius the Dictator, L. Furius and Q. Cecilius: etc. he who then was General of the Cavalry. After this, they went to the election of the B Prætors, and chosen there were C. Servilius, M. Cæcilius Metellus, T. Claudius Asellus, and Q. Manlius Thurius, who then was Edile of the Commons.

When these elections were finished, the Dictator having resigned up his office and dismissed the army, by vertue of an act of the Senat took his journey into the Province of Tuscan, to be in commission and make enquiry, what States either of the Tuscans or Umbrians intended and plotted to revolt from the Romans, and to turn to Asdrubal at his coming into those parts: and who they were that had assisted him either with auxiliary souldiers, or with victuals, or with any aid and help whatsoever. And these were the acts for that year, as well at home as abroad in the wars.

The great Roman Games were wholly renewed and set out again three times by the Ediles of the chair C. Servilius, Gaius and Serv. Cornelius Lentulus. Likewise the pastimes and plaies, called Phœbæ, were once fully renewed and exhibited again by M. Sempronius Mætho, and Q. Manlius Thurius, Ediles of the Commons.

In the thirteenth year of the second Punic war, when L. Furius Philo, and Q. Cæcilius Metellus were Consuls, both of them were appointed by the Senat to make war upon Annibal in the Province of the Bruttii. Which done, the Prætors cast lots: And to M. Cæcilius Metellus fell the jurisdiction of the Citizens; to Q. Manlius of the foreigners. C. Servilius his lot was to govern Sicily, and T. Claudius Sardinia. As for the armies, they were divided in this manner: one of the Consuls had the conduct of that which was under C. Claudius the Consul of the year before. The other Consul had the leading of that, namely, two full legions, which C. Claudius the Pro-Prætor before D commanded, M. Livius Pro-Consul, whose government was prolonged for another year, received the charge of two legions of voluntaries in Hibernia, at the hand of C. Terentius the Pro-Prætor. And Q. Manlius was appointed by a decree of the Senat to deliver over his jurisdiction to his Colleague, and to take the charge of Gallia with the forces there: whereas L. Porcius the Pro-Prætor was Captain, and he had in commission to make the lands of those Gauls who were revolted to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Asdrubal. Servilius was assigned with the power of the two Cannian legions to defend Sicily, like as P. Manlius had before. Out of Sardinia the old army was withdrawn, which was under the government of M. Hostilius: and the Consuls enrolled one new legion, for T. Claudius to sail over with, Quintus Claudius, and C. Hostilius Tubulus, had both of them their commissions newly sealed for one year longer, the one to govern Tar- E tania, and the other to rule Capes. M. Valerius the Pro-Consul, who also was Admiral for the sea-coast and ever along Sicily, was commanded to give up thirty of his sail unto C. Servilius, and with all the rest of the Navy to return to the City of Rome.

As the City was in famine and flood doubtfull for the variable extent of so great a war, attributing the causes of ill-will and woe, of prosperity and adversity, to the gods: behold many prodigious tokens were reported to have happened. Namely, That in Tarracina the Temple of Jupiter, and at Sorvium the Chappell of the goddess Minerva, were blasted with lightning from heaven. And the inhabitants of Sorvium were to last terrified with two serpents that were crept into the temple of Jupiter at the very doors. From Ariminum there was word brought, that the harvest folk as they were reaping, spit out in ours of iron bloodily. At Cor there was a sow that farrowed a pig with two heads, and in Ardea yett a lamb both male and female. It was reported also, that at Alatrinum were two suns seen, and at Fregellæ by night the day-light appeared. Also in the territory of Ardea, by report, as Sisypheus and the altar of Nephtis within the Cirke Flaminia brake out into much sweat, and the Temples of Ceres, Saturnus and Quirinus were blasted and smitten from heaven. The Consuls were advised to mollify and purge these fearful sights with sacrificing of greater beasts, and to make supplication some day, which was done according to the decree of the Senat. But above all the wonderfull sights, which were reported from abroad, or seen at home, the minds of men were put in fear for the going out of the file in the Chappell of Vesta. For which cause the Castell Virgins who had the charge that night to look unto it, was by the commandment of P. Licinius the Bishop well and thoroughly scourged. And albeit this hapned by humane negligence, and that the gods portended nothing thereby, yet it was thought good that an expiation thereof should be made with greatest sacrifices, and a solemn supplication held in the Chappell of Vesta.

Before that the Consuls went forth to the wars, they were put in mind by the Senat to take regard and order for the Commons, and to procure their reducing again into the country, and placing them in their lands and farms. For seeing that by Gods goodness the war was removed far from Rome, and Livius the country towns might be without fear of danger inhabited and frequented again, neither was it meet thing, that they should have more care to inhabit Sicily than Italy.

Italy. But the matter was not easily to be compassed and effected by the people, for that many of the free-holders were consumed up in the wars and great sterility there was of servants and hives to till the ground: besides, the castell was driven away in bootie, and the manor houses were either ruinate or burned. Howbeit, a great sort were compelled by the authority of the Consuls to repair again into their country habitations. The motion hereof was first occasioned by the Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona: who made complaint, that their territories were much dammified and wasted by the incursions and rodes of the Gauls their near neighbours bordering upon them: and that many of their own naturall inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their Cities were not well peopled, and their country lay waste and desert. Whereupon Marius the Prator had commission to defend and guard the Colonies from the enemy. And the Consuls by vertue of an act of Senat made an Edict and Proclamation, that all Citizens of Cremona and Placentia should by a certain day return into their Colonies. And then, they themselves in the beginning of Spring took their journey, and set forward to war.

Q. Caelius the Cos. received the army of Cl. Nero: and L. Veturius of Q. Claudius the Pro-Prator, and made up the full number of all the companies with those new souldiers whom he himself had enroled. The Consuls led their army into the territory of Consentia, and having foraged and spoiled here and there, and being heavily laden with good booties, they were in a narrow and streight passage much troubled by the Bruttii and the Numidian archers: insomuch as not only their prizes were in danger to be lost: but they themselves that were armed in some jeopardy. Howbeit, the alarm was greater than the skirmish, and the booty being sent before, the legions escaped safe into places of security. And so from thence they went into the Lucans country. All that nation without any fight returned under the obedience of the Roman Empire. With Annus that year was nothing done: for neither he himself made offer of war, upon the fresh hurt and loss received as well in publike as private, nor did the Romans provoke him as long as he was quiet. For they were all of this judgment, that there was such mettal and valour in that one commander, although all things else about him went to wrack, that they held it no good policy to provoke him, and wake a sleeping dog. And verily I wot not what to make of him: whether he were more to be wondered at in adversity than in prosperity. For why? warring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteen years, so far from home, in much variety of fortune, with an army not consisting of naturall Citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confused riff-raff and medley of all nations, having neither the same laws, nor manners, and customs, nor language: differing in fashions, in habits, in apparell, in armour, in rites, in religion, nor serving, as it were, the same gods: he had so knit and united them in one link and streight band, that they mutined neither among themselves, nor against their General, notwithstanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and victuals in their enemies country: for default whereof, in the former Pompey war, many outrages were committed both among Captains and souldiers. But when Alfred the Captain together with his army was defeated and overthrown, in whom they reposed all their hopes of victory, and when they were faine to quit, as it were, all Italy besides, and to retire themselves into an angle and corner of Bruttium: who would not think it a marvellous matter, that there was no stir nor commotion in his Camp? considering that over and besides all other difficulties, he had no means nor hope else to maintain his army, but out of the Bruttians country: And say, that it were all wholly tilled, sowed, and well husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed so huge an host. Moreover, a great part of their youth was far away from the tillage of the fields and grounds, and wholly employed in warfare: to say nothing of the naturall guile and corrupt usage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and maintain the same by robbing and thieving. Neither had he any succour at all sent from home out of Carthage: whiles they all were studious and carefull only to keep Spain, as if all had gone well with them in Italy.

In Spain the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other far unlike and different the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being defeated in a fought field, and having lost their Captain, were driven to the utmost coast of Spain, even as far as the Death sea: different, in that Spain is a country more apt and commodious to the reparation of new war, nor only thin land, but also than any land in the world, as well for the site of the region, as for the nature of the people. For although it were the first nation of all the main and continent, that the Romans first in hand withall to reduce into the nature of a Province: yet it was the last of all others that was subdued, and but lately in our daies even under the conduct and happy fortune of Augustus Caesar. There at that time Asdrubal the son of Gisco, the greatest and noblest Captain in all these wars (next after the Barchinonise) returned from Gades, and hoping by the help of Mago the son of Amilcar, to wage war afresh, took musters throughout the farther part of Spain, and armed to the number of fifty thousand foot, and 4500 horse. And as for the Cavalry, all writers in manner do agree: but for the Infantry, some write, there were 70000 brought unto the City Silpis. There upon the open plains fate these two Carthaginian Captains down, because they would not seem to fall off and refuse battell.

Scipio, when news came unto him of so puissant an army levied, supposed that neither with the Roman legions he was sufficient to match such a multitude, unless he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations, if it were no more but for shew and outward appearance: nor yet was to repose such assured confidence in them, as in the fundamentall strength of his army, that in case they should

A should give him the slip when the time came, (the only occasion of the overthrow of his father and uncle) they might on such hurt to the main chance and total ruin of all. And therefore he sent Scipio before him, to order the levy of eight and twenty towns for to receive of him those horse and foot which he had promised to levy in the winter time. Scipio departed from Lycia and gathered some small aids of his allies that inhabit along the way as he marched, and so came to Callis. Flaccus Sallustius brought also certain auxiliaries to the number of three thousand foot and five hundred horse. From thence he went forward to the City Banta being in all of Citizens and Allies, with footmen & horsemen together, one with another 4500 strong. As they were pitching their tents and encamping, Mago and Masani with all their Cavalry set upon them: and no doubt, had troubled them mightily as they were making their defence, but that certain troops of horsemen hidden behind an hill, whom Scipio kept for the purpose had there bestowed, suddenly at unawares ran upon them and recharged them as they were wholly taken forward without order and array. There had not well been skirmish with them, but they discombed the forward of them, and such especially as engaged themselves near to the trench to impeach and annoy the pioneers and labourers at work: but with the rest that kept to their colours, and went orderly in their ranks, the fight was longer, and for a good while continued doubtful. But when the squadrons which stood ready appointed in their guards and stations, were now brought forth, and after them, the soldiers also from their work and fortifications were willed to take arms; and still more and more continually came fresh and in heart, in place of those that were wearied, so as now from all parts of the Camp there was gathered together a full power and up to the battell, then the Carthaginians and Numidians turned their backs plain and fled. And at the first they went away by troops and companies, keeping their order and array full, and not dishonoured for haste or fear. But afterwards, when the Romans began on a more eagerly to play upon the hindmost of them, so as now their furious violence could no longer be resisted, then without all regard of ranks or files they forgot their array, and ran on all hands by heaps seeking every man the best way he could to escape. And albeit by this skirmish the Romans were more encouraged a good deal, and the enemies hearts much daunted, yet for certain daies ensuing they never ceased excursions and buckings maintained by the horsemen & those that were lightly armed. Now when by these small skirmishes they had made sufficient trial on both sides of their strength, Alarbal first led forth his forces into the field, & then the Romans likewise came forward ready to receive them. But when both armies stood without their Camp, arranged in battell, neither of them gave the charge, when the day drew toward sun setting, Alarbal first retired with his men into the Camp, and after him the Roman General likewise. Thus continued they for certain daies together. Alarbal was evermore the first that came abroad, and the first again that sounded the retreat to his soldiers, wearied with long standing. But of neither side they made out to skirmish or discharged any shot, or gave alarms, and let up a cry. Of the one part the Romans on the other the Carthaginians, together with the Africans, stood in the main battell: and the allies of either side kept the wings, and those were Spaniards as well in the one army as the other. But in the front of the Carthaginian battell were the Elephants placed, who afar off made a show as if they had been Cities. And throughout both armies this word went for current, that when the time came, they would so fight as they stood day by day arranged: namely, that the main battell of the Romans and Carthaginians, between whom was the quarrel & occasion of the war, within the compass of heart and force of arms would encounter and cope together. Scipio perceiving this once to go no good, & to be fully misled in their opinions, altered all on a purpose against the day that he minded indeed to give battell. And over night he gave a watch word and tokens throughout the camp, that both horse and man should take their dinner before day, and that the horsemen in the morning should hold their horses tided and bridled. Now before it was broad day light he sent out all the Cavalry together with the light armour, to charge upon the Carthagean and standing watch of the enemies. And himself straight after advanced followed with the whole strength of the legions armed at all pieces. And clean contrary to the conceived opinion and expectation both of his own men, and also of his enemies, he strengthened the wings with Romans, and marshalled the main battell with the allies. Alarbal raised with the clamour and shout of the horsemen, came forth from his pavilion, and perceiving a tumultuous alarm and fearful stir of his own men before the rampart and trench, and seeing afar off the glittering ensigns of the legions, and all the plains over spread with enemies, presently made forth all his Cavalry against the forward horsemen. Himself with the battell of footmen issued out for the Camp, and made no change nor alteration at all in the marshalling of the battallions, or better than he used the daies past. The horsemen continued the fight a long time doubtfully: neither could it be determined by which, because evermore, as any of them were put back (which happened on both parts in manner by turns) they retired lately into the battell of footmen. Now when as the battell were not half a mile asunder one from another, Scipio founded the main and opened his ranks, and received all the horsemen and light armed soldiers within the middle ward, and having divided them in two regiments, he bestowed them for succours and himself behind the wings. Now when the time was come to join in skirmish, he commanded the Spaniards (and those were the main battell) to take the footing and go steadily together: that he himself with the right wing (for that point he commanded) dispatched a messenger to Saturnus & Alarbal willing them to stretch out that wing on the left hand, like as they saw him to draw it at length on the right: with direction also unto them, that they together with the light horsemen and light appointed footmen should encounter and close with the enemy, before that both battels might meet and joyn together. Thus having enlarged out at full their wings, they with three squadrons of footmen and as many corners of horsemen together with the light armed skirmishers, advanced with full pace directly against the enemies whilst the rest followed sideways across. Now there was a void piece of ground in the midst between, by reason that the Spaniards engines went but slowly forward: and the wings had been in conflict already, when the flower and strength of the enemies battell, consisting of old beaten Carthaginians and African souldiers, were not yet come within the darts shot, neither durst they put in to succour them that were in fight, for fear they should open the main battell for the enemy that came directly against them. Their wings were much distressed in the fight on every side: For the horsemen, the light armed souldiers, and the skirmishers, having wheeled about and set a compass to environ them, ran upon them on their flanks. The cohorts of footmen charged upon them afront, and strove to break off their wings from the body of the battell. And as now in every respect the fight was unequal, so the rabble of camp-followers, Balear Islanders, and raw untrained Spaniards, opposed against the approved Roman and Latine souldiers, pulled down aside. The day went on still, and Asdrubal his army began to faint: and no marvel, for they were surprised and taken on a sudden, besides in the morning, & were forced in haste to enter into the field & go to battell before they had refreshed and strengthened their bodies. And to that purpose Scipio had drawn the day on length, & trilled out the time, that the battell might be late. For it was the seventh hour (or one a clock after noon) before the ensign of footmen charged upon the side points. And a good deal later it was ere the main battels fought and joynd together: so that the heat of the noon sun, the pain of long standing in armor, and hunger and thirst came all together to enfeeble and spend their bodies, before that they came to hand-strokes and to buckle with their enemies: which was the cause that they stood leaning and resting themselves upon their shields. And over and besides all other troubles, the Elephants also affrighted and maddened with this tumultuous and disordered manner of fight of horsemen, skirmishers, and light armed souldiers together, ran from the wings upon the main battell. The Captains therefore themselves, being thus tainted, as well in courage of heart as in bodily strength, gave ground and retreated. Howbeit they still kept their armies, as if the whole band had retired whole and sound by the commandment of their General. But when the winners and conquerers on the other part were so much more forward to charge upon them more heely on every side, because they saw them to lose their ground and shrink back, so as their violence could not well be endured: then albeit Asdrubal held them still together, and did what he could to stay their flight, crying oftentimes aloud unto them, that these were hills behind them, and places of safe retreat, if they would retire in good sort, moderately, and in order: yet when they saw their enemies press so hard upon them, killing and hewing in pieces those that were next unto them, fear was above shame, and so immediately they threw their back parts, and ran away in a once as fast as they could. Yet at first, when they came to the foot and foot of the hills they began to make a stand, and rally the souldiers again into order of battell, seeing the Romans to make some stay of advancing their ensigns up the hill. But afterwards, when they perceived them to come lustily forward, they began again to flee afeeth, and so in fear were forced to take their Camp. Neither was Scipio himself far from their trench and rampier, but in that very brunt had been master thereof, but that immediately upon the hot gleams of the sun, when he shined in a watery sky full of black and rainy clouds, there poured down such a store of showers and tempests, that hardly could he himself after his victory recover his own camp. And some there were, who that made it a scruple and matter of conscience to attempt any more for that day. The Carthaginians, although they had great reason to repose themselves, and take their necessary rest, so wearied as they were with travell, and sore wounded, especially seeing the night was come, and the stormy rain continued: yet, because their fear and present danger wherein they stood gave them no time to loyter and slack their busshels, against the next morning that the enemies should enter their Camp, they gathered up stones from out of the vallies near about them, and piled them one upon another, amended the height of their rampier, purposing to defend themselves by the strength of their fence, seeing small help and remedy in force of arms. But the falling away of their Confederats was the cause that their departure and flight from thence, seemed more life than their abode there would have been. This revolt was begun by Asdrubal, a great Lord of the Turdetans: for he with a great power of his followers and retainers fled from the Carthaginians to the adverse part. Whereupon two strong walled towns together with their garrisons, were yielded by the Captains unto Scipio. Asdrubal therefore, fearing lest this mischief might spread farther, now that their minds were once set upon rebellion, dislodged about the midnight following, and removed. Scipio so soon as he was adverted at the break of the day, by those that kept standing watch in their stations, that the enemies were gone: having sent his horsemen before, commanded the standards and ensigns to be advanced, and led so speedily a march, that if they had gone straight forward and followed their tracks directly, they had no doubt overtaken them: but believing certain guides, that there was a shorter way to the river Baris, they were advised to charge upon them as they passed over. But Asdrubal seeing the passage of the river stopped against him, turned to the Ocean: and even as the first they departed in great haste, as if they fled, which was the cause that they got the start of the Roman legionary footmen, and won a good space

A space of ground before them. But the horsemen, and light appointed footmen, plaid one while upon their tails, flayed another while their sides, and by this means, with charging and recharging they wearied them and raised their march. And when as upon many of these troubles by the way, their engines were faine to stand, and forced to maintain skirmish, some time with the horsemen, and sometimes with the light javeliers and auxiliary footmen beheld the legions also camp on space and overtook them. Then there was not so much fighting and resistance, as massacre and slaughter of them: down they went with them and killed them like sheep, so long, until their Leader himself began to flee, and escaped into the next mountains, together with 7000 half naked and unarmed. All the rest were either slain or taken prisoners. Then the Carthaginians began to encamp, and fortifie in all haste, and immediately sent upon the highest mount they could find: from whence (by reason that the enemies had assaid in vain to get up the hill, having so difficult an ascent) they had not so much ado to defend themselves. But, the place being bare and naked, and disurnished of all commodities for their relief, they were not able to hold out the siege for a few daies. And thereupon the soldiers fell apace to forsake their own Captain, and to go to the enemy. So that at the length the General him self in the night season abandoned his army, and having got shipping (for the sea was not far off) he embarked and fled to Gades. Scipio being advertised that the Captain of his enemies was fled, left with Syllanus ten thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen to continue the siege of the Camp. Himself in person with the rest of his forces within seventy daies returned to Tarraco, for to examine and hear incontinently upon his arrivall the causes of the Princes and States: that upon the true estimate of their defects they might be rewarded or chastised accordingly.

After his departure, Masissa having had secret conference with Syllanus, about inducing his people also to be pliable, and to hearken unto a change, passed over into Affrick with some small retinue. At which present time verily the occasion of his sudden alteration was not so evident and apparant, as after wards his most constant truth and fast allegiance observed unto his dying day was a good proof and argument, that even then he entered not into this designment and action, without good and important cause. Then Mago, in those ships that Asdrubal had sent back, passed over to Gades. The remnant, thus forsaken of their Captains, some by way of voluntary yielding and ranging themselves to the adverse part, others by flight, were scattered among the next Cities, and no troop remained of them behind of any mark and reckoning to speak of, either for number or strength. In this manner, and by these means especially were the Carthaginians driven all out of Spain, by the conduct and happy fortune of P. Scipio, in the thirteenth year of the war, and in the fifth of Scipio his government in that Province and command of the army. And not long after Syllanus returned to Tarraco unto Scipio, and brought word that the war in Spain was fully ended. And L. Scipio was sent with many noble persons captives, as a messenger to carry tidings to Rome of the conquest of Spain. And when all other took full contentment and infinite joy at these news, and abroad in all places highly magnified the glory of this service, he alone who was the man that did the deed (as one who had an insatiable desire of vertue and true honour) made but small reckoning of the recovery and winning of Spain, in comparison of those matters that he hoped for, and conceived in that high and magnanimous spirit of his, which he carried with him. For now he cast in mind and aimed at the conquest of Affrick and great Carthage: and therewith, to make perfect and consummate that glorious war to his own immortal honour and renown. And therefore, supposing it was now a good time to begin the way to those high exploits, and to lay plots, to prepare beforehand, yea, and to win unto him the hearts of the Princes and nations, he determined first of all other to sound and assay King Syphax. This Syphax was King of the Masessy, a people bordering upon the Mobes, and abutting upon that part of Spain especially where new Carthage is situate. At the same time the King was in league with the Carthaginians: which Scipio supposing that he would observe no more surely and precisely, than commonly the Barbarians use, (whose fidelity dependeth upon Fortune) sent C. Lelias with rich gifts and presents, as an Orator to treat with him. The barbarous Prince was glad hereof, both because the Romans then prospered every where; and also the Carthaginians in Italy lived by the loss; and in Spain went down to the ground, where they had nothing left: and thereupon he condescended to entertain the friendship of the Romans. But for the confirmation of this amity, he neither would give nor take assistance, but only in the personall presence of the Roman General himself. So Lelias having obtained the Kings royall word and warrant that Scipio might come unto him with safe conduct and security, returned unto Scipio. Now for him that aspired to the conquest of Affrick, it was a matter of great consequence and importance in all respects, to make himself sure of Syphax, the most mighty and puissant King of all that Land, who had aforetime made proof what the Carthaginians could do in war, and the confines and marches of whose kingdom lay fully upon Spain, and but a small arm of the sea between. Scipio thinking it therefore to be a matter worth the adventure with great hazard, (for otherwise it might not be) leaving for the defence and guard of Spain L. Marcius at Tarraco, and M. Syllanus at new Carthage, (whether he had travelled by land from Tarraco, and taken great journey) himself and Lelias together loosed from Carthage with two great Catvels of five banks of oars, and passed over into Affrick, through the calm and still sea, most of all rowing, and otherwile also making sail with a gentle gale of wind.

Haply it so fell out that the very same time, Asdrubal, driven out of Spain, was entred the haven with seven galleies of three courses of oars, and rid at anchor near unto the shore far to be set a land. When he had a kenning of the two Carvels aforesaid, which albeit no man doubted but they were enemies, and might have been boarded by them being more in number, before they could gain the rode: yet hereupon ensued nothing else but a tumult and hurly among the mariners and souldiers together, in vain preparation of their ships and their armour. For the wind being somewhat big and high, drave the Carvels with full sail out of the main sea into the haven, before that the Carthaginians had any time to weigh anchor: neither durst any of them proceed to further dealing within the Kings Rode. So Asdrubal first set a shore, and within a while Scipio and Lutius landed, and went all to the Court. Syphax took this for a great honour done unto him (as indeed it was no less) that there were come to him at that time, and in one day two Generall Captains of two most mighty and puissant States, to sue for peace and amity with him. He invited both of them friendly, and gave them entertainment: and since it was their fortune to enter under one roof, and the same house for to be lodged in, he endeavoured to draw them to a parley, and to make an end of all quarrels, grudges, and controversies between them. But Scipio denied flatly, that either there was any private malice or hatred between him and Asdrubal, that should need an end with conference and speech: and as for State-matters, he might not treat with a "professed enemy as touching them, without express warrant and commission from the Senate. But when the King laboured greatly with him, that he would find in his heart and not think much to bear Asdrubal company at meat and meal (because he would not seem to exclude either of them from his board, he yielded thereunto, and was content. So they supped both twain together with the King, and Scipio and Asdrubal sat both at one table in one mess, and upon one bed, for so it was the Kings pleasure. But so courteously Scipio behaved himself (as he was a man that naturally knew how to carry himself with a grace and dexterity in all things, and in every place wheresoever he came) that by his fair language and eloquent speech, he won not only the favour of the barbarous Prince Syphax (who before was not acquainted with the Roman fashions) but also the good will and love of Asdrubal, a most malicious and mortall enemy: who seemed to have him in more admiration upon this one meeting and communication in presence personal, than for all his feats of arms achieved in war, and made no doubt but reckoned fully that King Syphax and his Realm would presently be at the devotion of the Empire of Rome. Such a singular gift had that man to win love and favour. And therefore the Carthaginians were not so much to seek how Spain was lost, as to consider and think how they might keep and hold Affrick. For thus they conceived, That this noble Knight and worthy Roman Captain was not come thither wandering at a venture, nor as a traveller to see countries, and to solace himself with walking along the pleasant and delectable coasts, leaving the Province which he had newly subdued, leaving his armies which he commanded, sailing thus with two ships only into Affrick, and committing himself unto an enemy country, and into a Kings hands, of whose fidelity and protection he had no experience: but no doubt upon some great hopes to compais the conquest of Affrick. And this was it that long since Scipio had in secret purpose and designment, this was it that openly he fretted and stormed at, namely, that he warred not himself as well in Spain, as Annibal in Italy. Well, Scipio having concluded a league with Syphax, departed out of Affrick; and notwithstanding he was tossed upon the sea with variable winds, and those for the most part boisterous and raging, yet upon the fourth day he arrived at New Carthage.

As Spain generally was at peace and rest for any Carthaginian war, so it was well known, that certain particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of trespasses committed, were quiet for fear, rather than for any loyall allegiance. Of which the most notorious, as well for their own greatness and power, as for their fault and transgressions, were Iliturgum and Castulo. The Castulonians had been Roman Confederates in time of prosperity, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the defeat of the two Scipios and their armies. The Iliturgians besides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickedness, in that they betrayed and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for succour after that overthrow. These two nations, if Scipio at his first coming had proceeded in rigour to revenge (whiles the States of the country stood in suspense) he should have regarded their desert more than his own good and commodity. But when all troubles were composed and reduced to quietness, he thought it then a convenient time to punish and chastise them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Martius from Taracum, with a third part of his forces, and sent him to assail Castulo. Himself with the rest of the army marched toward Iliturgum, and within five daies presented himself before it. The gates he found shut against him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withstand the assault. For their conscience bade them witness what they had deserved, and there needed no other defiance or intimation of war against them than the privy of their wicked fact. Hereupon Scipio took occasion to exhort his souldiers, and began in this wise. "The very Spaniards themselves, quoth he, by shutting their gates declare plainly what they justly are to fear: and therefore ye ought to war with them in more hostile malice and deadly hatred than with the Carthaginians. For with them the quarrel was maintained, as it were, without anger and rankor, only for sovereignty and glory: but of these men ye are to take vengeance for their disloyall treachery, for their cruelty and wicked villany. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of your fellow souldiers, but also the like falsehood prepared for your selves, in case your hap had been to have fled for refuge thither at any time: yea, and to shew exemplary justice, to teach all posterity,

souldiers.

A posterity, that no man here should be so hardy as to meet any Citizen or Soldier of Rome, in what H poor estate he was, without fear of condign punishment. Upon this exhortation and comfortable words of the General, they belimed themselves and divided the scaling ladders amongst chiefe men out of every company. And having prepared them, they bestowed them, that Laetor the Lieutenant had the conduct of the one half, they gave assault with more courage upon the City in in two places at once. But neither any one generall captain, nor many principall Citizens encouraged and heartned the townsmen manfully to defend their City, but only their own fearful and full conscience for they well and remembered, yet had put one another in mind, that it was their punishment, and not glory that the Romans sought for. And as for themselves, since they were to lose their lives, this was the only point that they were to consider upon, namely, whether B they were best to die within the City, and in the field (where the fortune of battail was common) and oftentimes lived, on the conquered, and put down the conqueror) in either their City burnt and railed, to yeeld up breath in the light of their wives and children taken captive, and shew mens of whipping and hard iron, when they had endured all villanie and indignities. Wherein upon not only the serviceable youth for war, not only men, but women also and children, at ven above the bodily strength of that age, on courage of the sex, were ready and prepared themselves to defend the walls. Some brought weapons in the defendants, others carried stones up to the walls unto them that were fortifying and repairing the breaches. For why? they stood going on their liberty alone, which was better the Romans of valiant and generous men only, but they C fer before their eyes all extremities of torments and punishment, and the shamefullest death that that could be desired: and their hearts were incited to undergoe all paines and pain, by driving awie together, and seeing one another to hazard themselves. In so much, as they stood to it, and fought so resolutely, that even that noble army which had subdued all Spain, and the republicke times at the hands of the youth of one City, was driven from the wall, and finally in that breach received some foil in fight and began to fear. Seeing seeing that, and doubting lest upon a mans bootlesse attempts the enemies might take heart, and his own soldiers be tainted, thought good to enter himself personally into the action, and to take part in that dangerous battle. Having then barked therefore his men for their cowardise, he commanded the ladders to be brought and fixed threatening that himself would scale the walls, if the rest were holding and that day back. Which D that he made no more ado, but approached under the wall in great peril of his person. Whereupon on the soldiers, respecting the dangerous state of their General, and fearing greatly with half, let up a shout on all hands, and began to rear ladders in many places at once. And in on the other side, the assault and gave not over. Then at last the townsmen, after all their some resistance, were overcome, the defendants overthrowen and taken, and their and the walls possessed by the enemies. The castle also on the side which was thought impossible was in that place and tumultuous. For there were certain soldiers serving them among the mans (led before the enemy) who whiles the townsmen were wholly turned, and those places that seemed to be exposed unto danger, and the Romans climbing and entering where they could, espied one part of the City much higher then the rest, which because it was compassed E about with an exceeding high rock, was guarded fort with bulwarks, and inclosed with an extraordinary all, and being man, as they all are light and agile of body, and ready M by reason of much practice and exercise, they climbed up the rock where they could meet with by and by to hear out unequally from the rest, and to yeild them hold and footing: but when they came to a place, might keep place, and where the cliff was even and smooth, they fell back certain great iron spikes and nails which they carried about with them of purpose, and stuck them a pretty distance asunder, like graces and signs to climb upon, and even the furthest place high up by the hand that followed next, and the hindmost heaved up those that went before them, until they were come up to the top, and then they ran down with an outcry into the City, which was already won by the Romans. Then it was well seen that they forced this City from virgins.
 F From that time and deep hatred. There was no thought of taking any prisoners alive, there was none that was minded any pillage, notwithstanding all lay open unto them for to be ravished N and railed. And down they went with the unarmed as well as the armed, killed men and women one with another: nay, their cruel mood was such, as they passed over the sucking babies, if they let fire on their houses, and when the fire moved they railed and pulled down: in canered in mind they had, and so being they were on leave on monuments and tokens of such City, and thereby to abolish and root out the memoriall of the Romans.
 After this, some led his army against Carthage. This City was defended not only by Spaniards who rather were repaired on their weapons, but also by the reliques of the Carthaginians which were scattered abroad in their flight, and thither fled. Before Scipio was come before the G town, they had heard the names of the most celebrated and destruction of the Hannibals by on whereof they were all terrified and in a state of amazement, and it fell out in fashion, O that of Carthage did deter every man from going to this City, himself the best he could, without regard of his neighbour. And yet they began to have a fear of Carthage, and Carthage the, but afterwards they broke out to open rebellion: in which the Carthaginians and Spaniards divided themselves, and parted hands. Carthage, for only advised the Carthaginians perished with them, in the end. Himilco was the Captain over the Amilings, Carthaginians, but the Spaniards were led by Hasdrubal. B by Hasdrubal led by Hannibal but the within Gerubellus (upon promise secretly before hands and protection granted) betrayed together with the whole City besides, into the Roman hands. This victory was pursued with less cruelty, for neither was the officer on their behalf committed to bondage; and the heat and cholour of the Romans was well cooled and allayed, by reason of their voluntary surrender. From thence was Marius sent against others of the barbarous people, to reduce unto subjection and obedience, as many as yet were not fully subdued.

Scipio returned to new Carthage to pay his vowes unto the gods, and to exhibit and set out a spectacle of sword-pierces sharp, which he had prepared for the honor of his father and uncle deceased. This pallie and solemn show was not performed by those kind of men, out of which numbers of sence use ordinarily to make choice; namely, such as were picked out of bondslaves and freed men, but only to make shew of their blood for money, but all those that he imported in companies were such as offered themselves and their service voluntary and without hire. For some were sent unto him from the LL. of the country, to make shew & proof of the valour ingrafted naturally in that Nation; others of their own accord professed to fight, for the love of the General himself, and to shew their pleasure; and some there were again, who upon emulation of glory were drawn to make challenge, while others that were deterred refused not, but strove to get the victory. There were also those that determined those controversies by the sword, which by arguing & pleading they either were not able or not willing to end, having agreed amongst themselves that the matter in question should follow that which needed to have the upper hand. And those were no mean persons of his degree and condition, but of noble descent and famous houses: as namely, Carthage and Orsus his brethren, Publius germain by the father side; who differing and being at variance, about the principality of a City and State which they called Iber, made passion to the title as shadowed by kind of words. Carthage was the elder of the twain; but Orsus his father had been the last Prince before, and received that Seignory after the death of his elder brother. And when Scipio was very desirous to debate and decide the matter with words, and to appease their anger and rage, they both made answer and said, that they had denied to the common folk of either party, and that they would have no other god nor man to be their judge, but only Uranus. Both of them were fierce, the elder presuming of his strength of body, the younger looking himself upon the stoutness of his free youth; wishing rather to die both twain in fight, than to be made subject to the domination of the other. In conclusion when by no means possible they could be reconciled from this furious rage of theirs, they became a goodly shew and payment to the whole army, and singular example to prove what achievements might be wrought in the love of lordship, and the desire of sovereignty. The elder, through practice of his weapons and marching forth in the wars, became the foot hardiness and stoutness of the younger. After this pathos of words and signs, followed the martial games and dances, which were for some space made by according to custom and use of the province, or the nature of the country. In this manner they shewed their business and valour, according to their custom: for Marius having passed over Carthage (which the persons of that composition, with him any think. Now there was another City called Asapa, which ever had with the Carthaginians was yet it deserved not to meet anger and indignation in that respect, as for that, having since the necessity that it follow, it never bare a special hatred against the Romans, as it was the town either for natural situation so strongly fortified, or by art and industry so fully fortified, that it was inhabitable, whereon should be more than, or presume the rather to be so strong and bold. But the natural disposition of the people delighting in warlike, moved them to make wars and invade the territory of the allies of the people of Rome bordering upon them, and to catch and take prisoners as any soldiers, strikers, leaders, and followers of the camp, or marchings of the Romans, whom they could light upon ranging abroad. Yet, and when there happened a company of them together, together through their misdeeds and confusions, for in no wise were they allowed in safety, they were surprised by an ambuscade laid for them, and being taken in a place of disadvantage, were slain every man. When the army was come before this town so fortified, the commanders carrying a guilty conscience for offences committed, thought it not themselves to be themselves, to yield and give up the place to the enemies whom they had so often gloried against them, and seeing no hope will to save their lives, either by the fire of their walls, or force of arms, they resolved to execute upon themselves, and those things that were necessary death, to whom, a foul, terrible, and cruel fate. They first and appointed a company of gods that they had upon which they would have their wives and children to, and then they pitched upon like bills of wood, and laid upon, of many young twigs. And after this manner they made a fire, and put the goods of those persons upon the fire, and then they themselves, and the City, so the power to be lost, they from then were well and be assured, that they would have their lives in that very place, and in that place. And thereupon they brought them in the name of the gods both celestial and infernal, to be mindful of their liberty, which that day was to take an end, either

- A "either by honourable death or shameful forbearance: and to suffer nothing to remain, upon which the enemy in his furious anger might triumph: he considering they had both fire and sword in their hands to do the deed, as he thought, and fought with confidence and dispatch the things which were sure to be lost and perished, rather than the proud enemies should overcome them and make a scorn of them. To these exhortations they adjoined a fearful and terrible curse: to as many as either for hope of life, or upon timorousness of heart & fear of death should alter their mind and resolution. Whereupon all at once they rushed out of the gates far wide open, and with a mighty tumult and shout, made a rally. Now there was no fear and flinching of any face opposed to resist them, because the enemies feared nothing less, than that they should utter ifue forth of the gates. Some few troops of horse, and the light armours, of a sudden were sent out of the camp to make head, and they encountered them. Between whom there was a skirmish hotter and sharper in regard of courage and violence, then ordered by any skill and good government. And therefore the horsemen were discomfited, that first presented themselves against the enemy, yet & put the light armed footmen also in great fear. And surely they had proceeded to have fought even under the very rampier, but that the main strength of the legions, who had but very small time to be marshalled and arranged, put themselves in array and came into the field. And yet for all that, they were distressed for a while about their signs, by reason that they ran as blind men in their furious fire, & as bold as witless fools for want of sense, even upon the sword and their own deaths. But afterwards, the old experienced soldiers, having slowly stood out against the first rash brute and violent shock of the enemies, yet, and killed the foremost, braved and braved the rage of those that seconded them: and when they assailed with in a while after, to enter forward themselves to break in upon them, & saw none of them to give one foot of ground, but every one resolute to die in the very place where he stood, they opened their battell in the midst (a thing that they might easily do, considering the multitude of the soldiers) encompassed and entombed the wings of their enemies, who fighting round in a ring, unto the last man were slain every one. Thus was they that were in arms and made resistance manfully, dealt withall by their enemies according to the rigour of war, and in the angry mood of soldiers: and such was their end. But within the City there was fouler work, and a more cruell butchery and slaughter committed, when the feeble unarmed and naked multitude of women and children were murdered by their own neighbours and citizens, who having let the forecast pile of wood on fire, set to massacre them, and flung their bodies when they were half dead, into the light fire under them: so as their streams of blood gushing out of their sides, were ready to quench the flame beginning to burn fast. And in the last, when they themselves were even wearied with the pitifull slaughter of their own friends, they left them in the armour and all into the midst of the said fire. When this massacre was done and ended, the Romans entered the City with riches. And at the first sight of this monstrous object, they wondered for a while and stood astonished. But afterwards, when they saw the gold and silver glittering within the heap among other goods, they were ready and desirous (as the nature of men is greedy of such things) to rake and pull the same out of the fire: but some of them were caught with the flames and burnt; others flamed and half frozen, with the hot steam of the vapour and breath issuing from the light fire, such I mean, as were for most, & could not raise themselves back, by reason of their exceeding presse behind, that thrust them still forward. Thus Asps was destroyed by fire and sword, and yielded no pillage to the enemies. And when Merius had all the rest of the country yielded unto him for fear of force, he led back his victorious army to Carthage into Sipont.
- About the very same time there came from Gades certain fugitive Carthaginians, promising to betray the garrison of the Carthaginians lying there, and likewise the captain of the garrison, together with the navy. Now had Marcus relied there after his flight, and having gathered together the ships in the Ocean, landed and raised certain aids, as well beyond the narrow fast through the coast of Africa, as also out of the parts of Spain next adjoining unto him, and all by the means of certain Romans. When as between the Romans and these fugitives, there had passed faithful promises and assurances, both Merius with his fortifications with certain squadrons and companies of his own, and also Labeo with 7 Triremes [of these kind of ships] and one great galley of his, for to come jointly together by common counsel, as well by sea as land, Scipio himself lay wait at a convenient place, but much worse to report then it was, by reason that every one as men commonly have a desire & delight to follow, so multiply numbers for the most part, ever forgetful of the own head, and not of the rest of the news that he heard: whilst brought the province out of frame and caused great disorder, especially in the most remote parts thereof: whereby it was well seen, what a world of mischief would be caused, should some calamity indeed, when a vain man only, was able to mislead honest men and ministers: for neither the Allies continued loyal in their allegiance, nor the army faithful in their vowed obedience. Asps and Labeo, who made full account of the whole kingdom of Spain, and that the Carthaginians were driven out and expelled, being so long as they had their hope and expectation, and assistance, disappointed of their design, raised parties and inhabitants of their own country (as Scipio was then) were then sent to the youth of the Carthaginians: the country also of the Spaniards and Bedones, that were enemies to Rome with the people of Spain, they conducted all manner of hostilities. Besides, there was a civil conspiracy and rebellion within the camp itself: where there lay eight thousand soldiers, and guard and garrison for the maintenance of the camp on the side of Rome. Whole hands were set a work, and began to be busy not as they should be, in the service of Rome on the side of Rome, but as they should be, in the service of Rome on the side of Rome.

when doubtful & suspicious rumours were spread of their General, how he was in danger of death, but long before, upon a licentious course of life that they had taken to, and so much the rather, for that now in time of peace they were told in, more frequently and openly, who before were used in their enemies land, during the war, to break out in more loose manner, and to live upon rapine and robbery. At the first they began to mutter and whisper secretly these and such like speeches: If there be war still in the province of Spain, what do we here among peaceable people? And if the war be ended, and the time of the commission come out and expired, why are we not had again back into Italy? Then they proceed to demand their pay very malapertly, and more haucily than might stand with the duty and modesty of soldiers: yea, and the Sentinels and corps de guard would not stick to give reproachfull terms and railing words to the Tribunes or Marshalls, when they went the round: and some of them made no bones to enter by night into the peaceable territory about them, for to sack in booties and prizes until at length openly at noon day, they departed from their colours without passport and licence. All things they did as transported away with lust and self-will of soldiers, not guided by the order and discipline of warfare, nor directed by the commandment of their captains and rulers. Nevertheless, there was retained still a form of Roman camp among them: and that upon this only hope that the soldiers had of the Tribunes aforesaid: whom they supposed in time would come to the bent of their bow, enter into the same furious cources, and have their hand in the mutinies, and follow them in their rebellion: and therefore they were well content with them to sit judicially in Marshall court, in the usual place of Principis, to minister law and execute justice: also to call for the watchword and signal of them; yea, and orderly to go to their watch and ward in their course and due times. And whereas in very deed they had cast off all reverence and obedience of government, yet they would seem to shew a kind of loiall and dutifull diligence, in that (forsooth) they would be commanders of themselves, and keep some order without constraint. But in the end the mutiny broke out into open sedition: namely, when they perceived once, that Tribunes disliked and reproved their doings and endeavoured to cross their designs, yea, and denied flatly and openly to take part with them in their follies and furious outrages. Whereupon they disfigured the Tribunes of their judiciall places in the Principis, yea, and dispossessed them quite of all room in the camp, and by a generall consent conferred the sovereign rule on two common soldiers, the captains of the their seditious commotion, Albius Calpurnius, and C. Arrius Pabulus. Who not contented with the marks and ornaments of the Tribunes, were to bold as to handle the rods and axes, even the very roiall ensignes of sovereignty: never thinking how those kniveths of rods, and axes sticking within them, which they caused to be borne before them to the fear of others, were ready to light upon themselves, to lousge their backs and sides, and to chop off their own heads one long after. The supposed death of Scipio, whereupon they vainly built, was it that blinded their wits and minds: upon the rumour whereof, being already misled abroad, they had no doubt, but as was generally would be up in armes. In which garb and hubbub, they made reckoning that they might levy monies of the confederate Senes, and spoil and pill the Cities near unto them. And amidst these troubles, when all were in uprore, and every man would venture to do every thing at his pleasure, then they lepposed their own deeds and actions would be less eiesied and marked. Now when as they looked every day still to hear fresh newes, not of his death only, but also of his funerals; and seeing there came none at all, but rather, that the former tidings were checked, and proved but a flying tale without head or foot, then they began to make semblance of enquiring after, & seeking out the first authors who raised those false reports: then they seemed to be angry also and offended with them, to the end, that they forsooth might be thought rather to have bettered things inconsiderately, than to have devised such a matter themselves purposely. Their leaders and captains thus disappointed and abandoned, began now to dread and stand in horror of their own ensignes of magistracy that were carried before them, and in stead of that imaginary rule which they usurped, they feared greatly, that the very edge indeed of the axe and lawfull power of authority would be shortly turned upon them. As the sedition was thus dashed, by occasion, that it was credibly and for certain reported, first, that Scipio was living: and when a while after, that he was recovered and in health: there came seven Tribunes or Colonels, from Scipio himself. At whose first arrivall at the camp, the soldiers grew more angry and wrathful then before: but anon upon fair words and speeches, whereunto the Colonels entertained those of their acquaintance, with whom they had communication, they were well contented and appeased. For first they went about to their pavilions from one to another, and afterwards to the Principis and the Pretorium, where they disputed to private knots of soldiers together, and talking one with another, and so spoke unto them, as if they rather questioned with them what the cause should be of their anger and sudden commotion; then blamed them, or laid any action to their charge. The cause commonly pretended was this, that their wages was not duly paid at the day. Besides, they alleged, that whereas at the same time, when upon the trecherous fact of the Illirians, there followed the loss and death of two Generals, and the defeat of their two armies, they by their virtue had defended the Roman name and honour, and likewise kept the province to their behoof, the Illirians had not lacked received condign punishment for their offences and trespasses: that there was none that had requited and recompensed them for their good services according. Believe me (say they again) your complaints are just and requests reasonable, and we will make relation thereof to the Lord Consul: and glad we are in our hearts, that it is no worse, and that the case is no more incurable then it is: for

* Certain officers or sergeants going before them with vine rods

A for God be thanked, Scipio and the common-Weal, are both sufficient and also willing to make you amends for all.

But Scipio, a man though used to the wars, yet altogether unacquainted with storms of soldiers mutinies, was much troubled in spirit and perplexed, for fear the army might exceed measure in wronging itself or himself past his bounds in punishing; for the protest he thought good to deal gently with them still, as he had begun, and sent abroad the collectors about the Tributary Cities to gather up the revenues, thereby to put them in good hope of pay, and that with speed. And there-upon there went out an edict and proclamation, that they should repair to Carthage, there to call for their wages, either by companies apart one after another, or altogether in general, wherether they would themselves.

B And now by this time, the sudden pacification of the Spaniards that were about to rebel, filled the sedition of the soldiers quite, which of it self began to cool and stink already. For Mandonius and Indibilis, after it was reported that Scipio was alive and well, gave over their enterprise, and were retired again within their confines. So as now the soldiers had neither Citizen nor foreigner to take part with them in their folly & furious rage. And when they had cast all about what course to take and what shift to make, they found no other evasion, but the most common refuge and retreat of all low counsels and bad designments, even to commit themselves either to the just wrath of their General, or else to his clemency and mercy, whereof they were not past all hope, and in utter despair. For why? he had not pardoned even the very enemies, with whom he had fought in battell. And as for their mutiny, it was as yet without bloodshed, and no hurt done: and as it self was not cruel and outrageous, so it had deserved no extreme and rigorous punishment. Thus reasoned they and comforted themselves, as naturally men are too prompt and eloquent, to excuse, to palliate and clove their own faults, more I wot, then they should. This was their only doubt, whether they were better to go by cohorts and squadrons, or all at once to command their pay. In the end they were of opinion, that the safer way was to go all in one train.

C At the very same time, whilst they among themselves laid their heads thus together in the camp, there was a council held at new Carthage about them, and much dispute there was, and variety of opinions, whether they should proceed against the heads and Captains only of the sedition (who were in number not above five and thirty) or by cutting off the greater sort to punish this to others example and prevent of a rebellion rather then slaying. But the milder sentence took place, namely, that from whence the offence began, there the punishments should rest. And for the multitude, some chastisement and rebuke was sufficient for their correction. When the Council was dismissed and broken up, to the end that it might be thought abroad that they sat about nothing else but this, which they pretended, they published an edict throughout all the army in Carthage, for an expedition or journey against Mandonius and Indibilis, and gave commandment to make provision of victuals for certain days. And those eleven Tribunes, who had before gone to Serra for to appeale the mutiny there, were now sent to meet that army again: and having five names appointed given them of the principal authors of the foresaid mutiny, they had a direction unto certain discreet persons for the purpose, to shew them good countenance, to speak fair unto them, and courteously to invite them home to their houses, and afford them kind and friendly entertainment.

D And after they had made them good cheer and brought them to bed, to take them being fast asleep upon their libellal drinking of wine, and to bind them sure hand and foot. Now when they were not far off from Carthage, they understood by those whom they met and encountered upon the way, that all the whole army, was the next day following to set forth against the Lacians: which tidings not only rid them of all fear, which secretly surprised and possessed their minds, but also made them exceeding glad and joyous, for that they supposed their General being now left alone with their forces, they might do with him what they would themselves, rather then be at his commandment and devotion. And about sun-setting they entered the City, and perceived that other army providing and making all ready for the voyage above named. Received they were and welcomed with gentle words, devised and framed on purpose: namely, that the L. General took great joy and contentment for their coming, for that they were come so just before the setting out of the other army: and so they went to repose and make much of themselves. And without any fear and mistrust at all, the ringleaders of the sedition, were by the means of those Tribunes entertained and lodged in the houses of certain persons of good behavior and meet for that purpose, and there apprehended and imprisoned. At the relife of the fourth watch, the carriages of that army, whose expedition was provided, began to set forward on the journey: and somewhat before day the standards and ensignes advanced, but the whole army was detained and staid at the gates, and certain warders sent to keep all the passages and ways, that no man should go forth of the City. Then were those soldiers who came the day before summoned to an audience: and they ran boldly into the market place to the Tribunal of the General, (as if

E with their outcries and clamours they would have put him in some fear and dread of them. Then were they daunted, as lusty as they were before, and all their courage cooled: and as they confessed afterwards themselves) nothing terrified them so much, as the stalwart strength and fresh colour of the L. tenance and face so vigorous and countenances, as they never remembered to have seen him so lusty in any battell before. For a while he sat still and said never a word, untill he was advertised that the Captains of the mutiny were brought into the place and all things else in readiness. Then after silence made by an Oy of the cryer, in this wise he began and said.

"I would never have believed that I should have wanted words and proper language unto mine own army: not because I have exercised my self at any time rather to make eloquent speeches then to manage valiant actions, but for that being always from mine infancy almost trained up in the camp, I have been acquainted with the natures and humours of soldiers. But in what manner I should speak unto you, neither my wits will give me advice, nor my tongue afford me utterance: you, I say, whom I wot not so much as by what name to call. Should I term you Citizens, who have revolted from your native country, or soldiers, who have renounced your General, refused to be under his command, his charge and government, and made no conscience to break the oath of your allegiance? Last of all, should I give you the name of enemies? Now surely, me thinks I agnise the bodies, the faces, the apparel and habit of mine own natural Citizens: but contrariwise, I see plainly the deeds, the words, the intents and minds of arrant enemies. For what have ye wished and hoped for else, but the llergers and the Lacerates have done the like? And yet I must needs say, that they had to follow for their captains in their outrages, Mandonius and Indibilis, two Princes of royall blood: whereas you imposed the sovereign command & government upon Publius Arrius, & Cilnius Albinus, two base companions. Denie it now hardly if you wil, that you either were in the action, or willing in the intention. Verily I can easily believe you in so disavowing, and namely, that all this proceeded from the folly of some brainfick fellows among you. For the transgressors committed are of that quality and consequence, that if the whole army were therein culpable, the expiation & purging thereof could not be procured without great sacrifices, and exquisite punishment. Full against my will I touch these points, as sores and galls that will not abide the rubbing: but unless they be touched and handled too, they cannot possibly be cured and healed. I assure you, for mine own part, I thought verily that when the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain, there was neither place nor person throughout the whole province that had envied my life and health: such hath been my carriage, and so have I demeaned my self not only with Allies but also with enemies. But see how much I have been deceived! even in mine own camp the news of my death was not only received with joy, but expected also with a longing desire. I speak not this, that I would have any man to imagine that I conceive how all in general are guilty of this fact (for I were not I swayed in my mind, that my whole army wished my death, I would here die presently before your eyes: for what good would my life do me, repined of my soldiers and fellow Citizens?) But the multitude of every people is like the sea in nature; which of themselves are unmovable and sit not as the winds blow, as the gales go and come, so are they either calm or troublesome and unquiet: and even so the cause and source of all this fury and outrage, is in some few heads and leaders. As for you, ye have caught the infection from them, and played the fools with them for company. Surely I am thus persuaded of you this day, that ye know not yet to what enormous height of folly ye have proceeded; what mischievous acts ye were entered into against mine own person: what you attempted against your native country, your wives and children; what you enterprised against the gods and witnesses of your loyall oath; what ye have done against the sacred auspices and happy fortune, under which ye have served in warfare; what ye have committed against the custome & law of war, against the discipline of your ancestors; & finally, how prejudicial and offensive your designs have been against the sovereign majesty of the Roman empire. As for my self, I am willing to say nothing: content I am to think, that ye either gave credit to my death rashly and inconsiderately, then hearkned thereto willingly and credulously. And it may be, that I have so behaved my self, that no wonder it is, if mine army be wary of me and of my government. But what harm hath your country deserved at your hands which to betray, ye should complot with Mandonius & Indibilis? How hath the people of Rome offended you, that you have deprived the Kn, Marshals and Colonels created by the voice of the people, of their lawfull rule and authority, and conferred the same upon private persons? And being not therewith contented, to have and a knowledge them for your Colonels, ye even you the army of the Romans, have taken the knitches of rods, belonging only to the General, and bestowed them upon those that never kept so much as a bondslave of their own to command. Albinus and Arrius forsooth, let up their pavilions in that chief place and there in the camp, where the sovereign magistrat ought to quarter: with them the trumpet sounded: from them the signall and watch-word was demanded, they sat as judges in the Tribunal of Scipio the Pro-consul: upon them the Licitors and Sergeants attended: for them they made way & voided the place, against they should go forth & march in their state: and before them were the rods born, and the axes withall. When it raineth stones, when thunderbolts are shot, when lightnings flash from heaven, when beasts bring forth strange, uncouth, and monstrous young ones, contrary to the course of nature, you take them for prodigious signs and fearful tokens. Nay, this is a monstrous sight and wonder in deed, which by no sacrifices of beasts, by no supplications and prayers, can be purged and expiated, without the blood of them that have committed so hainous a fact. And albeit, no wicked crime can be founded upon any reason, yet would I gladly know of you (as in a case that indeed should not be once named and remembered)

A "what was in your mind? what imagined you? and what was your designment? There was in times past a legion sent to Abgium; there to lie in garrison. Treacherously and villainously they murdered the principal citizens there, and for ten years possessed and kept that wealthy town to their own behoof. For this notorious and bloody fact the whole legion, even four thousand men and no fewer, were in the market place of Rome beheld every one. Add yet that as the first followed not for their captain Atrius Puer, one little better than a leader, stullian, and follower of the camp, a man of an unlucky and unfortunate name, but Corius Isbellus a Tribune or Kn. Marshall; neither joined they with Pyrrhus, nor with the Saturnis and Lucans, professed enemies of the people of Rome. Whom yet these plotted in council, and meant to have banded in arms together with Abduntians; but adding their purpose was to have seized themselves for ever in Abgium, like as before them the Campanians, who took Capua from the Tuscan, the old inhabitants; and the Mamertins likewise, who possessed themselves in Sily of Messana, and never minded to molest and make war citizens upon the people of Rome, or any of their allies and confederates. But tell me I pray you, intended ye to have made your continual residence, and to have dwelt at Sueret: where if I your General at my departure out of the province, when my time and commission was expired, should have left you behind me, ye might have cried out upon me, and called for vengeance to God and man in regard of hard measure and wrong offered unto you, in that ye might not be permitted to return home to your wives and children. But alas, wife and children were eternally excluded out of your mind: & yet thought no more upon them, then of me or of your native country. Well, I will follow him still, and discourse upon your plot and designs, wicked and ungracious though they were yet hid; not altogether so foolish & foolish in the highest degree as may be supposed, imagined ye being eight thousand men in number, (and say that ye were all of better account & fashioning then Albani & Atrius are under whom ye submitted your selves) to have been able for to defeat the people of Rome of the province of Spain? so long as I lived, and the other army stood sound and strong: where with in one day I forced new Carthage, with which I discomfited, put to flight, and chased our Spain, four brave Generals, and as many puissant armies of the Carthaginians? But let that go by, and to say aside my name, and to speak of no more abuse but this, that ye were very credulous and quick: by believed that I was dead. How then? what if I was departed this life and gone indeed? Had the common-wealth together with me yielded up her ghost? Would the universe and empire of Rome have fallen to the ground with me at once? Forsooth (O Jupiter, almighty and most gracious), she ever a City founded first most happily, with the approbation of the gods, built eternally for ever to endure, should be compared and made but equal with this frail and mortall body of mine. Antimachus, Pentus, Gracchus, Epistaphaneus, Albani, old Marcellus, T. Quintus, Cicero, Scipio, Ca. Fabius, two Scipios, my father and uncle both, so many noble warriors and captains have been slain in this one war: and they are dead and gone: yet the people of Rome continue both on foot and on liveth them, yea, and shall still, when a thousand more of them shall die, either upon the edge of the sword, or upon some schisme or other. How should then the state of the people of Rome be entered & buried with the dead corpse of me, but one man and no more? Even you yourselves (to go no farther to seek examples) therein Spain, when my father and uncle two Generals were killed whole Sepimius, Marcius for your captain, to lead against the Carthaginians, being in the ruff and jollity of their frisks and late victory. I speak now, as though if I had miserrand Spain had been left destitute and without a Commander and General. M. J. L. L. who was sent, with me in the province, joined in the last commission and of equal authority. L. Scipio my brother and C. Laelius, both Lieutenants generall: would these have left it all and done nothing? would these have failed to maintain and recover the majesty of our empire? What could ye have compared army for army, captains for captains with them? was either your reputation and credit or your mutual and close comparability and suppose that in all these respects, ye have been superior and given the advantage; would ye indeed with the Carthaginians, have a horn some against your native country against your fellow citizens? would ye in very truth, that Carthage should have commanded Italy and Carthage the City of Rome? And for what domestic and great misdeeds I pray you, that your country had committed Antisthenes long ago being wrongfully condemned and unworthily himself taking himself to live a miserable cruel man, was moved to take arms and to turn against his country to assail it. A private regard of love and natural kindness, reclaimed them from such a parricide. But what grief of heart, what fit of anger, hath incited and provoked you? Set out your wages as paid later by some duties, whilst your General lay sick, was there sufficient cause for you to give defiance to your country & proclaim open war against it? was that enough to cause you to revolt from the people of Rome, and turn to the Carthaginians and to part no law of God and man, but to break all and make shipwrack of conscience and common honesty? now surely, soldiers, ye were out of your wits, and foolish ye were in the highest degree. I was not myself farther out of frame and sicker in body, then ye were in your mind and understanding. I tremble to think upon it and to rehearse, what folk be-leave, what they hoped, what they wished. Let all be forgotten and buried in oblivion, if it be possible: if one let us not speak of it yet, howsoever we do, but make it up in deep silence. I cannot deny, but my words have seemed sharp and bitter unto you, and all this my speech very rigorous. But how much more cruel think ye are your deeds, then my words tart and sour? And if ye deem it reasonable that I should hear & put up with things that ye have done, will ye not abide then and take in good part, and patiently to hear me to tell all that I can say. But these men will lay no more in your debt from henceforth; ye shall be checked no more for them. Would God ye could as soon forget them, as I will put them out of my remembrance. And therefore as touching you all in general, if ye repent and be displeased with your selves for your fault and folly, I shall be content and think you punished to the full. But as for Albion Calenus and Arrius Pater, with the rest of the authors of this cursed and detestable mutiny, they shall amende for their trespasses and transgressions, even with their heart-bloud; and they shall surely die for it. The spectacle of their exemplary punishment ought not to seem unto you grievous and odious, but rather a pleasant and delectable sight, if ye have any grace in you, and be come again to your right ways. For their intent was, to have and demolish unto no man alive, more then to your selves.

He had scarce made an end of his speech, when all at once, according to the order given before, hands there was presented to their eyes and ears a terrible and fearful object on all sides. For the army which had environed the assembly round about clattered their swords & bucklers together.
 The common crier was heard to cry by name all those that were condemned there, in the presence of the whole audience. Stripped they were naked, and haled forth in the mids of them all, and every thing brought out at once for to accomplish the execution. Thus were they bound to the stake, whipped with rods, and their heads chopped off. So benighted they were all and affrighted for fear, that were present at the sight thereof, that there was not heard amongst them all one shrewd & hard word; in mistaking the rigor of the punishment, no, not so much as one grove or secret sigh. Then their bodies were all drawn at one side, the place was made clean, & purged & all the soldiers were called by name & before the Colonels & Kn. Marshalls, swore allegiance, and to be true soldiers unto Scipio. And every one according as he answered to his name, had his wages truly paid. This was the issue and final end of the soldiers mutiny, which began at Surre.

At the same time, Captain Hannibal by Mago from Gades with a small power of Africans, solicited the Spaniards about the river Batis, for money, to rebel and put in arms upon a four thousand able men. But afterwards he was forced by L. Asdrubal to quit his camp, and having lost the greatest part of his men in the very tumult of taking the camp, yet some in the flight, when the horsemen pursued in chase and flew as they ran, dragging himself with few others escaped away. Whiles these things passed about the river Batis, Lalio in the mean time having sailed through the straits into the main Ocean, arrived with his navy at Carrisa. This is a City standing on the sea coast bounding upon the Ocean, even in the mouth of the river, where it first openeth from the straits into the broad sea. Now there was some hope (as hath been observed) to gain the City of Gades without any assault, by treachery, for as much as there could be seen the Roman camp, that of themselves made offer and promise thereof. But the traitors being forth-soon and was revealed before it was ripe, the conspirators were all apprehended; and sent by Ma-go unto Asdrubal the Protector, for to be conveyed to Carthage. And Asdrubal having gathered those traitors in a Caravel or Gallion of five hundred oars, and sent her afore, because she was swifter of sail than those of three hundred; himself with eight hundred galleys, followed a pre-ty way after. The said Caravel of five hundred oars, was not so soon entered the straits, but Scipio also being embarked in another Caravel of the same sort, made out of the haven of Carrisa with seven Gallies of three hundred oars and invaded Asdrubal and the foresaid Gallies. Imposing verily that the enemies Caravel being taken tardy in the very current, was not able against the tide to retire. Asdrubal being thus surprised on the sudden, for a while stood in fear and doubt what to do; whether he had best to follow on after his own Caravel, or turn the prow and beaks of his galleys, and make head against the enemy. Thus while he stood at a baylinging, he lost the opportunity of shifting and avoiding a battell: for now they were come within the dart shot, and the enemies on every side were ready in charge. And the current was so strong, that they were not able to rule and manage their ships as they would. But the manner of fight was advancing at all like to a sea-battell, for as much as they could do nothing to their mind, nothing by all and dexterity, nothing by counsel and advice. The nature onely of the narrow sea, the violence of the current was all in all, and ruled the conflict, driving the ships one against another, as well upon their own fellows as upon their enemies: notwithstanding they rowed and laboured what they could to the contrary. So as one while ye thought for a ship that fled and scudded away, whisked about back again with a witte by the waves, upon those that had her in chase; and likewise another that seemed to follow and pursue after her enemies, if she hapned once into a contrary course of billows, to turn top and tail, and seem to flee. And in the very conflict it befell, that when as one vessel ran with her beak head full butt upon another, she was forced by waves to turn her side, and receive in her flank the push of her enemies. And contrariwise, when as one by with her flank opposite to the enemies, suddenly all at once she should wind and whirle again upon her prow. As the galleys fought thus doubtfully together, hap hazard, as the pleasure and will of Fortune; the Roman Caravel (where because of her weight she was able to stand more ready against the surging billows, or by reason that she had more ranks of oars than the waves, and so was more easily ruled) changed to sink two of the smaller Gallies of the enemies; and running fast by one with a forcible violence wiped away clean all the oars of one side, and had no doubt spoiled and marred all the rest that she would have involved and charged upon, but that Asdrubal, with the other five made sail, and got over into Africa. Lalio having sailed back to Carrisa with victory, and heard what had been done at Gades, namely, how the complot of betraying

A betraying the flock was disclosed, the conspirators laid hold on Carthage, and consequently all their hopes frustrated and turned to nothing upon which they came to Carthage, dispatched messengers to Massilia, giving them to understand, that unless they went that same day before Carthage, trifling away the time and doing no good, the best way was to return into Spain the King Carthage: and so with the consent of Massilia both of them with few ones repaired to Carthage. On whose departure Massilia was not only a little to be sorry, but also being that the Carthaginians were resolved, conceived some hope to recover Spain again, and addressed his countrymen to the Senate at Carthage: who by relating not only the evil which they wrote in the Carthage against the rebellion of the confederates (and also the way of compunction and restoring every thing to the highest degree) should encourage and exhort them to send aid to regain the possession of Spain, left unto them by deficient was their intention, Massilia being so far off, who were retired for a time into their country, until they knew how the Carthage stood, and what was the success of the Carthage in its independence. For if the Carthage citizens did their duty, they made no doubt themselves but they might be pardoned also. But when it was published abroad how severely and sharply they were punished, they being guilty of a crime, which was a crime of the highest nature, solicited their own people against the Carthage, and thus having revised and amended the same power of aid which they had before, they passed into the Carthage country, where at the beginning they lay in a standing camp, being in all 3000, and 300 horse strong.

C Scipio after he had been reconciled and was again the heart of his countrymen, as well as making true payment of their wages, the safety and innocent state, as also by the way a loving countenance, and giving his words into all hands, before that he departed and removed from Carthage, he first of all went to the Carthage, where he was received with a great and joyful manner, and as for the Carthage, they were so glad to see him, that they were ready to receive him with the same joy, as if he were their own brother. Scipio after he had been so received, he first of all went to the Carthage, where he was received with a great and joyful manner, and as for the Carthage, they were so glad to see him, that they were ready to receive him with the same joy, as if he were their own brother.

And

A he possid into Spain, which four general captains and four victorious armies: and now had not left one Carthaginian in all those parts. Yet for all these noble deeds, he rather assaid what hope he might have of a triumph, than made any hot or earnest suit therefor: because it was never seen to that day, that any one had triumphed who made war, being himself no principal Magistrate. After the peace was made, he dismissed his army the City, and caused to be carried before him into the Chamber of Raim, of silver in bellion, 12342 pounds weight: and in coin besides, a great quantity. Then Scipio and Philus held the solemn assembly for creation of Coss, and all the Centuries in general, with exceeding favour and affection elected P. Scipio Coss, and for to be his companion in government, P. Licinius Crassus the Archbishop was joyed unto him. But this assembly (as we find in records) was celebrated with more frequency of people, than ever any had been known during this war. For they repaired and met from all parts, not only to give their voices, but also to see Scipio: many they ran in great numbers to his house, and into the Capitoll, when he sacrificed: and drew as hundred oxen to sacrifice for the honour of Jupiter, according to his vow which he had made in Spain. And all men minds were taken, and they were assuredly persuaded in their hearts, that as L. Lucullus finished the former Punick war, so P. Cornelius would make an end of that which was now in hand: and like as he had driven all the Carthaginians forth of Spain, so would Scipio drive them out of Italy: and every man in his conceit wished and assigned unto him the Province of Affrick, as if the war in Italy had been fully brought to an end. Then ensued the election of the Prators. And two were created that were then Judges of the Commons, to wit, P. Lucullus and Q. Ottavius: and of private persons, Cn. Servilius Scipio, and L. Aemilius Paullus. It is the fourteenth year of the Punick war, P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus entered their Consolships: And unto the Consuls were the Provinces appointed: namely, unto Scipio was Spain granted without opposing law, and that with the content and good liking of his Collegue, because he being the Archbishop, was by vertue of that dignity kept still in Italy for to see to the sacrifices, divine service, and Church matters: and unto Crassus the country of Britain was assigned. Then the provinces for the Prators were put to the lottery, and the civil jurisdiction within Rome fell to Q. Servilius: and Q. Ottavius for (which they called Gallia) unto Sp. Lucretius: Sicily was allotted to L. Aemilius and L. Lucullus to Cn. Servilius.

The Senat assembled in the Capitoll, where Publius Scipio propounded an Act, and it was confirmed by the authority of the house. That out of the money which himself brought into the common treasure, he might be allowed to defray the charges of those places and games that he had vowed in Spain during the time of the Soldiers mutiny. Then he called the Embassadors of the Saguntines into the Senat house: and the most notable man amongst them spake in this wise:

"Although right honourable, it be not possible to find any more miseries & calamities than we have endured already in the maintenance of our faithful allegiance unto you even unto the end, yet such have your desires been to us ward, & so many favours have we received of your captains Generals, that we think not much nor repent of any damage or loss, that we have sustained in that behalf. For first ye entered into the quarrel, & began the war for our sake: and having once begun to, ye have continued therein for the full space of 14 years: and that with such resolution and stoutness, as ye have plunged your selves into extreme peril & danger, so ye have engaged no less the State of the Carthaginians. For at what time as ye had within Italy a cruel and bloody war, to wit, that your mortal enemy, ye sent forth your Coss, with armies into Spain, as it were to gather up the broken reliques of our shipwrack. Publius and Cn. Cornelius the two brothers from the first time that they came into the Province, never ceased to devise and do whatsoever might either advantage us, or endamage our enemies. For first and foremost they restored unto us our towns again: then having made enquiry throughout all Spain, where any one of our Captains were sold as slaves, they delivered and redeemed them out of miserable servitude, and recovered for them their former freedom. But see! When we were well near come to this good pass, that from our poor & pitiful state we were raised up to a wished for and desirable fortune, when Publius and Cn. Cornelius your Generals suddenly died: whose death hapned in manner more lamentable and dolorous than can be said unto you. For then we thought verily thus of our selves, That we were reduced from remote & distant places unto our ancient habitation, for this purpose, that we should forth once again, and see a second overthrow and destruction of our native country: knowing thus much, what far to work our utter confusion there needed not a Carthaginian captain, nor any to be the instrument and the means: for even the Turdetans alone, our most ancient enemies, who were the cause also of our former ruin and undoing, were able with their own forces to rout us out clean, and extinguish our name. But behold, whiles we were in these perplexities, almost fully beyond all our hope and expectation, ye sent amongst us this noble Scipio here in place. In whose behalf we count our selves of all Saguntines most happy, because we have seen him declared Coss, already, and shall be able to report the news unto our neighbours. And fellow Citizens, that we have beheld with our own eyes, even our whole hope, our help, our health and safety: who having forced & won very many Cities and towns of your enemies in Spain, at all times and in all places, yet the Saguntines apart from out of other prisoners & captives, and sent them home again into their own country. Finally, as for Turdetania, a nation so adverse and so dangerous to our enemies, that if it should continue still in prosperity, Saguntum could not possibly stand upright: he hath by force of arms so quelled and tamed it, that neither our selves, nor be it spoken without arrogance, any of our posterity hereafter need stand in

The Oration of the Saguntine Embassadors in the Senat of Rome.

"fear of any danger from thence. We see before our eyes their City raised, at whose instigation & whom for to gratifie. Saguntum before had raised Saguntum and out of their lands now we gather
 "sons and revenues which contenteth our hearts in do so much for profit & gain, as for quitance
 "and revenge. In consideration and regard of these benefits and good turns which be such a great
 "as we cannot hope nor wish for in the hands of the immortal gods the Senat and people of Rome
 "have sent us here in Embrassie unto you for to give you thanks in their name with "all to rejoyce and congratulate in your behalf for the happy hand ye have made, and the fortunate
 "exploits ye have achieved these last years past, as well in Spain as in Italy; namely, that ye "have subdued, and do hold in possession all Spain, not only so far as to the river Ithrus, but even "to the lands end, and the utmost point lying upon the Ocean sea. And as for Italy, ye have left no "more ground in it for Anniball and the Carthaginians, than they empace within the compass of a "trench and rampier. Moreover, we have in special charge, not only to render thanksgiving there"fore to almighty and most gracious Jupiter, the patron of the founts and Castle of the Capitol,
 "but also to offer & present unto him, if it might stand with your good grace and liking, this golden "crown; and to let it up in the Capitol in token and memorial of Victory. Which we hum"bly beseech your HH. of your favour to grant unto us; and moreover, if it please you, to raise "and confirm for ever by your authority and approbation all those benefits, franchises, and privi-
 "ledges, which your Generals have of their goodness purchased to endow us with."

The Senat made this answer to the Saguntin Embassadors, "That both the raising and also the "rearing again of Saguntum should be a memorable example to all nations, of the faithful forie-
 "ty and alliance, observed both of the one part and the other inviolate. And whereas their Gene"rals had re-edified the City of Saguntum, and delivered the Citizens thereof from servitude and "bondage, they had therein done well and truly, and by direction, according to the will and plea"sure of the Senat. And whatsoever else was performed by them to the good and benefit of the "Saguntins, the Senat stood willing and contented therewith; and gave order therefore. As for "their present and oblation, good leave they had to bestow it solemnly in the Temple of the Ca"pitol. After this order was given, That the Embassadors should have their lodging appointed "them, and presents sent unto them, and all other entertainment at the charges of the City; yea and
 "by way of a reward or allowance of, no less than ten thousand Ases apiece."

Then were the other Embassadors admitted into the Senat-house, and audience given them.
 "Also the request of the Saguntins was granted to go and see Italy for their pleasure, so far forth as "they might with security of their persons; and certain guides were assigned to conduct and accom"pany them, with especial letters also directed unto all Cities and towns, for to receive the Spani"ards friendly and give them courteous entertainment."

These things done, the Senators sat in consultation about the state and commonweal, & treated "concerning the levying of new armies, & the distribution of the Provinces. Now when as the com"monbrute went that P. Scipio was declined & named to a new province of Affrick, & all men gave "out with open voice, that he was the man to be sent thither directly, without casting lots for the "matter; and himself besides not resting content now with mean glory, said openly, that he was "declared Cof. not only for to maintain war, but also to finish and make an end thereof once for all;
 "which could not be effected by any other means, unless himself in person made a voyage with an "army into Affrick; protesting moreover, That if the Senat crossed and gainsaid this design of his,
 "he would propound it to the people, and carry it away clear by their voices; whiles the principal
 "LL. and ancients of the Senat were nothing pleased with this resolution of his, but durst not say a "word and speak their minds, either for fear, or for counting of him, in hope of preferment; only
 "Q. Fabius being demanded his opinion, spake to the matter in question to this effect:

The Oration
 of Q. Fabius.

"Right honourable and my LL. of the Senat, I know full well, that many of you here assembled
 "are of this mind & verily perswaded, That we are set this day to no purpose, but even to consult "and debate of a matter clearly determined; & that in vain he shall spend words, who shall deliver "his advice of the Province of Affrick, as of a point as yet doubtful & not resolved upon already.
 "For mine own part, first I cannot conceive neither will it enter into my head, how Affrick can "possibly now be accounted as a Province & assigned certainly unto your Cof. (let him be a man "right hardy, & of as much valour as may be) considering, that neither the Senat unto this day hath "judged it, nor the people ordained & assigned it to any person in the nature and name of a Pro"vince. Furthermore, if it were so indeed, without all peradventure, then in my judgment the
 "Cof. hath done amiss, who in making semblance to put a matter for to be debated, which is al"ready agreed upon, hath deluded and mocked the whole Senat, and not the Senator, who in his "course delivereth his opinion of the thing in question. But I am assured, that in gainsaying and "crossing this hasty voyage into Affrick, I shall incur the snifter opinion & surmise of two things:
 "the one is of my usual lingring and slow proceeding in all mine actions (a course that naturally I "am given unto) which young men may term at their pleasure, timorousness and laziness; but so "long as I have no cause to repent therefore, I pass the less. For surely hitherto the advices of others "have ever at the first sight made a goodlier shew, and seemed more honourable; but by experi"ence mine own waies have sped better, and been found in the end more effectual. The other is,
 "of backbiting detraction, and envying at the glory and reputation of, the Cof. a man of singular "prowess (I must confess) & whom I see to grow from day to day in greatness and honour. From "which jealousy and suspicion, if neither my life passed and the carriage of my self; if neither my "Dictator-

- A "Dictatorship with five Consulships, nor so much glory which I have acquired as well in managing the affairs of war abroad, as of civil policy at home (that a man would think I should rather be glutted therewith than desire any more) be able to clear and assuage me; yet my years at least will free me very well. For what concurrence and emulation can there be between me and him, who is not of equall age with my very son? When I was Dictator, in the vigour and flower of my strength, in the very course and train of my greatest and bravest exploits, no man either in Senat or in the assembly of the people, heard me to refuse and deny, That my own General of Cavalry, who could not afford me a good word, but ever railed at me, (a thing that was never heard before) should be made equall with my self in command and government. And yet
- B "by good deeds rather than by fair words, I effected and gained thus much in the end, that he, who in the judgment of others was matched with me and made my fellow, confessed within a while himself to be my inferior. Let's reason have I then now, after I have gone through all degrees of honors and dignities, to enter into contention & emulation with a young gentleman, of all others at this day most flourishing in the eyes of the world: unless forsooth it be a likely matter that I (a man weary not only of managing affairs, but also of this world, and of this life) should look to have the Province of Affrick offered unto me, if it were once denied him, Nay verily, I have enough already: in that glory I am content to live and die, and seek for no more. It was sufficient for me to hinder Annibal from attchieving the victory; to the end that by you, who now are gallants in the best of your strength, he might be vanquished & overcome. Meet it
- C "is then and great reason, O P. Cornelius, that you should bear with me, and hold me excited, if I, who never in regard of mine own self set greater store by the fame and opinion of people, than of the good of the Common-weal, prefer not now your glory before the weal-publike. And yet I will not say, but in case there were no war at all in Italy; or the enemy of that quality, as by conquering of whom there were no credit & honour to be gotten: then he that would seek to keep you still in Italy, were it never so much for the good of the State, might seem to go about to disappoint and frustrate you (in putting you by the charge of the war) of the very means and matter of your glory and renown. But seeing that Annibal is your object, seeing he is our enemy, who with an entire army still holdeth Italy as it were besieged now these fourteen years will you not, O P. Cornelius, hold your self well contented with this honour and reputation. That you being
- D "Consul, should drive that enemy out of Italy, who hath been the cause of the death of so many brave men of ours, and of so many foils and overthrowes that we have received: that, like as C. Lucatius had the name of finishing the former Punick war, so you may win the title of ending this other also. Unless that a man would say that Amilcar was a warrior and Captain worthy to be preferred before Annibal; or that war of more importance than this; or that victory greater and more honorable than this is like to be, in case it happen that we may be conquerors under your conduct, and whiles you are Consul. Whether would you chuse rather to have drawn Amilcar away from Drepanum & the mountain of Eryx, than chased and hunted the Carthaginians and Annibal out of Italy? Nay surely, even your own self (howsoever you embrace glory already won, than hoped for hereafter) would not take more joy & contentment, and triumph rather for freeing and delivering of Spain than Italy from the wars. Annibal, I wot, as yet is not come to that low ebb, nor so down the wind, but that he which made choice of another war, may seem well in so doing to stand as much in fear and dread, as in contempt of him. Why then address you not your self to effect this imprese, and leave building these Castles in the air, and hope by fetching these reaches and this compass, & going the longest way about, that when you are passed over into Affrick, Annibal will follow you thither: and not rather go the next way to work, and fight with Annibal where he is, and make no more ado? Are you willing indeed and desirous to win this honour of dispatching quite the Punick war? Why, it is the course of nature to defend and make sure your own before you go in hand to assail the dominions of others. Let us have peace first in Italy, before we make war in Affrick; and let us first rid our selves of feare ere ever we take occasion to put others in fear; unless we had some greater quarrel. And
- F "if by your conduct and fortunate government, both these may possibly be effected: conquer Annibal here, and then go thither to assail Carthage: a Gods name. But if the one or the other of these victories must needs be left for new Consuls to attchieve: as the former of the twain will be the greater and more memorable, so it will open the way, and give the overture unto the other ensuing upon it. For at this time, over and besides that our treasure, and all the revenues and finances of our state, are not able to maintain and wage two sundry armies both in Italy and in Affrick: besides, I say, that we want the means to keep two Armados afloat, and have nothing left sufficient wherewith to furnish them with victuals and munition: who seeth not, I pray you, how far we engage our selves in peril and danger by this enterprise? P. Lucinius shall war in Italy, and P. Scipio in Affrick. What will ye say if Annibal, (which God forbid, & my heart even dreads to presage, but that which once hath happened may happen full well again) upon the train
- G "of some new victory, fortune to go forward and assail the City of Rome? Where are we then? Shall we have time then to send for you our Col. out of Affrick, as we did for Q. Fulvius from Campania? And what say you to this besides, That the fortune of war is doubtfull & uncertain even in Affrick, as well as in other places? Call to mind, and learn betimes by the examples of your own home and family, by your father and uncle, who within 30 daies were slain, & their armies defeated: even there, where for certain years space they had performed both by sea and land most

"noble exploits: and highly renowned among tarrain nations both the Roman people, and also "your own name & family. The time will not serve, if I would do all this day do nothing else but "reckon and recount unto you, how many Kings, Emperors, & General Captains there have been,
 "who have centred rashly into their enemies countries, and received many foyle and overthrow "thereby, as wel in their own persons, as in their whole armies. The Athenians, a most prudent &
 "politicke State, having left the war at home in their own country, and following the counsel and "suggestion of one * young man, as hardy & valiant in arms, as noble in birth & parentage as your "fell (none dispraised) sailed into Sicily with a brave and puissant navy; and there in one battell "fought at sea, overturned and ruinated for ever their most flourishing City & Common-weal.
 "But why seek I forrain examples of strangers, and stories of times too far past, and over-long ago.
 "Let even this same Affrick, and M. Asilius, serve as a notable example of both fortunes for our "instruction & learning for ever. Now surely P. Cornel, when you shall once discover Affrick with
 "in your view from the sea, you will think then that your Provinces of Spain were matters of sport "in comparison of it. For what semblable proportion is there between them? When you were in "your voyage for Spain, you sailed in the calm sea peaceably along the coast of Italy and France,
 "and arrived at Emporia, a friend City and Confederat: and when you had landed your men, you
 "led them in security through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far "as Tarracon. From thence ye journeyed all the waies by Cities and towns, furnished with Roman "garrisons. About the river Iberus you found the armies of your father and uncle, which remained "upon the loss of their Generals more fierce and fell for the calamity that they had received than "before. You met there L. Martius their Captain and Leader, chosen (I must needs say) I know "not how in a hurry by the souldiers themselves for the time: but otherwise I assure you, if no"bility of birth and the titles of dignities which he justly deserved had graced him, he was in all "feats of arms and martiall knowledge, comparable to the very best warriors & noblest Captains.
 "After this you assaulted Carthage without any empeachment, and took your time at your own "pleasure, even when there was not one of the three Carthaginian armies to aid & defend their "affociats. As for all the exploits besides (without offence be it spoken & not to debase any good "service there) they are in no respect to be compared with the Affrican war: where we shall find
 "no haven open to entertain our Armado, no Country peaceable, no City confederate, no King "friendly, no place at all either to sojourn and rest in, or to march forward and pass through with "safety. Which way soever you cast your eyes, nothing but hostility threatening danger and perill "unto us. Do you indeed trust Syphax, or rely upon the Numidians? Well, let it suffice that once "ye trusted them. Rash adventures speed not alwaies best. And oftentimes we see, that fraud see"meth faithfull, and maketh way of credit in small things, that in matters of greatest importance, "and when the time serveth it may pay home and work a mischief with a witness. The enemies
 "overcame not your father and uncle by force of arms before that the Celtiberians, our Allies "over-raught them by falshood and treachery: neither were you self in so much danger from "Mago and Asdrubal the chief Captains of your enemies, as from Indibilis and Mandonius, your "new friends and confederates. Can you repose any confidence in the Numidians? You say that "have experience of your own souldiers mutiny, and have seen them rise against you: As for Sy-
 "phax and Masanissa, as they had rather themselves be the sovereign & most mighty in Affrick,
 "than the Carthaginians should; so surely they wish the Carthaginians to be the highest above "all others besides their own selves. Now at this time there is some emulation and heart-burning "among them, and all occasions of quarrell whet them on to maintain sides and factions, so long "as fear of forrain enemy is far enough off. Shew them once the Roman arms and forces, let "them see an host of strangers once, they will run I warrant you altogether, then as it were to "quench a common scatchfire. You shall find that the very same Carthaginians will far otherwise "stand to the defence of the wals of their Country, their Cities, the Temples of their gods, their "Altars and private houses, when going to battell they shall have their fearful wives to bear them
 "company, their small children to go afore them in their eye; you shall find them, I say, stick bet"ter to it than they did in the quarrell and defence of Spain. But what and if the Carthaginians, "finding themselves strong enough upon the confidence of the generall concord of Affrick, of
 "the fast fidelity of the confederate Kings, of the strength of their own wals, should fortane "themselves, when they shall see Italy destitute of your help, and disurnished of their forces, ei"ther to make out a fresh army from Affrick and send it into Italy, or else give order and dispo"sition to Mago (who as it is well known for certain, is departed with his navy from the Balkan "Islands, and lyeth floating and riding continually upon the Alpine Ligurians) for to joyn his "power with Annibal: It is a clear case, that we shall be in as great trouble, and as much trou"bled then as we were of late, when Asdrubal mounted over the Alpes, and came down into "Italy. Asdrubal, I say, whom you (that will with your army compass not only Carthage, but also "all Affrick) let go out of your hands, and suffered to pass over into Italy. But you will say, that "you have vanquished him. Say you so? I would not for any thing, not only in regard of the love
 "I beare to the Common-weal, but also of the affection that I carry toward your self, that a van"quished man could find the way by you into Italy. Be content & suffer us to attribute all things "that have gone well with you or the Common-weal, during the time of your government, to "your wisdom and policy; and contrariwise, whatsoever hath fallen out cross and adverse, to im-"pute and assign the same to nothing else, but to the variable events of war, and to sickle fortune.

The

under their hand: & decreed it was that they two, namely Lucius Corneli & Quintus Caelius, should sithe.
 The better and more valiant that you are, the more need hath your native country, yes, and all Italy besides, to keep you still at home with them, to brave a captain, & rare a Protector. You cannot your own self discomble the matter, but confesse, That wheretoever Annibal is, there is the very head, the fort & strength of all this war; for as much as you pretend, that the only cause why you would passe into Africk, is to draw Annibal thither after you. Well then, be it here or be it there, with Annibal you must have to deal. Tell me then, whether we you like to be stronger Africk, your self alone, or here where your own forces and the power of your Collegues shal be joyned together? Is it possible that even the late example of Lucius and Claudius, so fresh in memory, should not inform and teach us, what difference there is between the one and the other? In whether place I pray you, will Annibal be more strong in men and munition; here in the utmost corner & angle of the Brutians country, where this long time he hath waited in vain for aid from home; where he hath sent for succour and gone without; or neer unto Carthage; and in the midst of Africk among his friends and allies? What kind of policy is this of yours, there to decide the quarrell and try the whole matter, where your own forces are lesse by a halfe moiety, and the power of your enemies much greater and stronger; rather then here, whereas you may fight with the power of two armies against one, toiled out of heart in so many battels, and wear-ed with long warfare, so tedious and grievous withall? Consider with your selfe, what conformity and resemblance there is, between your designs and your fathers. He, as Consul having made a journey into Spain, to the end that he might encounter Annibal as he come down the Alps, returned out of his own province into Italy; and you, when Annibal is in Italy, purpose to abandon and leave Italy. And why? forsooth not because you judge it good for the common weal, but because you think it an enterprize that may import you in great honour and glory: like as when you being captain General of the people of Rome, left your province at random and your army at six and seven, without warrant of law, without order or act of Senat, hazarded in two bothome the whole state and majesty of the Empire of Rome; which at that time together with the danger of your life, incurred the perill and jeopardy of the maine chance. To conclude, for mine own part (my LL. of the Senat,) am of this mind; and this is my conceit, that P. Cornelius was not created Col. privately for himself and his own behoof, but for the good of the commonweal and us all: and then the armies were levied and enrolled, for the guard of the City and defence of Italy; and not for the Col. in their proud self-conceit & overweening of themselves.
 D After the manner of absolute KK. to transport & lead into what parts of the world they list themselves. When Fabius by this oration (premeditated and framed to the time) had through his authority and the long settled and confirmed opinion that men had of his wisdom, drawn unto his side a good part of the Senat, and especially the ancients; inso much as the greater number commended and the grave counsell of the old man, above the lusty and youthfull courage of the other gallant; then Scipio by way of answer made these remonstrances, and spake in this wise. "My lords of the Senat, even Fabius himself in the beginning of his oration, said very well, that his opinion which he was to deliver, might be suspected of detraction and envy. Of which note, verily I durst not my self tax and accuse a man of his quality and reputation so much, as me thinks is not so well cleared as it ought to be the very suspicion it self: and I wot not whether it be by a default of his speech & oration, or that the thing it self is so pregnant. For in such maner he extolled with goodly words, and magnified his own dignities and renowned deeds, and alse quench the jealousie and crime of envy: as if my self was to fear the danger of emulation and concurrence of some companion of the basest degree and condition, and not of him, who because he far surpasseth other men, which height and pitch of honor I deny not, but I endeavour my self to reach unto) would not in any hand, that I should compare with him. So highly hath he advanced himself in regard of his old years: considering that he hath gone through all ranks and honours; and so low debased me, and put me down even under the age of his own ion; as though the desire and love of glory, should passe no farther then the length of mans life, and the greatest part there of extended not to the memory of posterity and the future time. This I hold for certain, that it is a thing incident to the most magnanimous men and of greatest spirit and courage, to have a desire for to match themselves not only with them that live in their daies, but with most famous & excellent personages, that ever were or might be in any age. And surely for mine own part, O Q. Fabius, I will not make it goodly, but frankly bewray my mind that way, namely, that I would full faine not only attain unto your praise-worthy acts and commendable vertues; but also (with your good leave be it spoken) if possible I can, even to excell and surmount the same. Therefore let us not ex-tray this mind, either you towards me, or I to those that are younger then my self, to be unwilling and think much, that any one citizen among us, should prove equall to our selves: for in so doing, we should offer wrong and do hurt not only to them whom we have envied and maligned, but also prejudice the common weal, in manner the whole state of all mankind. And thus much G to yourself. He hath now (my lords) requested, to what great perils I should enter into by the A-frick voyage in such sort, as he would seem not only to have a careful regard of the commonweal and the army, but also to pity me and tender my case and fortune. Whence cometh it, that you should all on a sudden take to great care for me; when my father and uncle both were slain, when their armies both twain, were utterly almost defeated and put all to the sword; when Spain was lost; when a number of Carthaginians, and 4 Generals, held all in fear by force of armes; when there was a captain sought for to undertake that war, and no man durst be seen to put

"put himself forward, no man so hardy as to present and offer his service, but my self: and when "the people of Rome had committed the charge and government of Spain to me a young man
 "but four and twenty years old: how hapned it that no man then took exception at my age, made "mention of the enemies force, discouraged of the difficulty and danger of the war, or laid abroad
 "the late and fresh defeat and death of my father and uncle? I would demand and gladly know "whether we have sustained now lately, some greater calamity and loss in Africk, than we re"ceived at that time in Spain? or if the armies at this present in Africk be more puissant, or the "captains more in number, or better in valour, then they were in Spain at that time? or whe"ther mine age then, was more ripe and sufficient to manage wars, then now it is? Last of all,
 "whether it be better, more commodious & easie, to maintain war with the Carthaginian enemy
 "in Spain, then in Africk? After that I have discomfited and put to flight four hosts of Cartha"ginians: after I have either forced by assault, or reduced under mine obedience (for fear) so ma"ny Cities: after I have vanquished and subdued all, even as far as to the Ocean sea, so many "princes and potentates, so many fierce and cruel nations: after I have so fully recovered Spain, as "there is not remaining to be seen there, so much as the footing and bare token of any war: an "easie matter it is, and all one to elevate and deprecate the acts past that I have achieved: as also "par-die it will be, when I return with conquest out of Africk, to debate and make nothing of "those very things, which now to keep me back from thence, and to make them appear strange, "are amplified with great words, & stretched upon the tainters to the full. He holdeth that there "is no access, no entrance into Africk, nor havens open to receive an armado. He telleth us and "allegeth that M. Atilius was taken prisoner in Africk, as if M. Atilius forsooth at his first arriv-
 "all in Africk, had caught that harm and heavy misfortune. But he never remembereth and cal-
 "leth to mind, how that even the very same captain, as infortunate as he was, yet found the haies
 "open enough into Africk: and the first year bare himself right valiantly and gloriously: & for "that of Carthaginian captains, continued invincible to the end. You shall never therefore "fear me with the example so much, (were it so, that the calamity you speak of, hapned in this "war, and not in the former: of late, and not forty years ago) that I should give over my intend"ed purpose, and not sail into Africk now, because Regulus there was taken prisoner: as well as "I passed before into Spain, whereas the Scipio chanced to be killed. Or that I shall infer, that "Zanthippus the Lacedemonian was born into this world more happy for Carthage, then my "self for Italy: but rather, that thereby I should think the better of my self, considering that the "virtue of one only man can be of such consequence and so great effect. But we ought (you say)
 "to consider the example of the Athenians, who leaving the war at home in their own country, "passed over into Sicily unadvisedly. Seeing you are at so good leisure, to tell tales and report "false fabulous stories of Greece: why discourse you not rather of Agathocles the king of the Syracu-
 "sans? who seeing that Sicily a long time was troubled & vexed with the Punick war, sailed over "into the self-same Africk whereof we speak, and withdrew the war thither from whence it "came? But what need I to instruct and teach you by rehearsing old and forrain examples, how "materiall a thing it is and important, to begin with an enemy first and put him in fear: and by "bringing another in danger, to remove the peril from our selves. Can there be a precedent found "more pregnant more present and fresh in memory to prove and enforce this point, then Anni-"bal himself? A great difference there is between the wasting and pilling the lands of others, and "seeing of our own burnt and destroyed. And he which giveth the assault to endanger another, "is ever of more courage then he that standeth upon his own guard and at defence only to save "himself. Moreover, the fear and dread is alwaies greater of things unknown unto us: but so "soon as a man is entered into the confines of a forrain country, he may behold and see at hand (as "well the good as the bad) what may advantage and what may endanger the enemies. *Anni-
 "bal*
 "would never have thought and hoped, that so many States in Italy would have revolted unto "him as they did upon the overthrow at Cannae. How much lesse account then may the Cartha"ginians make of any thing in Africk, to remain fast and assured unto them: who are fickle al"lies to strangers without all truth and fidelity: proud lords & intolerable tyrants over their "own subjects, full of wrath & cruelty? Over and besides, we albeit (we were forsaken and aban"doned of all our confederats) stood alwaies upon our own forces & maintained our selves with "more Roman souldiers: whereas in Carthage they have no strength of naturall citizens: the "souldiers that they have, are mercenaries all & waged for money partly Africans and partly Nu-
 "midians, the most unconstant nations of all others by nature, and aptest to entertain changes & "innovations. Let me have no stay and hindrance in this place only: ye shall hear news at one "time that I am set over in Africk that all the country there is up in a broil: that Anni-"bal is re-
 "dy to dislodge and remove out of these parts: & also that Carthage it self is besieged. Expect you "daily out of Africk better and luckier tidings, yea, and oftner then ye heard out of Spain. These "hopes of mine, I ground upon the fortune of the people of Rome: upon the justice of the gods "witnesses of the league broken by the enemies upon Syrax and Masaniassa, both Kings, whose "truth and fidelity I will trust so far forth as I find them, and ever stand in fear and doubt of their "falseness and treachery. Many things they are now, that by distance of place appear not, which "war once begun will soon discover. And this is a special point of a man indeed, & of a good cap"tain, in no case to be wanting unto fortune when she offereth herself, but to take all yamages
 "that she giveth: and those accidents and occurrences which fall by chance, so make use of them
 "yes,

A And by wisdom will contrive to secure them on his own purpose and designs. True B is, O Father, I shall have Annibal to be heard and to match me as a soldier, I count; as well as my own self; but I will not draw him after me, than he shall keep me back at home. Forcibly I will fight in his own country; and Carthage shall be the price of my victory, either then the domes, towers, and last ruin, port-castles of the Bruttii. Only provide, O Father, that in the mean time whyles I am at sea in my voyage, whyles I am landing mine army in Africa, whyles I approach Carthage with a running camp, the Common-weal suffer no harm and damage at home. Soe to this, I say, and be well advised, that it be not a shame-full reproach to say, that Lucius the Consul, a man of singular valour (who because he is the high Priest, and by vertue ther of, not to absent himself from the solemn celebration of sacrifices and divine service, was content and willing, that the charge of so distant a province should not befall unto him by calling lots) is not able to perform that, now when Annibal is half defeated, and his heart almost broken, which your self was sufficient to effect when Annibal was at the height, and braved all Ash like a conqueror. But let the case, and suppose I say, that by this course, which I mean to take, the war be never the sooner brought to an end: yet surely it were for the honour of the people of Rome, and for the reputation and name which they have among foreign princes and States abroad, that they might see and know, that our hearts are as not only to defend Ash but also to offend Ash, and that it might neither be thought, nor believed nor spoken nor noised abroad in the world, how no Roman captain durst adventure that which Annibal hath already dared and done: and when as in the former Punic war, when all the guilt was for Rome, our armies and armados so often assailed Ash: now that Ash is in question, Ash should be still, and be at rest. Nay, rather let Ash be at repose and quiet, now at last, after so long travail and affliction, and let Ash in her turn be fired and foraged and then while, Let the Roman camp be pitched rather under the very walls and gates of Carthage, then we see once again, that our wars the trench and rampier of our enemies, to invest our city. Let Ash be the scene place and seat of the war, let flight and flight, foraging and harrying of countries, revolt and rebellion of allies, and all other inconveniences and enormities that follow war, which have lien heavy upon us these 14 years, turn from us thither. It shall content and suffice us to have spoken as touching State matters to the common weal of the war presently in hand: and concerning the provinces and their government now in question and consultation, for it would require a long and tedious discourse, and the same importunate altogether unto your self. O Father, hath debated and depraved mine age in Spain; so I likewise should dil-grate mine and diminish his glory, and for out my self and mine own reputation with goodly and magnificent words. But my life, I will do neither one nor the other. And if in nothing else, yet in this wise, you may as I am, I will in modesty and government of my tongue go beyond mine old and ancient personage as he is. Thus have I lived, and thus have I carried my self in all mine actions; that without blasing of mine own praises, I can soon content my self with the good opinion which you of your selves have conceived and entertained of me. Annibal had audibly given him, with little indifference, and patience, because it was commonly voiced abroad: That if the Senate would not grant him to have the province and empire of Ash, he would immediately propound and put it to question before the people. Whereupon Q. Fabius, a man that had been four times Consul and Censor besides, required the Consul to speak his mind openly before the Senate, whether he would refer unto the LL. there assembled, to determine of the provinces, and stand to that which they should set down, or prefer the thing unto the people. When Gaius had made answer again and said: That he would do that which might be good and expedient for the service of the Common-weal: then Fabius replied upon him and said: I demand not this question of you, as ignorant what either you would answer, or what you intend to do. For I know full well, that ye pretend no less your self, that you do but sound the Senate, and feel rather how they had inclined, then to stand to any advice of theirs in good sadness. And in case we do not presently grant you the province according unto your desire, you have a bill drawn already to present unto the body of the people and Commonalty.
F And therefore (quoth he) my masters, ye that are Tribunes, I require your aid and assistance, in that I forbear to speak unto the point and deliver mine opinion: In this regard, because I know that the Consuls will not approve and raise the same, howsoever the whole house will go with me, and allow my sentence. Now upon arose some bridle debate among them, whyles the Consuls urged and enforced this point especially, and said, It was against all reason and equity, that the Tribunes should enterpose their authority, and not permit every Senator being requested to speak in his turn, to set deliver his mind and opinion. Then the Tribunes made a decree in this manner, if the Consuls be content that the Senate shall determine of the Provinces, we will and command, that all men rest in that which the Senate shall order and judge: neither will we suffer the same to be propounded unto the people: If he be not content nor yield thereto, then we will assist him who shall refuse to speak to the matter. Then the Consuls requested a dayes respite to confer with his Colleagues, and so the morrow after he considered to put all to the censure of the Senat. And in this while that the provinces distributed and appointed: unto one of the Consuls, Sicily was assigned, and unto the other of war with his own beak teeth (even the same that C. Servilius the year before had the charge of) with commission also to passe over in Ash, if he thought it were for the good of the Common-weal. The other Consul had the government of the Bruttii and the managing of the war against Annibal, with the power of that army which L. Veturius and Q. Caelius had cast

cast lots, agree between themselves who should remain still in the Brutian country, to follow the war there, with those two legions which the Consul left; and like whether of them should have that province, his government should be prolonged and continued for another year. The rest of the Pretors also and Consuls, who were to govern any province, or have the conduct of armies, had their commission renewed and sealed again for a longer term. Now it fell to Q. Caecilius his lot, to make war together with the Consul against Artemis in the Brutian country. After this, ensued the games and plaies of Scipio, which were quibbled and set forth with great concourse of people, and exceeding applause and affectionate favours of the beholders. M. Romanius Mabo, and Q. Catulus were sent as Ambassadors unto Delphos, to carry thither an offering and hateful gift of the booty and pillage of Asiarches to who presented there a crown of gold weighing two hundred pound: also certain counterfers resembling the spoils, which were made of silver, amounting to a thousand pound weight: Scipio when he could no longer leave granted to levy souldiers and take musters which he greatly feared not of, obtained thus much yet, that he might have with him in his train voluntary souldiers: as also receive whatsoever the Allies would contribute and give towards the building of new ships, because he had passed his word, that the City should not be charged with setting out an armada. And first and foremost, the States of Hetruria promised to help the Consul, every one according to their ability. The Centes came off, and granted to purvey corn and all kinds of victuals for the mariners and sailors, the Populonians to provide iron, the Tarquiniens to find sail-cloth, the Volaterrans to send all trappings and furniture belonging to ships, and also corn: the Aretines to confer 10000 cargets, as many morions or head-peeses, besides javellins, darts, saulchions, lances, and pikes, to the full number of fifty thousand, as many of the one sort as of the other, also axes, spades, and murricks, bills, fishes, and hooks, and sickles, meal, troughs and quern mills, as many as would serve to furnish forty long ships or gallies: of wheat 120000 Modii, and all voyage provision for the Decisions, petty captains, Mariners and Ore-men by the way. The Perusines, the Cinifines, the Rusellans offered fir trees for the framing and making of ships, and a great quantity of corn. But for this work, he occupied only the fir hewn out of the publick forest and waste. All the States of Umbria, the Nursines also, the Reatinens, Amitemines, and the whole country of the Sabines, made promise to help him to souldiers: the Maris, the peligni, and Marricines, in great number came of their own free wills, and were enrolled to serve at sea in the navy. The Comenses, being allies and confederates to the Romans, but not tied to any service, sent a brave company of six hundred men well armed. And when as there were set out the keels or bottoms of thirty ships, twenty Caravels of five course of oars, and ten of four, himself in person plied the carpenters and shipwrights so, and set forward the work that 45 daies after the timber was brought out of the wood, the ships were finished, rigged and furnished with all things, and shot into the water. So to Sicily he sailed with thirty long ships of war, having embarked therein almost seven thousand of voluntary servitors. P. Licinius also for his part, came into the Brutian country, unto the two consularie armies, of which he took unto him and chose that which L. Varrus the Consul had commanded, and suffered Metellus to have the leading still of those legions, which had been under his conduct before: supposing that he should more easily employ them in service because they were acquainted already with his manner of regiment and government. The Pretors likewise went into their sundry provinces. And because many was wanting for to decay the charges of the wars, the high Treasurers were commanded to make sale of all that tract of the Campanian country, which from the Greek Fosse extendeth towards the sea. And there was granted out a commission to give notice of those lands: and look what ground soever belonged to any citizen of Capua, it was confiscat to the use of the people of Rome: and for a reward to him that gave notice, there was assigned the tenth part of the mony, that the land was rated and prized at. Also C. Servilius the City Pretor, had given him in charge to take order that the Campanians should dwell where as they were allowed to inhabit by virtue of a decree granted forth by the Senat, and to punish those that dwelt elsewhere.

In the same summer Mago the son of Amilcar, being departed from the lesse Balgare Islands, where he abode the winter season, and embarked a chosen power of young and lusty men, sailed over into Italy with a fleet of thirty ships headed with brazen piked beaks, and many hulls of burden: and there he set land his souldiers, to the number of twelve thousand footmen, and welnear two thousand horse: and with his suddain coming surprised Genoa, by reason that there lay no garrisons in those parts to guard and defend the sea coasts. From thence he sailed along and arrived in the river of the Alpine Ligurians, to see if he could by his coming raise some commotion and rebellion. The Inganni (a people of the Ligurians) fortified to war at that present with certain mountainers the Epanterii. Whereupon Mago having laid up and bestowed safe of the prizes and pillage that when he won in Savona (a town upon the Alps) and left ten ships all war riding in the river, for a sufficient guard, and sent away the rest to Carthage to keep the coasts at home. (because there ran a mighty rumor, that Scipio would pass the seas, and over into Africa) himself, after he had concluded a league and amity with the Inganni (whose favour he more affected and esteemed then the other) set in hand to assaile the mountainers. Besides, his power increased daily: for that the Frenchmen flocked unto him in all parts, upon noise and voyce of his name. Intelligence hereof was given to the Senat by the letters of Sp. Lucretius who were with these news exceedingly troubled and perplexed; for fear lest they had rejoined in

A vain for the death of Asdrubal, and the defeat of his army two years before: in case there should arise from thence another war as great and dangerous as the other, differing in nothing else but the exchange of the General. And therefore they gave order and direction both to M. Livius the Pro-Consul, to come forward with his army of Voluntaries out of Tuscany into Ariminum: and also unto Cn. Servilius the City Praetor, (if he thought requisite and expedient for the Commonwealth) to commit the two legions of Citizens attending about Rome, to whomsoever he pleased, for to be commanded, and led forth of the City. So M. Valerius Levinus conducted those legions to Arretium.

B About the same time, certain hulks of the Carthaginians, to the number of fourscore, were boarded and taken about Sardinia, by Cn. Octavius, governor of that province. Catius writeth, that they were laden with corn and victuals sent unto Annibal. But Valerius reporteth, that as they were carrying the pillage taken in Etruria and certain prisoners of the Ligurian mountaineers, into Carthage, they were intercepted and surprized by the way. There was no memorable thing that year done in the Brutians country. The pestilence rained as well amongst the Romans as the Carthaginians, and they died thereof alike on both sides. Many the Carthaginian army, besides the plague, were afflicted also with famine. Annibal passed all that summer time near unto the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he built and reared an altar, and dedicated it with a glorious title of his worthy acts, engraven in Punick and Greek letters.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the nine and twentieth Book.

D Catius Laelius being sent from Scipio out of Sicily into Affrick, brought from thence a huge booty, and declared unto Scipio the credence and message that he had from Masaniila, who complained of him that he had not as yet passed over with his fleet into Affrick. The war in Spain which Indibilis had raised was dispatched: himself slain in the field: and Mandonius was delivered by his own men into the Romans hands that demanded him of them. Mago, who was in France and Liguria, had out of Affrick sent unto him both a great power of soldiers, and also money to wage aids: with a commission and precept to joyn himself unto Annibal. Scipio crossed the seas from Syracuse into the Brutia, and recovered the City Locri, after he had discomfited the garrison there, and put to flight Annibal. Peace was concluded with Philip. The goddess Dame Idæa was brought solemnly to Rome from Pessinus, by occasion of a prophesse found in the books of Sybilla to this effect: That then the foreign enemy might be driven out of Italy, when Dame Cybele of Idæa was brought to Rome. And to the Romans she was delivered by Attalus King of Asia. A thick stone it was, and nothing else, which the Inhabitants called the mother of the gods. P. Scipio Nasica, the son of that Cneus who was killed in Spain, judged by the Senat a right good man, one that was very young, and had not been yet so much as Questor, was he that received her: for it was by the Oracle imported, that the said goddess should be received by the best man of the City, and so dedicated. The Locrians sent their Embassadors to Rome, to complain of the outrage and cruelty of Q. Pleminius the Lieutenant: in that he had unjustly taken away the money consecrated to Proserpina, and villainously forced their wives and children. Pleminius was brought bound with chains to Rome, and there died in prison. There ran a false rumour of Pub. Scipio, (Pro-Consul in Sicily) and spread as far as to the City, that he should spend his time there in riot. Whereupon there were sent certain messengers from the Senat for to enquire and see whether those reports were true. And Scipio being cleared from all infamy, by the permission and good leave of the Senat, sailed over into Affrick. Syphax affianced and wedded the daughter of Asdrubal the son of Gisco: and thereupon renounced clean the amity which he had contracted with Scipio. Masaniila the King of the Adassylans, whiles he served in the war: in defence of the Carthaginians quarrel within Spain, after he had lost his father Gala, was withall dispossessed of his kingdom. And when he had oftentimes fought to recover it again by war, he was in certain battels vanquished by Syphax King of the Numidians, and utterly deprived of his royall dignity. So with two hundred horsemen he joyned as a banished person with Scipio: and with him, immediately in the first battell, he slew Hannio the son of Amilcar, together with a great number of men. Scipio upon the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax, who were almost 100000 strong, was compelled to break up the siege at Utica: and so he fortified a standing camp for winter harbour. Sempronius the Consul had a fortunate battel against Annibal in the territory of Croton. The Censors held a solemn review and purging of the City, and numbered the people: In which survey taken, there were assessed in their books 215000 Citizens. Between the two Censors M. Livius and Claudius Nero there fell out a notable discord: for C. Claudius took from Livius (companion with him in office) his horse of service: for that he had been sometimes condemned by the people of Rome, and driven into exile. And Livius again did he like by him, because he had born false witness against him, and not dealt bona fide with him, considering the reconciliation between them, wherein wherein they seemed to be made good friends again. The same Livius left all the tribes but one, disfranchised, and caused them to pay tribute as no denizens, for that they had both condemned him being innocent, and also made him a Consul and Censor afterwards.

The nine and twentieth book of T. Livius.

Scipio after he was arrived in Sicily, disposed his voluntary souldiers in order, and enrolled them by Centuries. Over and besides them he had about him three hundred lusty tall fellows, for the flower of their age and strength of body, the bravest men of all others: but they wist not themselves for what purpose they were reserved; being neither assigned to any colours under a Captain, nor so much as armed at all. Then he made choice from out of the whole manhood and youth of Sicily three hundred men of arms, such as for birth and wealth were the very principall and best in the Island, who were to pass over with him into into Affrick: and he appointed them a day, upon which they should all present themselves in readines, furnished and appointed in the best manner with horse and armor. This warfare so far from home was like to be irksome unto them, and to bring with it much trouble, many difficulties and dangers, as well by sea as land. The consideration and fear hereof mightily disquieted not only the parties themselves, but also their parents and kinsfolk. Now when the day appointed was come, they shewed their horses and armour. Then Scipio made a speech unto them, and said, "That he was given to understand, that certain Sicilian horsemen stood in great fear and dread of this souldiery, as being a sore and painfull piece of service: In case then (quoth he) there be any of you so minded and disposed indeed, I had rather you would now presently be known thereof unto me, and confesse at once, then hereafter to whine and complain, and so to prove lazy lubbers and unprofitable souldiers to the Common-wealth. And therefore utter your minds in plain terms, and I will be content to hear you without offence. Whereupon, when as one of them took a good heart, and said flatly, "Thar if it lay in his choice freely to do what he would, he was altogether unwilling to serve: then Scipio answered him again in this manner, Forasmuch as (my youth) thou hast not dissembled thy hearts grief, but spoken out what thou thinkest, I will soon depute one in thy turn, unto whom thou maiest deliver thy armour, thy horse, and other furniture of warfare, and whom thou shalt forthwith have home with thee, there to train, teach, & exercise him after thou hast given him thy horse and armor. The young man was glad hereof, and accepted the offer upon that condition: and so he assigned unto him one of those three hundred abovesaid, whom he kept about himself unarmed. When the rest saw that horseman in this manner discharged of his service, and that with the favour and good will of the L. General: every man then began to speak for himself, and to make excuses, and took others in their stead. Thus for the three hundred Sicilians were substituted as many Roman horsemen, without any expences at all of the State. And the Sicilians themselves had the charge of instructing and training them up. For the Generall had made an Edict and Proclamation, That whosoever did not so, should serve himself in person. This proved by report a brave corner of horsemen above the rest; and in many battels performed right good service to the Common-wealth. After this, he took a survey of the legions or footmen: and all those who had born arms longest in the wars he selected forth, especially such as had been employed under the conduct of Marcellus. For those he well wist to have been brought under the best discipline of warfare, and also by reason of the long siege of Syracuse, to be most skilfull in assaulting of Cities. For now they were no small matters that he had in his head, but he plotted even the very destruction and ruin of great Carthage. After this, he divided his army and placed severall forces in sundry towns. The Cities of Sicily he enjoined to provide corn: he made spare of that which was brought out of Italy: the old ships he newly repaired and rigged, and with them he sent Leilius into Affrick for to prey upon the country and fetch in prizes, the new which rid at Panormus he drew up to land, that they might all winter long lie upon dry ground, and be seasoned, because they were made in haste of green timber. When he had prepared all things necessary for war, he came to the City of Syracuse, which as yet was not in good order and well quieted, since the great troubles of the late wars. For the Greeks made claim for their goods, granted unto them by the Senat of Rome, which certain of the Italian nation detained and withheld from them by the same violence, wherewith in time of war they had possessed themselves thereof. He supposing it meet and requisite to maintain above all things, the credit of the State; partly by vertue of an edict and commandment, and partly by a civill course and process of law against such as were obstinate and avowed their wrongs done, he forced them to make restitution to the Syracusians. This act of his pleased not only them, but also all the states of Sicily: and therefore they were more willing and forward to help him in the wars.

The same summer there arose in Spain great troubles, raised by the means of Indibilis the Illegite. For no other occasion or reason in the world, but because in regard of the high admiration of Scipio, all other Captains besides whatsoever were but despised. Him they supposed to be the only General that the Romans had left, now that all the rest were slain by Annibal. And hereupon it was (thought they) that when the two Scipios were killed, they had no other to send into Spain but him: and afterwards, when the wars grew hot in Italy, he was the only man sent for over to match with Annibal. And over and besides that, the Romans had now in Spain no Cap-

A Naturally, but in her name and showe: the old experienced army also was from thence withdrawn: all things are out of frame, and in great confusion & noise there, but a disordered sort of Spanish water fouldiers: And never they looked to have againe the like occasion & opportunity to recover Spain out of their hands: For hitherto they had ever been in subjection to that day, either to the Carthaginians or the Romans, and not alwaies to the one or the other, by turns, but rather by fits and starts once. And like as the Carthaginians have been driven out by the Romans: so may the Romans be expelled by the Spaniards, if they would hold together. So that in the end Spain being freed from all forraign war, might be restored for ever to the ancient costumes and rights of the country. With these and such like suggestions and discouries, he sollici-ted and moved not only his own subjects and countymen, but the Ausetans also, a neighbour nation, yet to other Cities and Cities that bordered upon his and their confines: so as within few daies there assembled together into the territory of the Sedetans (according to an Edict published abroad) thirty thousand foot, and fast upon four thousand horsemen.

The Roman Captains likewise for their part, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, left by neglect of the first beginning the war might grow to a greater head, joyned their forces together, and marching through the country of the Ausetans, as peaceably as if they had been friends, (not withstanding they were known enemies) came to the very place where they were encamped and pitched themselves within three miles of the enemies. At the first they assayed by way of Embassage to deal with them, and so perswade them to lay aside all arms and hostility: but they laboured in vain. Afterwards when as the Spanish horsemen gave charge suddenly upon certain Romans that were foraging, the Romans also sent out from their Stations and Corps de guard their Cavalry to rescue: so the horsemen skirmished, but no memorable act or speak of was effected on the one side or the other. The next morrow by sun-rising the enemies all shewed themselves armed and in order of battell, and braved the Romans within a mile of their Camp. The Ausetans were marshalled in the main battell: the Ilergetes in the right point, and certain other Spanish nations of base and mean account in the left: between both those wings and the battell, of either hand they left certain wide and void places, whereas when the time served they might put forth their horsemen. The Romans having embattelled and put themselves in array after their old and usual manner, yet in this one thing followed the examples of the enemies, in leaving out certain open waies between the legions for the men of arms to pass through. But Lentulus supposing that the use of the horse-service would be advantageous to that part which first should send out their Cavalry into the battell of the enemies, that lay so open with spaces between, gave commandment to Sar. Cornelius Knight Marshall or Tribune, to will and charge the Cavalry to set so with their horses, and to enter those open lanes between the enemies battailions. And himself having sped but badly in beginning the fight with footmen so rashly, staid no longer, but untill he had brought the thirteenth legion (which was set in the left wing opposite to the Ilergetes) out of the rearward into the vanguard, for to succour and strengthen the twelfth legion, which already began to shrink and give ground. After that once the skirmish there was equal and fought on even hand, he advanced forward to L. Manlius, who in the forefront of the battell was busie in encouraging his men, and sending supplies and succours into all parts where he saw needfull:

showing unto him, that all was well and whole in the left point, and that he had sent out Cornelius with his horsemen, would like a tempestuous storm come upon them, and soon overcast and bespread the enemies round about. The word was not so soon spoken, but the Roman horsemen were ridden within the thickest of the enemies, and not only disordered the arrais and companies of the footmen, but also at once shut up the waies and passages that the Spaniards could not make out with their horsemen. And therefore the Spaniards leaving to fight on horseback, alight on foot. The Roman Generals seeing the ranks and files of the enemies disarrai-ed, themselves in fright and fear, and their ensignes waving up and down every way: tell to exhorting, yes, to entreating of their own Infantry to recharge them with all their force, whiles they were thus troubled and disbanded, and not suffer them to come into order, and re-enforce the battell again. And surely the barbarous people had never been able to abide their violent impression, but that Indibilis himself their Prince and Lord, together with the men of arms that were now dismounted on foot, made head against the ensignes of the footmen in the vanguard. Whereupon ensued a sharp and cruell fight for a good while. At length, when as they that fought about their Prince (who first, although he were half dead, yet stood their ground, and afterwards with a javelin was nailed to the earth) were overwhelmed with darts, and slain: then they began to flie on all hands: but the greater number were killed in the place, because both the horsemen had no time nor space to recover their horses, and mount upon them again, and also the Romans pressed so hotly upon them after they were once discomfited, and never gave over untill they had stript the enemies quite out of their Camp. So there died that day thirteen thousand Spaniards, and well near eight hundred were taken prisoners. Of Romans and Allies, not many more than two hundred left their lives behind them, and those especially in the left point. The Spaniards, that either were driven out of their Camp, or escaped out of the battell, first ran scattered and disperied over the fields, and afterwards returned every man to his own City where he dwelt.

The Indibilis summoned them to a generall council: where they all bewailed their calamities & miseries, greatly blamed the authors of the war, and agreed in the end to send their embas-sadors

sadors to give up their arms, and to yield their bodies. Those having professed themselves and laid the whole fault upon Sabinus & the rest of the Princes who were the starters of the wars were for the most part slain themselves for their labour in the field, yielded up their armour and themselves, and received this answer from the Romans: That they should be received to mercy, and their submission accepted, if they would deliver alive into their hands Antiochus, and the rest that were the breakers of peace. Otherwise, they threatened to lead their forces into the territories of the Illegates and Antians, and so forward, of the other nations their complices in that rebellion. With this answer the Orators departed, and related the same in the Council assembled. Where Mandonius and the rest of their Lords were apprehended & delivered to the Romans for to be punished and executed accordingly. So the States of Spain obtained peace again: and a double tribute for that year was imposed upon them, and they enjoyed to provide corn to serve the army six months, besides soldiers liversies, short coats, and side cassocks, and they received hostages well near of thirty Cities. Thus the troubles and rebellions of Spain being begun and ended after this manner, without any great doo within few daies, all the sorte of the war turned upon Africa.

C. Laelius being arrived in the night at Hippo Royall, by the break of the day, led forth with banner displayed in order of battell all his souldiers and matiners, for to harrey and spoil the country. And finding the inhabitants there retchless and careles, and living in security as in time of peace, they did much hurt and annoied them sore. Whereupon the news went in post to Carthage, for all on a hurry, & put them in exceeding great fear. For it was reported, that the Roman Armado was arrived, and that Scipio the General was landed (for the rumour ran before, how he was passed over already into Sicily.) And because they never desried the ships, nor discovered certainly what power of men invaded and spoiled the country, they thought the most and doubted the worst, as fear commonly maketh every thing more than it is. And for at first they were only affrighted and terrified: but afterwards they grew melancholly and troubled in spirit in these terms: to think, "That fortune should so much be changed, that they, who a little before as noble conquerors, had lain encamped with an army before the walls of Rome, defeated so many hosts of enemies, and either by meer force or meer love, held all the States of Italy under their Signory, should now themselves see the wheel so turn about, as they were like shortly to behold the wasting and spoiling of Africa, and the City of Carthage besieged: a thing that they were never able to endure with that valour and resolution, nor to abide with such strength as the Romans had. For the Romans had ever the Commons of Rome: they had alwaies the youth of Latium ready at hand: who still increased more and more the new City, and daily grew in number to multitude, and to repair & furnish out so many armies that were defeated. Whereas, their natural people were neither in town nor country fit for service, their olds were waged and hired for money from among the Africans, a nation like to turn upon any accident, & to change with every pulse and puff of vain hope, and were besides false and untruthful in their promise. For now the Kings already, Syphax and Masaniissa, the one upon conference with Scipio is secretly alienated from us in heart, and the other openly revolved in action, and become our most deadly enemy: so that there remaineth neither help nor hope for us at all in any place. For neither Mago is able in God to make any commotions and rebellion, nor yet to joyn with Antiochus. And as for Antiochus himself, he weareth apace, and decarieth daily both in fame and reputation, and also in strength and forcible means. When their minds being thus disquieted upon those fresh and present things, they were faine to bewail and lament their wooll state, the instant danger recalled them again to consult by what means they might withstand the imminent perils. So they thought good to call the musters in all haste both in the City and the countries by, to send some to levy and wage the olds of the Africans, to fortifie their City, to bring in store of grain, to provide weapons and armour, to rig their navy & to send it out to Hippo, for to encounter the Roman Armado. Whiles they were devising these courses, there came at last a post with news, that it was Laelius and not Scipio who was set ashore: that there was indeed no greater power than for to make rodes into the country for booties only: and as for the main strength of the whole army, it remained still in Sicily. So they had some respite to breath themselves, & began to address their Embassies to Syphax and to other Princes, for to establish and confirm peace and league between them. They dispatched others also to Philip, who should make promise unto him of two hundred talents of silver, in case he would take the seas and pass over either into Sicily or Italy. Messengers also were sent as far as into Africa unto their own Generals serving there, to will them to raise what troubles they could possibly, for to keep Scipio a work, and hold him back from coming into Africa. And unto Mago were sent not only those messengers aforesaid, but also five and twenty long ships of war, six thousand footmen, eight hundred horsemen, seven Elephants, and great store of treasure besides for to hire aids, whereby he might advance forward with his forces nearer to Rome, and joyn with Antiochus. These preparations were making, and these courses devising at Carthage, when as Masaniissa upon the bruite that went of the arrivall of the Roman Beers, began to stir up and rouse himself: and accompanied with some few horsemen, came unto Laelius, busie in driving still great booties out of the country, which he found altogether disarmed of armour, and unprovided of guards and garrisons for defence. He much complained that Scipio was so slack in his affairs, and graved that he had not passed over ere this time with an army into Africa. Whiles the Carthaginians were thus affrighted, whiles Syphax was troubled with the wars of the borders of whom he was thus much perswaded, that if he might have resting time to compose his own affairs

A "to his mind, he would not continue fast unto the Romans, nor deal in any thing faithfully and "sondly with them: willing him to solicit Scipio, yet and to spur him on and importune him not "to stand longer at a bay and make delays. And for his own part, notwithstanding he were dis-
 "seized of his fathers Kingdom, yet he would be ready to assist him with such a power of foot and "horse as were worth God smerty: advising Lalinus withal not to make any longer stay in Africa,
 "for asmuch as he believed verily, that there was a fleet already set out from Carthage, with "which in the absence of Scipio, he might not with safety enter into conflict and battail. After "this communication, Masaniissa was dismissed, and Lalinus the next day loosed from Hippo, with "his ships laden with pillage and prizes: and being returned into Sicily, declared unto Scipio the "counsel and credence that he had from Masaniissa.

B About the very same time those ships which were sent from Carthage to Mago, coasting along "the Albigians and the Ligurians, arrived at Genoa. It fortuned that Mago at that time, lay with "his fleet in those parts: who upon the words of the messengers, & the commission to raise as great "forces as possibly he could, immediately held a counsel of the Frenchmen and Ligurians: for of both "nations there were great numbers in those coasts. "Where before them all he declared how he "was sent unto them for to set them at liberty: and how (as they might see themselves) to that "effect he was furnished with new aid and succour from home. But what forces, and how great "an army was needful for the managing of the war in hand, it lay in them to determine. As for "himself, first and foremost he knew full well, that there were two Roman armies abroad, the one in "France, the other in Tuscan: and that Sp. Lutatius would joyn with As. Drusus: and therefore C "they themselves were to put many a thousand in arms for to make head against two Generals, &

 "two compleat armies of Romans. The Frenchmen made answer again, That their will was good "enough, and they had an exceeding desire to compass and effect the designment intended: but "for asmuch as the Romans had one camp within their confines, and another in Tuscan near ad-
 "joyning, and in manner within sight: if peradventure they should be seen in the actions to aid the "Carthaginians: importunately both armies, as well the one as the other would in all manner of "hostility invade their territories: and therefore they requested him to desire of the Gauls such "things, wherein they might stand him in stead secretly under hand, as for the Ligurians, because "the Romans lay far enough off encompassed from their Lands & Cities, they might dispose well e"nough of themselves as they list: and therefore it was good reason that they should put their D "young & able men in arms & bear a part in the managing of the war. The Ligurians refused not.

 "Only they craved respite of two months for to take the matters. In the mean time Mago, having "sent away the Gauls, closed took up & pitch foulliers through their country Towns for mo"ney. And from the States of France there was sent secretly provision of victuals of all sorts unto him.
 "After this Mago led his army of Voluntaries out of Tuscan into France, and having united his "forces unto Lucius in his power, was ready to receive and welcome Mago, if haply he removed "out of the Ligurians country nearer to the City of Rome: but in case Mago kept himself quiet in "a corner under the Alps, he minded also himself there to keep his standing leaguer about Ariminum,
 "for the guard and defence of Italy.

E After the return of C. Lalinus out of Africa, both Scipio was picked forward by the instigations
 "and persuasions of Masaniissa: and also his soldiers, seeing great prizes brought out of the ene"mies Land, and every day brought therewith: were mightily incensed and set on fire with a burn"ing desire to be transported over thither with all speed possible. But as they were plotting about "this enterprise of greater importance, they thought also upon a lesser that came between, name"ly the winning again of the City of Larva, which in the general revolt of all Italy, had sided also "with the Carthaginians. The first hope that they conceived both to affect and effect this enter"prise grew upon a very foolish manner: by occasion that in the Britannic country, the whole man"ner of service was performed by way of robbing and roving, rather than by any ordinary course "of war. The Mumidians first began, and the Amisii soon took it up and seconded them: not so "much because they would keep the Carthaginians company, and do as they did: but for that of F their own names in reputation were prone, and ready enough to follow that course. At last

 "the Roman soldiers also, seeing as it were by their example, took delight in robberies: and so "far forth as they might have have of their Captains, would make inroads into the territories of "their enemies. It fortuned so, that when some of them were gone abroad a plundering, certain "Larvians were intercepted, and brought away with them to Italy. In which number of cap"tives, were some carpenters and masons, who as it chanced, were hired to work for the Cartha"ginians in the Castle of Larva. These were discovered and known by certain great men, and the "principal Citizens of the Larvians, who hapned about of some banished persons in Rome: such "as by the contrary faction that headed with Annibal and had delivered Larva into his hands, were "driven out of the City. These men fell to questioning with them (as commonly their manner is,

G "now have been long out of their own Country) of many matters, and among the rest, how all "things went at home, who sold them all particulars and therewith, put them in some good "hope, that if they might be restored, for as large, and free home again, they would betray the "City unto them: forasmuch as within is they dwelt, and the Carthaginians put them in trust of "all things there. They therefore, as men that were wonderful desirous to return thither, as well
 "for love of their native country, as for to be revenged of their adversaries, one of hand sold their "mystery and ayes they had given order how to watch the Seas, and in what sort: as also agreed "upon

upon the signs and tokens which they should mark from on high a far off, they were sent back again. Then the exiled Locrians repaired unto Scipio at Syracusa, with whom also were others of the banished persons of Locri: and there they related unto him the promises of the captives aforesaid, and put the Consul in very good hope that the effect would be correspondent to their designment. With them were sent two Tribuns or Marshals, to wit, M. Sergius and P. Maternus, with commission to conduct three thousand souldiers from Rhegium to Locri. Letters also were dispatched unto Q. Plinius the Vice-pretor, for to be assistant in this action. Who being departed from Rhegium, and carrying with them scaling ladders, proportioned to the height of the Castle wall fore-told unto them, about midnight gave a token by fire to those that were to betray the Castle, from that place which they had agreed upon: who being in readiness also, and looking wittily for them, put down likewise ladders of their own, made for the purpose; and in many places at once received them that climbed up: so as, before there was any alarm heard, they were upon the watch of the Carthaginians, fast asleep as they were, and distrusting no such matter: who first were heard to groane as they lay a dying, but afterwards, to make a noise and keep a running and much ado, upon their suddain starting from sleep, all the whiles that they wist not of the occasion was. At length, upon the discovery of the matter, one man awakened another, and every one called aloud to arms crying out, that the enemies were within the Castle, and the watchmen slain. And without question, the Romans had been put to the worse and defeated quite, being far fewer in number than the enemies, but that there was an outcry and shout set up by them that were without the fortress: which so long as men knew not from whence it came, put them in in great fear: and the tumult besides by night made every small and vain thing much greater than it was. By means whereof, the Carthaginians astonished (as if all places had been full of enemies) abandoned all fight, and betook themselves into the other fortress (for two there were distant not far asunder.) The Townsmen kept possession of the City, as the prize and guerdon in the mids, for the winners. But out of the two Castles there were light skirmishes every day. Q. Plinius was Captain of the fort and garrison of the Romans, and Amilcar over the Carthaginians: and both parts increased their strength, by aids that they had coming unto them from the places adjoining. Until at last Annibal shewed himself in person: and no doubt the Romans had never been able to hold out, but that the whole multitude of the Locrenians were galled and grieved with the proud government and the covetous polling of the Carthaginians, took part with the Romans. When intelligence came to Scipio, that the Romans were distressed in Locri, and that Annibal himself was advancing thither: for fear lest the garrison also should be in some hazard (as having no ready means to retire from thence) himself leaving at Messana his brother L. Scipio for the guard of the place, passed over from thence with his vessels down the water, when he espied the current and the tide together to serve for a fare. Likewise Annibal having sent out a vanguard from the River Butrains (which is not far from the City Locri) to signify unto his men, that by day light they should give a hot charge with all their might and main upon the Locrenians and Romans both, whiles he himself made an assault upon the Town behind, not looking for him, but wholly turned away and amused upon that other tumult. Now when as early in the morning he found the skirmish begun, he was not willing to put himself within the Castle, for fear of pesterling with over great a company the place so strait and of so small receipt: and for to scale the walls they had brought no ladders with them. So causing all their carriages and packs to be piled up in one heap together, he presented all his footmen in battail array before the City, to terrifie his enemies withal: and with the Numidian horsemen he made a bravado under the walls, and rode about the City. Whiles the ladders and other ordinance meet to give an assault, were in preparing and making ready, he approached on horseback neer to the wall, for to view on which part above the rest, he might give the assault: and there he was shot with a quarrel discharged from an engine called a Scorpion, which hapned to be planted neer unto him. And being affrighted at this so dangerous an occurrent, he commanded to sound the retreat, and fortified his camp aloof without the peril and shot of any dart. Now was the Roman fleet from Messana arrived at Locri, and had the day afore them: so as they were all set a land, and entered the City before the sun setting. The morrow after, the Carthaginians began to skirmish out of the Castle: and Annibal being now provided of ladders, and having all things else in readiness needful for the assault, came under the walls: with that, all upon a suddain the Romans set open a gate and sallied out upon him, who feared nothing less than any such accident: and thus setting upon them at unawares, slew two hundred of them. Annibal perceiving that the Consul was there, retired with the rest into the camp: and after he had sent a messenger to them that were within the Castle, willing them to shift for themselves, in the night season he dislodged and departed. They also who were in the fort, after they had set on fire the houses which were in their keeping, of purpose by that tumult to cause the enemy to make some stay and tarry behind, ran away in manner of a rout, and before it was night with good foxmanship overtook their own company. Scipio seeing as well this Castle quit by the enemy, as their camp also empty, called the Locrenses to a general assembly, and gave them a sharp check, and rebuked them for their revolt. The principal Captains & Authors of that trespass he punished with death, and gave away their goods to the chief heads of the other faction, in reward and consideration of their singular fidelity to the Romans. But as concerning the publick State of the Locrians, he said he would neither make nor meddle therewith, either in giving to them, or taking ought at all from them. But willed them to send their Embassadors to

Rome,

A Rome, and look what the Senat. would award in equity, that fortune they should abide. This one thing he was well assured of, that how illsoever they had deserved of the people of Rome, yet they should live in better condition under the signory of the Romans, provoked to anger as they were, than they had already under the government of Carthaginians, pretending love and amity as they did.

Then himself in person set over to Messana with those forces that he brought with him, leaving Plinius his Lieutenant, and that power that won the Castle, in garrison for the defence of the City. The citizens of Locri had been so proudly misused, and so cruelly handled by the Carthaginians, after they were revolved from the Romans, that it seemed they could be content to abide any small wrongs, not only patiently but also willingly, and in manner with a glad heart. But so far now exceeded Plinius, Aemilius the former captain of the garrison, so far went the Roman garrison soldiers, before the Carthaginians in wickedness & avarice, that a man would have thought they had strove together who should pais the other in sinful vice and ungodliness, and not in feats of arms and prowess. For neither Captain nor souldier forbore to practise upon the poor Townsmen any enormous facts, which are wont to make the great & mighty men odious unto the poor and meaner persons. They wrought and committed shameful villainies upon their very bodies; upon their wives and children. And their greedy avarice so far proceeded, that they could not hold their hands from spoiling and robbing the very religions and sacred Temples. Inasmuch, as among other holy Churches which they polluted, they met even with the rich measure of Proserpina, which had lain still in all ages, and untouched by all others: save only it was reported to have been pill'd by Syracus, who indeed carried away the spoil of her, but he dearly bought it, and paid full sweetly for that sacrilege. And therefore like as before time the Kings ships shaken with tempests, and torn and split with the rage of the Sea, brought nothing at all in that wreck safe to Land, but only that sacred mony of the goddess, which they had stoln and carried away; even so at this present, the very same mony (but in another kind of calamity and misery) brought upon all them that were tainted in that wicked action of robbing the Temple, a strange & frantick madnesse, which caused Captain against Captain, and souldier against souldier, to fare as if they were stark mad, and enraged as mortal enemies one with another. Plinius had the chief rule and command of all. As for the souldiers, some were under him, such as himself had brought from Rhegium; others were commanded by the Tribuns of Colonis. Now it chanced that one of Plinius his souldiers had stoln a silver cup out of a Townsmans house, and ran away when he had done; and the owners after him with line and cry, and fortune to come in the way, and to meet with Syracus & Mammius the two Tribuns or Colonels full in the face. Whereupon the cup was taken from him by the commandment of the Tribuns; and thence arose first a brail, and some hard words, were dealt between; and from them consequently they went to open clamors and loud outcries, until at length there grew a very fray between the souldiers of Plinius and of the Tribuns; and according as they came still one or other in time to help their own side, both the number and the riot increased at once. In the end, Plinius his men went away with the blows, and managed themselves unto Plinius, running to him, with open mouth and great indignation, shewing their bloody wounds: and reporting besides, what opprobrious words to his disgrace had passed against him without spare, in the time of those brawling fits. Hereupon in a great choler and boyling heat of blood, he gat him forth of doors in all the hast; convented the Tribuns before him, and commanded them to be stripped naked, and the rods to be brought forth ready for to scourge them. But whiles there was some time spent in turning them out of their apparel & uncasing them (for they singled & made resistance, and called to their souldiers for help) all at once they came thick about them: (for very lusty they were upon their fierst victory) and ran from all places, as if the alarm bell had been rung against the coming of some enemies. But when they saw once the bodies of their Tribunes rawed with rods, then they fell into far more furious rage and a very fit of madnesse, and thus incensed as they were, without all regard, not only of the reverent majesty of authority, but also of common humanity, they fell upon the Lieutenant himself, after they had most pitiouly beaten and evil intreated his Lictors and Officers about him. Then having singled him out apart from his assistants and Sergeants, they cruelly mangled him, cut off his nose, crops his ears, and left him for dead. News hereof came to Messana, and within few dayes Scipio highed him apore to Locri in a gally directed with six banks of oars: who after due examination and hearing of the cause between Plinius and the Tribuns, acquit Plinius as innocent, and left him Governor of the garrison of the place: but he judged the Tribuns guilty, as Malefactors, and caused them to be bound in chains for to be sent to Rome unto the Senat: and so he returned to Messana, and from thence to Syracus. Plinius not able to over-rule his anger, and thinking that Scipio had dealt but coldly and negligently in the matter, and made too light of the injury which he had received, and not punished the offenders accordingly; and supposing that there was no man else able to make true estimate of the cause, but he that in his own person had felt the indignity and hainousness thereof, commanded the Tribuns to be haled before him, and after he had put them to all the cruel torments, that any mans body is able to abide, he put them to death: and not satisfied either with their dolorous torture whiles they were quick, nor with taking their lives from them, cast their dead bodies forth into the fields, there to lie as howe ground unhonored. The like cruelty he exercised upon the principal Burgeses of the Locrians, such as he heard say went to Scipio for to make complaint of his wrongs and injuries. And look what foul and shameful pranks he had plaid afore with his friends and allies, proceeding of lust and covetousness; the same now in his fell and furious rage he multiplied and wrought in divers sorts: so as he brought infamy, hatred and obloquy, not only upon himself, but also made the world to think hardly, and to speak much shame of the General himself.

Now drew the time neer of the solemn election of Magistrats; when as there came letters to Rome from Pub. Licinius the Consul, the tenor whereof was to this effect: That himself and his army were sore visited with a grievous sickness: and that he could not possibly have staid there, but that the violent contagion and influence of the same malady, if not greater & more grievous, had not assailed the enemies. Seeing that therefore himself was not able to come unto the election, he was minded, if it might so stand with the good liking of the Lords of the Senat, to nominate as Dictator Q. Cæcilius Metellus, for to hold the foresaid election. And as for the army of Q. Cæcilius, it was for the good of the Common-weal that it should be called and discharged, since that there was no employment of them at this present: considering that Annibal was retired already with his forces into his standing camp, and taken up his wintering harbor; and again, the pestilence grew so hot in that leaguer of his, that if they were not discharged betimes, there was not one of them like to escape and remain alive. In these points, the Ld. of the Senat granted out their commission unto the Consul, for to do according as himself thought to stand either with his own credit and trust committed unto him, or the benefit of the Common-weal.

At the very same time there was a certain religious opinion that had possessed of a fiddain the whole City, by occasion of a certain Prophecie found in the books of Sibylla. When search was made into them and they diligently perused, about the raining of stones, which happed so often that year. The Prophecie ran in this form: "At what time soever an enemy of a strange and foreign countrey, shall happen to make war upon Italy, he may be chased out of Italy and vanquished, if the goddess dame Cybele of Ida, were brought to Rome from Pessinus. This Prophecie found by the Decemvirs, moved the Senat the more, for that, the Embassadors also who carried the oblation and present afore said to Delphos, related, That as they themselves sacrificed unto Pythius Apollo, all the inwards of the beast killed for sacrifice, appeared good and shewed prosperity: and the Oracle besides gave answer, That there was a far greater victory toward the people of Rome than that was, out of the spoils whereof they brought gifts and offered to the God at this present. And for to make up and fully accomplish these hopes, they allaged wishal, how P. Scipio in demanding the Province of Affrich, did preface (as it were) before hand in his mind the final end of this war. To the end therefore, that they might with more speed obtain this honorable victory thus fore-tokened, and offering (as it were) it self, by all lucky presagings of men and Oracles of the Gods, they thought and devised some mean to transport the said goddesses to Rome.

The people of Rome in those dayes was confedered with no States of Asia: howbeit the LL. calling to mind, how long ago, upon occasion of a sickness, and to purchase health unto the people, Esculapius was sent for likewise out of Greece, before it was joynted with the City of Rome in any league or society: and considering wishal, that there was some friendship and amity begun already with King Attalus (in regard of the commonwar against Philip) and that he would be ready to do for the people of Rome, whatsoever lay in his power, they resolved to send unto him an honorable Embassage to wit, M. Valerius Lebinus, who had been twice Consul, and had wonned in Greece; M. Cæcilius Metellus, who had been a Pretor, and Servius Sulpicius Galba likewise an Edile, and two late Questors, C. Tremelius Flaccus, and M. Valerius Falco. For these five, they assigned five Quinquerems or Gallies of five ranks of oars, that according to the credit and dignity of the people of Rome, they should make a voyage into those Landis, with whom they were to win a reputation and Majesty to the Roman name and State. These Embassadors, as they held on their course toward Asia, so soon as they were put on Land at Delphos, repaired directly to the Oracle for to know what good hope it might afford unto them and the people of Rome, of effecting that business and commission, about the which they were sent forth. And this answer by report, was returned to them again, That they should obtain their desire, and effectuate their purpose by the means of Attalus the King: advising them moreover, That when they had conveyed the said goddess down to Rome, they should take order, that the very best man of all others in the City, should give her lodging and entertainment. But to proceed, to Pessinus they came unto the King. Who having courteously received and welcomed the Embassadors, conducted them into Phrygia to Pessinus, and delivered into their hands that sacred and holy stone, which the inhabitants of the country said, was the Mother of the Gods; and willed them to carry it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco was sent back from the other Embassadors to advertise them at Rome, that the goddess was coming, and that they should seek out the best man in all the City, for to receive and lodge her in his house with all devotion that might be.

Now was Q. Cæcilius Metellus nominated Dictator by the Consul in the Brutian country, against the solemn election of the Magistrats. His army was disbanded and called, and E. Venturius Philo created master of the horse. Then the Dictator held the Election. In which were chosen Consuls, M. Cornelius Cethegus & P. Sempronius Tuditanus in his absence, who at that time had the government of Greece. After them were elected Pretors, T. Claudius Nero, M. Marius Rulla, L. Scribonius Libo, & M. Pomponius Mache. When the Election was finished, the Dictator resigned up his place of magistracy. The Roman Games were thrice renewed and set forth, & the plaies Plebei seven times exhibited. The Ediles of the chair were Cn. and L. Cornelius Lentuli both. This Lucius governed

A vermed then the Province of Spain: created he was in his absence, and absent as he was he bare that dignity. The Ediles of the Commons were T. Claudius Asellus, and M. Junius Pennus. That year M. Marcellus dedicated the Temple of Vorinus, near the gate Capena, the seventeenth year after it was vowed by his father at Clastidium in Gallia, during the time of his first Consulship. There died also this year a Flamine of Mars, namely, M. Emilius Regillus.

For the last two years, the affairs in Greece had not been well followed, Philip therefore taking the vantage, that the Ætolians were forsaken of the Romans (the only aid upon which they trusted) forced them both to sue for peace, and to contract the same under what conditions and capitulations himself pleased: which if he had not made the better halt, all that ever he could to accomplish in good time, P. Sempronius the Vice-Consul, sent to succeed Sulpicius in the government, had utterly defeated him whiles he waged war with the Ætolians, considering that he was ten thousand foot and a thousand horse strong, and had five and thirty tall ships of war, headed with brazen pikes before: a power of no small importance, I assure you, to aid and assist his allies. For the said peace was not so soon concluded, but news came to the King, that the Romans were arrived at Dyrhachium; that the Parthines and other neighbour nations, upon hope of change and a new world, began to rise and rebel; and that Dimallum was already besieged and assaulted: for to that City the Romans bent their power (in stead of aiding the Ætolians unto whom they were sent) upon high displeasure and indignation, that without their advise and consent, yea, and against the tenor of the accord and covenant they had made a peace with the King. Philip upon these advertisements, for fear lest some farther troubles might arise among the nations and states there bordering, took long journeys, & sped him apace toward Apollonia. Thither Sempronius was retired, after he had sent Leætorius his Lieutenant with part of his forces and thirteen ships into Ætolia, to visit the country, and to see in what terms they stood, yea, and to disturb and break the peace if possibly he could. Philip waited and spoiled the territories and lands of the Apolloniats, and approaching the City with his whole power, bad battail to Sempronius the Roman General. But after he saw once that he kept himself quiet within the City, standing only upon his guard and defence of the walls; distrusting also his own strength, as not able to force the City by assault: & desirous wishal to entertain peace with the Romans as well as with the Ætolians, if he could; if not, yet at least wise to have truce with them: without effecting any more (seeing he could but only rub an old sore, & renew cankered malice upon fresh contention & quarrel) he returned into his realm.

D About the same time, the Epirots weary of long wars, after they had first founded the disposition and mind of the Romans that way, sent their Embassadors unto Philip, to treat about a general and universal peace: affirming, that they had assured hope of an honorable end and agreement, if his highness would vouchsafe to come to a parly with P. Sempronius the Roman General. And soon they obtained thus much of him, as to pass over into Epirus, for the King himself was not unwilling thereunto. Now there is a City in Epirus, named Phanice: there the King after communication had first with Eropus, Darda, and Philippus Pretors of the Epirots, entred into an interview also with P. Sempronius. At this solemn meeting and conference, Aminander the King of the Athamans was present, and other Magistrates of the Epirots and Acarnans. And first Philippus the Pretor began to speak and request, as well King Philip as the Roman General, to make an end of all wars, and likewise to give the Epirots leave to do the same. P. Sempronius propounded and set down the articles and conditions of peace in this wise, That the Parthins, Dimallum, Bargulum and Eugenium, should belong to the Seignory of the Romans, notwithstanding that they had obtained of the Senat by their Orators sent to Rome, to be annexed to the dominion of Philip King of Macedony. When they were agreed for peace upon those capitulations, there were comprised within the league on the Kings behalf, Prusias King of Bitynia, the Achæians, the Bœotians, the Theſſalians, the Acarnans, and the Epirots: and on the Romans the Illyenses, K. Astalus, Pleuratus, Nabis the Tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, the Eleans, the Messenians, and the Athenians. And hereof were instruments and Indentures ingrossed and sealed, and truce made for two moneths, until such time as Embassadors were sent to Rome, that the people might by their suffrages approve of the conditions in that form. So all the tribes in general granted the same, because the war now being intended and bent against Africk, they were willing for the present to be discharged of all other troubles.

P. Sempronius having concluded peace, departed unto Rome for to enter his Consulship. Now when as M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius were Consuls (which was the 15 year of the Punick war) the Provinces were assigned unto them in this manner, namely, unto Cornelius, Hetruria with the old army: unto Sempronius the Brutii, with the new legions that he was to enrol. And to the Pretors in this wise were the Provinces allotted, that M. Martins should be Lord chief justice of the citizens pleas, and L. Scribonius Libo have the jurisdiction of foreigners, together with the government of Gallia, Iseni; that M. Pomponius Marbo should rule Sicily, and T. Claudius Nero sit as L. Deputy in Sardinia. As for P. Scipio, his commission was renewed and continued for one year longer, with the command of that army and Armado which he had conducted before. Likewise P. Licinius had his commission newly sealed for to have the charge of the Brutians country, with the power of two legions, so long as the Consul thought it good for the Common-weal, that he should remain in the government of that Province. Also M. Livius & Sp. Lucærius, with the assistance of those two legions with which they had defended Gallia against Mago, continued still in their room for another year. Moreover Cn. Octavius remained in place, with commission, that when he had delivered up Sardinia, & the legion there unto T. Claudius, himself should with 40 long Gallies scour the seas, and guard the coasts along the river, within those limits, for which the Senat had given order. Unto M. Pomponius the Pretor in Sicily were appointed the two legions of the Cannian army. And T. Quintius and C. H. Tullus Vice-pretors, were to govern as they did the former year, the one Tarentum, and the other Capua; and both of them were allowed the old garrisons. As for the government of Spain, it was put to question before the people, what two Vice-pretors their pleasure was should be sent into that Province. And all the Tribes with one accord gave their grant, that the same Pro-consuls L. Cor. Lentulus, and L. M. Acidinus, should sit as Governors in those Provinces as the year before. The Consuls began now to muster souldiers, as well to enrol new legions for to be sent into the Brutians country, as also to supply and fulfil the number of the other armies; according as they were directed by the Senate. And albeit Africk was not yet openly declared a Province, but dissembled by the LL. of the Senate, (of purpose I believe, that the Carthaginians should have no inkling and intelligence thereof before hand) yet the whole City was in good hope, and made full reckoning that this year the war would be determined and fought out in Africk, and so an end for ever of those troubles. This persuasion of theirs had possessed their hearts with much superstition: and very forward men were, both to report, and also to believe many prodigious and strange wonders, which daily were blown abroad & divulged more and more: To wit, that there were two suns seen; that in the night season between whiles it seemed day light; that in Setia there was a burning torch or blasing Star reaching from the East to the West; that in Tarracina the gate, and in Anagnia, as well the gate as the wall in divers parts were blasted and shaken with lightning; lastly, that in the Temple of Juno Sospita in Lanuvium, there was a noise and a rumbling heard, with a horrible crack. For the expiation and purging of these prodigies, there was a supplication holden for one day: and a novendial solemn sacrifice was also celebrated, because it had rained stones out of the sky. Besides all this, there was some consultation about the receiving of dame Ida. For over and besides that M. Valerius one of the Embassadors was returned & had brought word that she would be very shortly in Italy, there came a new messenger with tidings, that she was now already at Taracina. This deliberation (about no small matter, namely, whom they should give judgement to be the best man simply in the whole City) held the Senat much amused: considering that every one for his part was more desirous of true victory, and pre-eminence in this behalf, than of any promotions, honors or dignities whatsoever, awarded unto them, by the voices either of Senators or Commons. In conclusion, they judged P. Scipio, the son of that Qn. who was killed in Spain, a very young man, and as yet not of full age to be a Questor, the very best man without exception in the whole City. Upon what motives of his singular vertues they were induced thus to deem of him, as I could willingly have delivered unto posterity, what had been set down in record by the ancient and first writers of those times: so I will not interpose mine own conceits, in guessing at a thing which hath lien dead and buried so long time. This P. Cornelius was commanded to go accompanied with all the dames of the City as far as to Ostia, there to meet the Goddess, and then to take her forth of the ship, and being once set on land, to deliver her unto the foresaid matrons for to be devoutly caried to the City. Now when the ship was arrived at the mouth of the river Tyberis, he, according as he was directed, went aboard in a pinnace, & lanchd into the sea: where he took the Goddess at the Priests hands, and brought her on shore. And the dames which were the noblest and chief of the City, amongst whom, C. Quintia was the Lady most renowned, received her. This Claudia, who before time (as it is reported) was of no better name & fame than she should be, now by this religious and devout ministry, was for her chastity and continency recommended better to posterity. These women caried this Goddess charily & daintily in their hands, and took her by turns, one in course after another. All the City came forth by heaps to meet her: and along the streets as she was conveyed, they stood at the dores with censers, making sweet perfumes, & burning frankincense: yea, & praied unto her, that she would willingly enter the City of Rome, and continue propitious & gracious unto it. Thus they transported her into the Temple of Victoria within mount Palatine, the day before the * Ides of April, which was alwayes after kept as a festival holyday. The people with great frequency brought gifts unto Palatium, which they offered unto the goddess, & solemnized a Lectisternium. And those plaies called Megalesia came up then, & were first instituted. Now when the Councel were busy and fat about the supply of those legions which were in the Provinces, there were certain of the Senators began to whisper & blow into their heads, That the time was now come, no longer to abide those things which during the troubles and dangerous daies they made a shift to endure; considering that now at length by the goddess of the Gods, all fear was past, and the dangers overblown. At which words the Lords of the Senat being in great expectation and attentive to hear out the rest; they went on and said, That those colonies of the Latins, which whiles Q. Fabius and Q. Fulvius were Consuls, refused to set out souldiers, now almost for six years had intermitted their service in the wars, as exempted from warfare altogether, and enjoyed that immunity as an honor and reward for their good deserts: whereas in the mean time, other loyal and obedient allies, were by mustering every year continually, wasted and consumed, in performance of their faithful allegiance and dutiful service to the Empire of Rome. At this speech, the Lords called not so much to mind a thing long forgot and almost worn out of remembrance, as they were provoked to anger and grew very hot, & therefore would not suffer the Consuls to pass any other matter before, but decreed that they should preempторily

* 12 April.

* The Plaies called Megalesia.

A peremptorily convent to Rome the Magistrates, and ten principal citizens out of every one of these Colonies; to wit, Nepes, Sutrinum, Ardea, Caere, Alba, Carfeoli, Sorae, Suessa, Setia, Corbena, Ardea, and Interamna; (for these were the Colonies touched in that point above-named) and to lay upon them every one a double levy of footmen, to that number and proportion which they were charged with, when they set out most in the service of the Roman wars, ever since that the enemies were come into Italy: besides one hundred and twenty horsemen a peece. And in case any one of those colonies were not able to make up that full number of horsemen, then to allow for every man of arms three footmen; Provided alwayes, that for foot and horse both, such should be chosen and no other, as were most substantial and of the best behaviour, and be sent to what place soever there was need of supply, even out of Italy. And if any of them refused thus to do, then the Consuls had commission to stay the Magistrates and deputies aforesaid, and not to give them audience in the Senat, (although they should require the same) before they had performed those impositions. Moreover those Colonies were enjoined to pay every year a tax or tribute, and that there should be raised and levied, one Als in the thousand, of their substance by the month; and be assessed in those Colonies according to the rate and rule that the Roman Censors should let down; which they gave order to be the same that was laid upon the people of Rome: and the information thereof to be exhibited and presented at Rome by the sworn Censors of the foresaid colonies, before they went out of their office. By vertue of this Act of the Senate, the Magistrates and chief men of those Colonies were sent for and compelled to repair to Rome: and when the Consuls demanded of them, those souldiers and tribute aforesaid, they began all of them (but some more than others) to refuse and gain say it; yea, and flatly to deny, that so many souldiers could possibly be made, nay, hardly were they able, although they should strain themselves to furnish the bare single number, according to the usual proportion and old prescript order: requesting and beseeching them, to give them leave to have recourse unto the Senat, and there to make sure for their release: neither have we (say they) so much offended as thus hardly to be used, nor deserved worthily to be undone. And say, we must needs miscarry and be cast away; yet neither our offence, nor the wrath of the people of Rome, can force us to find more souldiers than we have. But the Consuls, resolute in their purpose, commanded the Delegates and Committees of those Colonies, to stay still at Rome, and their Magistrates only to repair home and take musters: forasmuch as (unless the full number of souldiers which was set down unto them were brought to Rome) there was no Consul there would grant them audience in the Senat. Thus when all hope was cut off, to have access into the Senat, and to obtain a release: those twelve Colonies took a levy and enrolled the full number. Which was no hard matter to be done, considering how their youth was increased in that time of long vacation and intermission of warfare. There was likewise another matter (by as long silence forlet and well neer quite forgotten) proposed newly again by M. Valerius Lavinius: who said, That it was meet and good reason, that those private persons which had credited forth their monies to the Common-weal, when himself and M. Claudius were Consuls, should now at last be satisfied, contented, and paid: neither ought any man to marvel why he (notwithstanding the City were bound for the debt) had a special care and regard to call upon them for to have it discharged: for, besides that the Consul for that year being, when those lones of money were granted, was in some sort properly obliged, to see that credit were kept: himself more over was the very man that made the motion of taking up those monies, in regard that the City chamber was so empty of treasure, and the Commons purses so bare of money, that they were scarce able to pay the ordinary tribute. This overture made by the Consul, was well taken of the Senat, who willed the Consuls to put up this matter to the house: and so they entred in Act and decree, that the said debts should be discharged at three payments: whereof the first should be made presently by the Consuls then in place: the other twain, by the Consuls that were to succeed in the third and fifth years next ensuing.

But there fell but one new object and occurrence, that drowned all other cares besides, and wholly possessed the heads of the Senat, by occasion of the miseries and calamities of the Locrians: whereof before that day, they had no knowledge nor intelligence, and now were by the coming of their Embassadors declared and divulged. Neither were the people provoked to choler and anger, so much as the lewd behavior and wicked pranks of Q. Plautius, as the slacknes and negligence, or else the partiality and connivency of Scipio in dealing between them. These Embassadors of the Locrians, ten in number, presented themselves before the Consuls sitting in the open Hall called Comitium: clad they were in homely weeds and coarse apparell, looking pale and poor on the matter; and carrying withal in their hands as tokens of humble suppliants, certain branches of the Olive, according to the manner of the Greeks, fell down prostrate upon the ground before the Tribunal, with piteous weeping and sorrowful lamentation. The Consuls demanded who they were: and they made answer again, That they were Locrians, who had endured at the hands of Q. Plautius, the Lieutenant, and the Roman souldiers, such indignities, as the people of Rome would not find in their hearts, that the very Carthaginians themselves should suffer and sustain: beseeching them to do them this favour, as to give them leave to have access to the Lords of the Senat, there to make their moane and complain of their woful distresses. Being admitted into the Senat, and audience given them, then the ancientest man of the company spake in this wise. "Right honorable (my LL.) I know full well (quoth he) how important it would be, and available to the due estimate and weight of our complaints and grievance, in case ye were informed informed sufficiently and knew the truth, as well in what sort Locri was first betrayed unto Annibal, as also after what order the garrison of Annibal was thence expelled, and the City restored again, under your obedience. For if it may appear that the trespass of our revolt, cannot be imputed any way unto the public counsel and consent of our City; but contrary-wise, that our return under your signory and dominion was not only performed with our good will, but also first wrought and compassed by the means of our helping hand and valour: ye have the greater cause to be discontented and displeased with your Lieutenant and souldiers, for offering us (your good and loyal allies) such abuses, so cruel wrongs and unworthy indignities. As for the cause of our double revoltment and change, I think it good to defer the speaking thereof to another time, and that for two reasons: the one is, that the matter might be heard in the presence of P. Scipio, who recovered Locri, & was an eye-witness of all that we have done, be it good or bad: the other is this, that howsoever we be, yet we should not have abiden those calamities in such sort as we have supported them. We cannot dissemble (my LL.) nor conceal, how all the while that we had the Carthaginian garrison, within our Cattle, we suffered many foul outrages and shameful villanies, both at Amilcar his hands (the Captain of the garrison) as also from the Numidians and Africans: but what are they in comparison of the abuses & indignities that we endure at this day? May it please you (my LL.) to give us the hearing of those things with patience, that I shall utter even against my will with grievance. All the world at this day is in suspense, & standeth in great doubt, whether to see you or the Carthaginians, the Sovereign Lords of the whole earth. But if they were to weigh and counterpoise the Roman and Carthaginian Empire, by those injuries which have been offered to us of Locri, either from them or your garrison; and which at this day, more than ever before, we still endure: there is none but would rather make choice of them to be their sovereign LL. than the Romans. And yet consider, I pray you, and see how well affected, the Locrians are towards you: when we were nothing so hardly used nor so ill extreated by the Carthaginians, yet we had recourse unto your Captain General: and now that we are misused of your garrison, and put to more sorrow than if we were professed enemies, yet we have run no whither with our complaints but unto your selves. Either shal you (my LL.) vouchsafe to have compassion of our miserable state, or else we see not what we have left wherein we should pray unto the immortal Gods, for to be good and propice unto us. Q. Plinius Lieutenant to the General Scipio, was sent with a strong garrison and power of men, to recover Locri out of the hands of the Carthaginians; and with the very same garrison was he left there: but this Lieutenant of yours (for, the extremity of miseries and afflictions wherewith we are driven, maketh us bold, and putteth courage in us to speak our minds freely finding nothing at all in him of a man, my Lords, but the bare shape and outward form; nor of a Roman citizen, unless it be the habit of apparel which he weareth, and the sound of the Latin tongue which he speaketh. A very plague he is & no better, a monstrous & ugly beast, like unto that, which sometimes (if old tales and fables be true) haunted the narrow seas between us and Sicily, for to destroy all passengers that sailed by. Who, if he could have been content himself alone to have practised & wrought upon us your allies, all mischievous acts & pranks, of wickedness, of filthy lust, and greedy covetousness, we would peradventure in all patience & long sufferance, have filled up that one gulf and pit were it never so deep, & satisfied one gorge never so insatiable. But now so great a delight & pleasure hath he taken, that all lewd & licentious parts, all shameful acts and villanies should be commonly practised & in every place committed, that he hath made all your Centineers very Pleminius, yea, and your souldiers as bad as himself. All of them can skill now of robbing, rifling, spoiling, beating, wounding, and killing: they are all good at forcing of dames and ladies of honor, at ravishing and deflowering of young Virgins, at abusing (against kind) of younglings, free born and well defended, whom they pull perforce from between the arms, and out of the very bosomes of their parents. Daily is our City assaulted and taken: daily is it sacked and pillaged, night and day, there is no place free, but ringeth again with the piteous shrieks and lamentable plaints and cries of women and children, harried and carried away in every place. He that were a stranger to these things, and knew nothing, might wonder well enough, how either we can possibly hold out in suffering such outrages, or they which are the doers, not yet be satisfied and full of committing so great wrongs and injuries. For neither will my tongue and utterance serve to deliver, nor needful is it and expedient for you to hear every thing in particular, what we have sustained. But in general I will comprise and knit up altogether. I will abide by it, that there is not one house throughout all Locri, I dare avouch there is no person either one or other, exempt from the wrongs that he hath done. I say, & stand to it, that there is no kind of wickedness, no manner of filthy lust & uncleanness, no insatiable avarice besides, that he hath not assailed to practise upon as many as were capable thereof, & fit subjects to work upon. Hardly can a man devise and think, whether of these two mischiefs incident to a City be more detestable, either when the enemies force it by assault in time of war, or when a pestilent & cruel tyrant oppresseth it by force & arms during peace. All calamities we endured before, that Towns won and lost are put unto. And now at this hour, more than ever (my LL.) Pleminius hath perpetrated upon us, our children & our wives, all those excessive villanies, that the most inhumane, cruel, & outrageous tyrants can devise to exercise upon those subjects, whom they keep down with oppression, & tread under foot. Yet one thing there is (right honorable) whereof both sense of religion implanted & engrained naturally in our minds, constrains us to make particular complaint by speciality: and

A "and also our desire is, that ye should have the hearing, yea, and to assill and discharge your Con-
 "mon-weal of the scruple of conscience, in case ye think it so meet and requisite. For we have ob"served and seen with our eyes, with what devotion and ceremonial reverence, you not only ho"nor and worship the Gods of your own, but also receive and entertain those of strangers and "sojourners. We have in our City a Chappel of Proserpina, concerning the holiness of which "house, I suppose verily that ye have heard some report and fame, during the war of King Pyrr"hus: who in his return out of Sicily, passing along the sea side with his fleet by Locri, among o"ther shameful villanies and outrages which he committed against our City in despite of us, and "for our fidelity shewed toward you, pill'd also and robbed the treasure of this Proserpina, which "to that day had never been touched by any man whatsoever. And when he had so done, he em"barked the money, & sent it away by water, but journeyed himself by Land. But see what hapned B "my L. hereupon! His whole navy the morrow after, was all even tossed, split, & torn a pieces in "a most hideous gulf and horrible tempest, save only those ships wherein that sacred treasure was "bestowed, which were cast upon our coast, & driven ashore. Whereupon this King, as proud &
 "fierce a Prince as he was, being taught by so great harmes and losses, to believe that there were "Gods in heaven that ruled all; made diligent search for all the said monies, and caused the same
 "to be brought back again, and laid up in the treasury of Proserpina. And yet for all that, never sped
 "he well in any thing that he went about, from that day forward. Hunted he was and chased clean "out of Italy, and coming by chance one night, & coming unadvisedly by the City of Argos, he died
 "an obscure, base, and dishonorable death. And notwithstanding your Lieutenant, your Colonels C "and knight Marshals heard of this and a thousand more such instances & examples which were "recounted unto them, (not for to amplify and set out with the highest the great religion and
 "holiness of the place; but as we and our ancestors have had right evident proof, and that full "oftentimes, to shew the manifest power and puissance of that goddess) yet were they so hardly as
 "to lay their theevish and sacrilegious hands upon those treasures, that were inviolate and not to "be touched; and so by that cursed prize and booty have polluted themselves, their houses, and "your soldiers, Whose service take heed my L. as ye tender your selves and your credit, how "ye employe either in Italy or in Africa, in any of your affairs and wars there; before ye purge and "expiate this foul and heinous fact: for fear lest they make amends, and pay for this detestable sur-
 "fence, not only which their own blood, but also with some publick loss & calamity of the whole D "State. And even already my L. the ire and displeasure of the goddess hath been well seen upon "your Captains and soldiers both, & at this present day contineth still. Sundry times they have "been rogered by the ears, and scuffled one against another with banners displaced, Plumins, the "Captain bare up one side, and two Marshals or military Tribuns another. Never fought they "more fiercely & sharply with the Carthaginians in the field, than amongst themselves in frays at "the word point. And through their furious rage they had given Annibal a good opportunity and
 "vantage to regain Locri into his own hands; but that Scipio, whom we sent for, came in the mean "time upon him. But peradventure (some will say) this madness and fury hath not and rommenteth
 "the soldiers only, who are tainted with the foresaid sacrilege, and no power at all of the god-
 "des hath been shewed in punishing the leaders and captains themselves. May I wot, in them it E "hath most evidently appeared. The Tribuns have been beaten with rods by the Lieutenant, & the "Lieutenant again, being laid for by the said Tribuns, and caught in a snare, hath not only been "mangled all his body over, but when they had cut off his nose, and tropt his ears, was left for "dead in the place. And afterwards, when the Lieutenant was recovered and cured of his hurts, he "first impt, & then the Tribuns; then he scourged them, & after he had martyred them, & put them "to all exquisite tortures that might be devised against bondslaves, he put them to death. & when "they were dead, would not suffer them to be enterr'd. Thus ye see how the goddess hath puni"shed and taken vengeance of them that have pill'd and robbed her Temple; & never will she give "over to torment and harm them with all manner of furies and hellish fiends, before she haired "money be again bestowed in the chests & cofers of her treasury. Our nation long ago, in the F "of grievous and cruel war between them and the Grecians, because the Temple lieth
 "without the City, were desirous to remove that treasure and money from thence into the City.
 "But in the night there was a voice heard from out of the shrine, that they should hold their "hands off; for that the goddess her self knew well enough how to defend her own Temple. And "because upon this warning they made it a matter of conscience, & were afraid to stir the treasure
 "from thence, they would needs cast a strong wall about the said Temple; & when it was brought "up to a good height from the ground, behold, suddenly at once all the work came tumbling "down. But both now, and oftentimes besides, hath this goddess either guarded her seat & chap"pel, or else if it hath been any way violated, she hath been grievously revenged by some fearful G "example of them that have seemed to offer violence to the same. Now for the wrongs that we a"bide, she is not able; neither is there any other but yourselves (my Lord) that right us, and revenge
 "our quarrel. You are they whom we sue unto, unto your protection only in all humble manner;
 "we have recourse. And all our it is to us, whether ye insist Locri to be under that Lieutenant and "that nation, or yeeld it unto Annibal in his anger, and to the Carthaginians for to waile their
 "reen upon us & our throats. Neither require we, that you should credit and believe our com"plaint of him that is not now in place, without liberty of his answer, & pleading for himself. Let "him come hardily; let him be at the hearing himself, and spare not, let him in Gods name clear
 "and

"and acquit himself, if he can. If when all is done and said, it can be proved, that he hath left un-
 "done any mischief against us, that one man can devise to do unto another, we will be content to "abide and endure all those miseries once again (if it were possible) which we have suffered al"ready, yea, & to hold and declare him guiltless of all offences done both to God and man."
 When the Embassadors had laid abroad those matters, and Q. Fabius demanded of them, whe"ther they had complained unto P. Scipio, and uttered their griefs before him, they made an"swer and said, "That they had sent embassadors unto him, but he was busied in making prepa"ration for the wars, and was either passed already over into Africa, or upon his voyage ready to "take the Seas within few dayes: and they had seen by good experience, in how great favour the "Lieutenant Pleminius stood with his general: and namely, they were not ignorant how Scipio
 "after he had heard the matter between the Tribuns and him, committed them to prison: but as "for the Lieutenant, who was as faulty as the other, if not more, him he left there still in his full "authority. Now after that the Embassadors were willed to go forth of the Temple where the "Senat sat, the chief LL. of the Senat began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipio
 "as well as Pleminius. But above all others, Q. Fabius girded at him, and said, That he was born
 "even to corrupt and mar all military discipline. Thus (quoth he) in Spain also we have lost more
 "by mutinies of our own souldiers, than by the wars with our enemies: for why? after a strange "and forrain manner, and according to the guise of Kings, one while he cockered his souldiers
 "and suffered them to have their will and head too much; otherwhiles he would be oversharp "and cruel to them. After which rough words, he came upon them both thus with as heavy and "sharp a sentence, namely, That Pleminius the Lieutenant by his consent should be had away
 "bound in chains to Rome, and there chapt up in prison, until his cause were heard, and judicially "determined: and in case those challenges were true, that the Locrians have commenced against "him, he should be put to death in prison, and his goods be confiscate and forfeited to the cham"ber of the City. As for P. Scipio, in that he presumed to depart out of his province without con-
 "mission and direction from the Senat, he should be called home: and the Tribuns of the Com"mons dealt withal, to prefer a bill unto the people for his deprivation, and to put him besides "his place of government. As touching the Locrians, his opinion was, That the Senat should "give them their dispatch, and return them this answer: First, as touching the wrongs that they "complained of, it was not the will and pleasure neither of the Senat nor of the people of Rome
 "that they were done: who wished with all their hearts they had been undone: Item, that they "acknowledged them to be good men, to be their friends and allies, and so would accept of them "and call them. As to their children, their wives, and other goods taken from them whatsover, "their mind was that they should be restored again: Item, that enquiry should be made what
 "sums of money were taken out of the treasury of Proserpius, and that two-fold restitution
 "should be made and laid up there in stead of it: Item, that there should be a solemn purgatory fi-
 "crifice, celebrated for amends and expiation of that sin: but so, as the college first of the Priests "and Bishops should be consulted with, and their advice taken in that behalf, (considering the "sacred treasure was dishonoured, laid open and violated) namely, what manner of expiations and "cleansings were to be used, to what Gods, and with what beasts they should sacrifice: Finally,
 "that all the souldiers, which were at Locri should be transported over into Spain: and in their "room four cohorts of allies from out of the Latin Nation should be brought to live in garrison
 "there. But every Senator could not be asked his opinion and sentence that day, by reason of "their difference and disagreement of minds so hotly intenced, some in favour, other in disavow of "Scipio. For besides the lewd part of Pleminius, and the calamity & oppression of the Locrians, they "began to speak against the apparel of the General himself: "How he went not like a souldier and
 "a warrior, no, nor so much as like a Roman: walking up and down, and squaring it out in the "schools and open places of exercise with his mantle and cloke, and in his slippers and pantofles,
 "after the Greek fashion? And that he was overbookish, and set his mind too much upon read"ing, and took delight to be in the feasting school and wrestling-place, and all his men and sould-
 "iers about him, as idly and wantonly given as he, took joy in the pleasures & delightful feast of Syracusa.
 "As for Carthage and Annibal, they were quite forgotten, and his whole army through loo"sness and liberty was spoiled and clean lost, like to that of late at Serra in Spain, and all one with "them at this time in Locri, more to be feared of their friends than their enemies. And albeit "those matters thus reported, were either true, or mingled with some truths, and therefore founded
 "all very probable: yet the opinion of Q. Metellus prevailed: who in all other things gave his assent "unto Maximus, only as touching Scipio, he varied from him. "For I can not see any reason (quoth
 "he) how this can stand, that whosoever was the whole City chose at those young years of his,
 "to be the only Captain for to recover Spain: of whom they made special choice to be their "Consul, after that he had gotten Spain from the enemies, to end at once the Punick War: and "in whom they reposed great hope, that he was the man to draw Annibal out of Italy, and to "subdue all Africa: he now should all of a sudden be called for home out of his Province,
 "as a person almost condemned, without pleading and hearing of his cause, as if he were ano"ther Pleminius considering that even those lewd and cruel parts which the Locrians complained "of, were by their own words and confession not committed, while he was present in place: nei"ther could he be charged and accused directly for ought else but only for his sufferance and con-
 "nivency, in that upon a tender and respective indulgence of his Lieutenant, he was too remiss,
 "and

A "and forbore to punish him with rigor. His advice therefore and opinion was, that M. Pomponius as the Pretor, unto whose lot the government of Sicily was fallen, should within three dayes next and immediately ensuing, take his journey into his province and that the Consuls, should elect 2. Commissioners or Delegates out of the Senate, such as they thought good of, and send them with the Pretor likewise two Tribuns of the Commons, and one Edile: that the Pretor with the assistance of these personages, should sit upon a commission to enquire and know the truth: and in case they could find that those things wherewith the Locrians found themselves so much grieved, were done either by commandment and direction from Scipio, or with his will and consent, then to charge him to depart out of the province. But in case that P. Scipio were already passed over into Affrick: then the foresaid Tribuns of the Commons, and the Edile, joyning unto them two of the Delegates abovesaid, (such as the Pretor deemed most meet) should sail into Affrick: and the Tribuns and Edile bring with them Scipio from thence: and the two Commissioners have the charge and government of the warre, until such time as a new L. General succeeded and came in place. But if M. Pomponius and the ten Delegates abovesaid, found that neither by the direction, nor with the will of P. Scipio these enormities were committed, then P. Scipio should remain still with the army, and go forward with the war as he intended. When this decree of the Senat was once passed, and an act made thereof, they were in hand with the Tribuns either to agree between themselves, or else to cast lots, which two of them should go with the Pretor and the Delegates. And then the college of the Bishops were consulted with about the expiation and making satisfaction for those things which in the Temple of Proserpina at Locri were either handled, polluted, or carried forth from thence. The Tribuns of the commons, that went the journey with the Pretor and the Commissioners, were M. Claudius Marcellus, & M. Cincius Alimentus: who also had an Edile of the Commons to assist them, whom they might command, if Scipio would not obey the Pretor, whether he were in Sicily, or gone over into Affrick, to apprehend and attach his body: and by vertue of their sacrosanct and inviolable authority to bring him home with them. And first they resolved to go to Locri before they went to Messana. But concerning Pleminius, the report goeth two wayes. Some say, that when he was advertised what was intended and devised against him at Rome, he purposed to go to Naples into banishment, and chanced by the way to light upon one of the Delegates abovesaid, and so by him was perforce brought back to Rhegium. Others affirm, that Scipio himself sent out one of his Lieutenants, accompanied with 30. of the most noble Knights or Gentlemen that he had about him, with a warrant to commit Q. Flenibius, and with him the principal Authors of the sedition, and to lay them fast in prison. But certainly is the other way, was it by the commandment of Scipio, before, or then by warrant from the Pretor, were put toward and safe-custody with the Rhegians. The Pretor and the Delegates being come to Locri, first and foremost, according to their commission, had a principall care of Religion: For all the holy money which they found by diligent search in the custody either of Rhegians, or of the souldiers together with that which they themselves had brought with them from Rome, they bestowed againe in the privy vesties where the treasure was kept: and besides, they made a solemn purgation sacrifice for the sacrifice. After this, the Pretor assembled the souldiers together, and commanded them to carry their Banners out of the City: where himself encamped upon the plain and proclaimed that no souldier, as he would answer at his oath of peril, should either tary behind, or bring forth any thing with him but his own. Then he gave the Locrians leave, that every man should lay hold upon that which he knew to be his own, and if ought were not forth-coming and to be seen, to challenge and put in his claim for it. And above all things, his pleasure was, that all bodies of free persons whatsoever, should without delay be restored unto them; and if any made default of restitution he should abide the law, and be grievously punished. Then he assembled the Locrians to an audience, and pronounced before them all, that the people and Senat of Rome granted unto them their ancient liberty, and their own laws: giving notice unto them, that whosoever had any thing to say against Pleminius, or any other person by way of accusation, he should follow him to Rhegium, and there give attendance. Also if they were desirous to make a publick and open complaint of Scipio, namely, that the facts committed at Locri most impiously and wickedly, against both God & man, were passed either under his warrant, or with his helpe and liking, and they should send Embassadors to Messana, where he together with his Council and assistants would give them audience of all Delegates or Commissioners sent also to the Senat and people of Rome: and said, They would go to accuse Pleminius. As for Scipio, although he set forth (to hear of injuries and wrongs done unto their City, yet he was a man whose friendship they desired rather to embrace, than to enquire in his enmity. And thus they knew advisedly, that the many lewd deeds, and so horrible cruelties there plaid, were neither by the direction nor yet with the consent and toleration of Scipio: but his only fault was, that either he trusted Pleminius overmuch, or trusted them too much. And some men (say they) be of this nature, that they will have a curious regard for to punish and correct faults when they are once done, and afterwards behead the Pretors & also the Commissioners with him, though they themselves well eased of all such burden and charge of making farther inquisition and sitting upon the case of Scipio, and Pleminius and two and thirty persons more with him, they condemned and sent bound in chains to Rome. They themselves went also in person to Scipio, to be eye-witnesses and to make report at Rome of their own knowledge, as touching the manner of apparel, the idle life of the General, and the loose, dissolute, and corrupt military discipline of his soldiers; so rise and common in many men's mouths. Against their coming to Syracuse, Scipio was provided of deeds to approve his innocency, and not of words to excuse his folly. He gave order for all his forces there to meet, and for his armado to be in readiness: as if he were that day to give battle both by Land and Sea to the Carthaginians. The very same day that they arrived thither, they were friendly received and courteously entertained by Scipio. The morrow after he showed them all his fortes, as well for Land as Sea service, not only furnishing well appointed, and in readiness but the one sort, namely the land soldiers, running and charging one another at turney; and the Sea servants likewise within the haven, representing a naval combat with their ships. Then he led the Pretor and the other commissioners all about, to see the arsenal and armory, the store-houses the garners of corn, and all other provision and furniture for the war. At the view and sight whereof, they were stricken with such exceeding admiration, both of every thing in particular, and of all in general, that they were fully periwaded, that either by the conduct of that Captain and valour of that army, the Carthaginians might be overcome and conquered, or by none other in the world: yea, and they willed him in the name of God, without more ado to pass over into Affrick, and with all speed possible to make the people of Rome to enjoy the effect of that hope which they conceived that very day, on which all the Centuries nominated and declared him with one voice the former Consul of the twain: and with joyous hearts they took their leave and departed from thence, as if they were to bring tidings to Rome of a glorious victory: and not to make relation and report of a magnificent and stately preparation for war. Plæminius and all they that were likewise attaint and guilty, after they came to Rome, were immediately clapt up and laid fast in prison. At the first time when they were brought out before the people by the Tribune, they could find no grace, nor favour nor mercy amongst them: their minds were so fortified and possessed aforehand, with the consideration of the woful miseries and calamities of the poor Locrians. But afterwards, being produced oftner unto them, as the hatred conceived against him, began to wear and decay, so much anger grew to assuage and soften: besides the pitious plight and deformed brow of Plæminius there present, and the remembrance withal, of Scipio now absent, gave him some favour with the people. Yet he died in prison, before his cause was judicially tried, and definitive sentence of him passed. Cleodius Livianus reporteth in this third book of the Roman Historie, that this Plæminius in the time of the games which Africanus second time Consul, exhibited at Rome, according to a vow by him made, went about (by the help of some whom he had corrupted and waged for money) to set the City on fire in diverse places, thereby to have opportunity to break prison and make an escape: but when his wicked purpose was once disclosed and brought to light, he was condemned and awarded by voice of Senate to the dungeon. Tullianum. But as for Scipio, there were no words made of him, neither come he in question any where else but in the Senate: where all with one accord, both commissioners and Tribune, by extolling and magnifying with glorious words, the navy, the army and the Captain, brought it to about, that the Senate thought good and were agreed, that with all convenient speed Scipio should over sea, and have liberty granted out of those armies which were in Sicily, to make choice of those whom he would himself transport over with him into Affrick, and whom he would leave behind for the guard and defence of the Province.

Whiles these things passed thus amongst the Romans: the Carthaginians also having spent all the winter time in much suspicion and continual fear, hearing to all news, and enquiring heartily of every messengers, and keeping watch upon all their promontories and high hills by the Sea side, besetted themselves likewise, and procured the society and alliance of K. Syphax, a matter of no small importance for the safeguard and defence of Affrick, in hope and confidence of whole safety and firmness especially they were periwaded, that Scipio intended to sail over into Affrick. Now there had been a treaty betwixt Asdrubal the son of Giftas and the King, not only familiar acquaintance by way of kind welcoming and reciprocal hospitality, since the King (as hath been said before) that Scipio and Asdrubal forswore to meet at one time together in the King's house: when they came on of Scipio but also some treaty was already begun of alliance and affinity, and a motion made, that the King should espouse and wed the daughter of Asdrubal. For the assurance of this matter and the appointment of a certain day for the solemnizing of the marriage (for now the Daughter was ready for an husband and marriageable) Asdrubal took a journey, and seeing the King turning in love (as these Numidianes of all other Barbarous nations are most given that way and exceeding conscious) he sent for the maiden from Carthage, and hastened the wedding. And among other congratulations that passed between to the end, that besides the private affinity there should be also a public league; there was an alliance concluded between the people of Gaul by hand the King, by giving and taking their faithful promise interchangeably, and obliging themselves by solemn oaths one to the other to observe it as well offensive as defensive, and so have the same enemies, all the same friends for ever. But Asdrubal remembering both the friendship he had betwixt Scipio and the King, and also how fickle and variable the natures of the Barbarians are, and how Scipio should pass over into Affrick that this bond of wedlock would not be strong enough to hold the King in check the time whiles this Numidian Prince was engaged with his daughter, induced him what with desires, and what with the fair words and allurement of his young (nephew, as he called him) brother Imas Sicyrius, for to advise him not to pass

A pass over into Africk, nor to rely upon any confidence of him, nor yet to build upon his former promises. For himself was not only linked in matrimony with a Citizen of Carthage, the daughter of that Asdrubal whom he saw entertained as a guest in his court, but also joyned in a publick league with the people of Carthage. And first he exhorted him that the Romans would war with the Carthaginians far from Africk, as hitherto they had done; for fear lest he should of necessity be forced to have an hand, and intermeddle in their quarrels; and so while he desired to avoid the danger and hostility of one party or other, be driven at length to side all one way: giving him more plainly to understand, that if Scipio would not forbear Africk, but needs come with an army against Carthage, then must he necessarily fight in defence of the land of Africk, wherein himself was born, and for the native country, for the father and house of his own wife. With this commission and direction were certain Orators sent unto Scipio, who met with him at Syracuse, and there delivered their message. Scipio, albeit he was disappointed greatly of his ground-work that he had laid for his wars in Africk, and put besides his good hopes; gave the Embassadors letters into Africk unto the King, and sent them back again in all hast, before the thing were published and come abroad. In which letters he requested him especially to be advised and bethink himself that he brake not the rights either of friendship or hospitality begun with him, or of the league and society entered with the people of Rome: nor violated justice and faithfull promise made by giving right hands; nor yet beguile and abuse the gods, the witnesses and judges of all covenants and agreements made. But forasmuch as the coming of those Numidians could not be concealed (for they were all about the City, and were daily conversant in the Generall his lodging: and if it should have been kept secret whereabout they came, it was to be doubted lest the truth the more it was smothered and dissembled, the more it would break forth and come to light: and so the army was to stand in fear, that they were to war at once both with the king and Carthaginians. Scipio therefore buzzed aforehand into mens heads, false devised matters, and so withdrew them from the understanding of the truth indeed. He assembled all his souldiers together, and said unto them: that now it was no longer staying and trifling our the time: bearing them in hand, that the King, his allies and confederats, importuned him to set over into Africk with all convenient speed; that Masaniissa beforetime himself in person came to Lilium, grieving and complaining that the time ran thus on in debate and doing nothing: & Sylla now sent his Embassadors, making much and wondering what the cause should be of so long temporising: and requiring that either the army without more ado, should be sent over at once: or else if their minds and purposes were changed, to certify him so much, that he likewise might provide for himself and his kingdome. And therefore he did them to wit and understand, that he intended (now that he was sufficiently provided and furnished of all things) and considering that the impete might abide no farther stay,) to conduct his armie to Lilybæum, to wait the first good day of wind and weather, to take the less for a bon-voiage, and with Gods grace and favour, to set sail for Africk. His letters he dispatched to Marcus Pæpurnius to this effect, that if he thought so good, he should repair to Lilybæum, to the end they might command and consult together, what legions especially, and what number of souldiers he should transport over with him into Africk. In like manner, he sent a labourer to the maritime and les coasts, to stey all the carrieks and ships of burden, and to bring them away at once to Lilybæum. Now when all the ships and servicable men in Sicily were assembled to Lilybæum, so another the City was able to receive the multitude of souldiers, nor the haven contain the number of the vessels, so earnestly minded they were all, and so hotly set upon their voiage into Africk, that they seemed as if they were conducted not to fight a war, but to enjoy the assured rewards of a victory. But especially above all others, the souldiers remaining of the Cannian army, were vially perswaded, that under this captain, or else none, by valiantly quitting themselves in the service of the Common-weal, they should be able to end and finish their ignominious and shameful souldiery. And Scipio himself made no bare account of those kind of souldiers, as being full well that the defeat received at Cannæ, was not occasioned by their cowardise: neither were there throughout the Roman army any souldiers so ancient and of so long continuance, or so well experienced not only in many and sundry foughten fields, but also in the assaulting of towns and Cities. And these Legions of Cannæ were the first and best in order. Now when he had once resolved and given out, that he would transport them over with him into Africk, then he took a particular view of them, man by man. And having called out those, and left them behind, whom he supposed unmeet and insufficient, he substituted in their place those whom he had brought with him out of Italy: and so fully he supplied and made up his number of those Legions, that either of them had six thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred men of armes. He chose also out of the same army of Cannæ, both horsemen and footmen, of the allies and confederats of the Latine nation. What power of souldiers in the whole were set over into Africk, writers differ not a little in the number. In some authors I find, that they were ten thousand foot, and two thousand and two hundred horse: in others, fifteen thousand footmen, and fifteen hundred horsemen. In some records again, they were more by one half and more, namely, nine of horse and four were were embarked five and thirty thousand. And others think that have set down the number at all, amongst whom, is in a matter so doubtful and uncertain, I would myself be content for one. But Cælius for his party, as he forbeareth to put down any number, so he is content to imply an infinite multitude of them, in that he saith that with a wing and that the souldiers set up, the very souls of the air fall down to the ground:

and he that had seen the multitude of them when they went a shipboard, would have said there had not been a man left behind either in Italy or in Sicily. Well how many or how few fewer they were, Scipio himself took the charge to see the souldiers embarked in good order, and without any tumult. As for the sailers and mariners, who were forced before to shipboard, C. Laelius the Admirall of the navy, kept them still and quiet within their ships. M. Pomponius the Pretor had commision for to furnish the armado with corn and victuals: who made provision of food and sustenance for 45 daies: of which there was of baked meats and other viands already dressed, as much as would suffice for 15 daies. Now when they were all embarked, he sent about to all the ships, certain pinnaces or cock-boats, and commanded all the pilots and masters of every ship, with two souldiers apeece, to come into market place, there to receive their charge. When they were all met and assembled together, first he enquired of them whether they had provided and taken into their vessels fresh water sufficient both for man and beast, to hold out so many daies as their corn would serve? and when answer was made that they had water in their ships to last five and forty daies: then he charged and commanded the souldiers to keep silence, and be quiet during their navigation, and without any strife and contention to be obedient unto the mariners, and willing to help in any ministry and service whatsoever, saying, that himself and L. Scipio would keep on the right wing with twenty strong ships with brazen beak heads, and C. Laelius the Admirall with M. Porcius the Treasurer on the left, with as many of the same sort, to waite over and guard the hulks and ships of burden: willing and requiring that there should be light in all their vessels, namely, that every brazen headed ship should have one; each Carriack swain; and the Admirall ship, wherein the Generall was, three lights, for a speciall mark, to be discerned from the rest in the night. And so he commanded the Pilots to steer and direct their course for Emporia. [The territory hereabout is most fertile and fruitful, whereby the whole country aboundeth in plenty of all things: the barbarous peasants (as commonly it falleth out in bawell, and plentiful lands) are cowards, and unapt for war, and it was thought they might be surprised and subdued before any succour could come from Carthage.] When these directions were given, they were commanded to retire to their ships, and the next morrow at the signall, with the help of the gods to weigh anchor, hoise up sails and away. Many Roman Armadoes had aforetime set out of Sicily, and the very same port: but never any voiage all the time of that war, not during the former, made to goodly shew, and was so much looked on. And no marvel, for most of their other fleets were sent out only to rob and to fetch in booties and prizes. And yet if a man would esteem as by the number and greatnesse of ships, there had been aforetime two Consuls together, who went over with a power of two complete armies: & in every of those fleets, there were wellnigh as many war ships with brazen beak heads, as hulks & carricks in those that Scipio transported over. For besides fifty long ships of war, he had not all out four hundred ships of burden, and passage to transport over his army with. But if we would compare both wars together, the second seemed unto the Romans more sharp and cruel then the former: both because it was fought within Italy, and also by reason of so great overthrowes of so many armies together with the losse and death of their Generall captains. Moreover great expectation there was of Scipio the Commander and Generall of this voiage, a man much renowned and tallent of, both in regard of his own noble acts of cavalry, and also of a speciall and singular fortune that followed him in all his exploits: where by he grew every day more glorious then other, which caused all mens hearts to be set upon him, beside his very resolution and mind that he carried, to pass in Africa, which all the while of that war entred not into the head of any Capitaine before him, in that he gave it out abroad. That he meant to go over, with intent to draw and fetch Annibal out of Italy, and to direct and translate the war into Africa, and there to finish and make an end of it. There came running unto the haven to see the setting out of his Armado, the whole multitude, not only of the inhabitants of Lilybaeum, but also the train of all the Embassages out of Sicily, which were sent together for to accompany Scipio, and to do him honour, and also attended upon the Pretor of the province M. Pomponius. Over and besides, those legions also which were left behind in Sicily, went forward to bear their fellow souldiers company. So that not only the navy was a goodly prospect unto the beholders upon the land, but also the strand so overspread all about with numbers of people, made a brave and pleasant shew unto the passengers, that were in the ships. When day light once appeared, Scipio from out of the Admirall (after silence commanded by voice of the crier) praied in this wise: "O ye gods and goddesses all, that haue and inhabit seas and lands both, I beseech and pray you to vouchsafe, that all that ever hath been done lately, is now intended, or shall hereafter be enterprised, during my conduct and government, may speed well, and turn to the good of my self, the people and commonalty of Rome, our allies, and especially those of the Lanine nation: who by land, by sea, by rivers follow the direction, command, government, and fortune of my self, and of the people of Rome, and that in all our actions ye would be good, gracious, favourable, and helpful unto us, and advance all our proceedings: that ye would grant us the victory over our enemies: and after we have subdued them, to continue safe and sound, and adorned with their goodly spoils laden with their rich pillage, to return home all together with glorious triumph: & give us the hand and opportunity to be revenged of our foes and mortall enemies: and designe me and the people of Rome that power and strength, to execute upon the City of the Carthaginians those fearful examples of cruelty, which the people of Carthage intended to practise and bring upon our City and

of Scipio.

A and state. After these prayers thus pronounced, he took the raw newards and pursuance of the best killed for sacrifice (as the manner is) and flung them into the sea: and with that by sound of trumpet, gave the signall of departure.

Now were they under sail: having a good great gale of a forewind, they soon lost the sight of land. In the afternoon, there began to fall a thick mist: by reason whereof the ships could hardly avoid running one upon another. But when they were once in the main and deeper sea, the wind became more mild: and all the night following, the same dark mist continued still. After the sun was once up it broke and dispersed, and then the wind again grew big and high, by which time they might discover land. And not long after, the pilot shew'd unto Scipio, that they were not full too leagues from Africk: and that he saw well and discerned the cape or point of Mercurius.

B and if his will and pleasure were thither to direct their course, presently the whole Armado should bein thereto. Scipio so soon as he was within view of land, first he had made his prayers unto the gods; to blesse this first discovery of Africk to his own good, and the benefit of the common-weal: gave commandment to sail full, and to put with the shore and side at anchor in some bay beneath. So they made way with the same wind. But about that very time as the day before, they were rais'd again, and lost the sight of land. And as the fog increased, the wind fell: the night also that came upon them besides, made all things more doubtful. Whereupon they cast anchor for fear that the ships should hit one against another, on unground. When day light aroſe, the same wind was up again, but the foggy mist scattered: so that then they might see plainly all the coast of Africk.

C Scipio then demand'd what promontory it was that he saw next; and hearing that the name of it was The head Palchrum, [or The fair Cape] the name (quoth he) pleaseth me, and the promise thereof I like full well: even thither put the ships a land, and to the Armado enter'd the bay, and all the host was set ashore. Thus have I reported that they had a prosperous voyage without any fearfull danger, or much trouble: giving credit herein to very many writers, as well Greeks as Latines. Only Catius (setting aside that the ships were not cast a way and drowned amid the surging waves) writeth how other dangers both of water and weather encountered them in so much as at the last the Armado was driven by tempest from the coasts of Africk, and fell upon the Island

* Agimurn, from whence they had much ado to recover their direct course again; and finally when the ships were at hand to sink under the water, then the soldiers fying like men at point to suffer shipwreck, without licence and commandment of their Generall and without their armour, in great fear made shift with boats to recover the shore.

The Romans thus being landed, pitched their tents among the hills next adjoining. By which time the terror and fearfull fright of this their arrivall was not enter'd only into the Maritime coasts and territories bounding upon the sea, first upon the discovery of the fleet, and afterwards by reason of the rumor and tumult of the army, as it came ashore; but also spread forward as far as to the good towns and very Cities. For not only the high waies were all filled and overspread with multitudes of men, women and children, who went by heaps together one with another; but also the country peasants drove before them whole herds of cattell as: man would have said that had seen it; how all Africk was like to be abandoned at once on a suddain: in such sort, as they put the Cities indeed in greater fear & perplexity then they were themselves, and especially Carthage above

E all others: where there was no lesse trouble and hurlyburly, then if it had been surpris'd and forced by the enemy. For since that time that M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Manlius were Capt. for the space almost of fifty yeers, they had not once so much as seen an army of Romans, but only certain fleets of rovers and men of war, who had landed at times, and made some rodes into the lands lying upon the sea side: and when they had harried some prizes, such as came next hand, they ever were retired again to the ships, before the alarme could be given to raise the country. The greater therefore now was both the sight and fright within the City. And to speak a truth, good cause they had: by reason that there was neither at home in readinesse an army of puissance to encounter the enemy, nor a Captain of valour to conduct and lead an army. Asdrubal was the son of Gisgo, for nobility and high parentage, for honour and renown, for wealth and riches, and besides for the new affinity then contracted with King, was of all others the personage by many degrees, yet, and the only man of the whole State. And him they remembered very well to have been foiled, discomfited and beaten out of the field in Spain, by the self-same Scipio in divers and sundry battels. Also they made account, they were no more able to match the Captains man for man, than to compare and set their tumultuary power raied in hast, with the staid and experienced army of the Romans. Therefore they gave the alarm presently, as if Scipio were ready to attack Carthage out of hand: the gates with all speed were shut and made sure: the walls man-

F ned with soldiers: the corps de guard set a watch and ward kept: and all the night following the Sentinels duly relieved and maintained. The next day, 400 light horse were sent out as espials and vanguard to discover and scour the quarters to the sea side; and withall to impeach them that were a disembarking and coming land: who chanced to light on the Romans corps de guard. For Scipio had sent a way the fleet already to Spain, and before he was gone up into the land far from the sea, had encamped upon the desert hills thereby, placed guards of horsemen in convenient places, and put out certain foragers into the fields and villages for to raise booties. These having entered skirmish with the Carthaginian cornet and horsemen, slew a few of them in the very conflict, but most of them as they fled and were followed in chase, amongst whom was Hanno also the provost-marshal, a noble young gentleman, Scipio not only wasted the country all about, but also wars City of the Africans that stood neereſt, and was of ſufficient wealth: where beſides other pillage which was plentifully imbarked in the ſhips of burden and ſent into Sicily, there were taken priſoners eight thouſand polles of free and bond one with another. But the greateſt joy and contentment that the Romans took in this new entrance and beginning of their warlike affairs, was for the coming of Maſaniſſa; whom ſome report to have preſented himſelf with 200 horſe and 60 more: but the moſt do write that he came with 2000. But for as much as this Maſaniſſa was of all other Kings for his time the greateſt Prince and moſt puiſſant, and withall he that ſtood for the Romans in beſt ſtand and helped their ſtate, none like unto him: me thinks it were worth their labour, and would quit for all the paines, to digreſſe a litle out of the way, for to ſhew and declare in what variety of alternative fortune he was toſſed, both in the loſſe and alſo in the recovery of the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom.

This Maſaniſſa, while he was employed during the wars of Spain, in the defence and quar-rell of the Carthaginians; his father, whole name was Gala, hapned to die: and then the kingdome fell by deſcent, according to the cuſtome and manner of the Numidians unto Deſaleer, the late Kings brother, a man of great years and very aged. And not long after, when Deſaleer alſo was departed his life, Capuſa the elder of his two ſons, (for the other was a very child) ſucceeded in his fathers Kingdom. But for as much as he the ſoreſaid Capuſa maintained his royall ſtate and throne, more by reaſon of the authority and reputation that he carried among his friends and ſervants, than by power and ſtrength: there ſtole up in arms one named Mexonius (who alſo was deſcended of royall blood, but of an houſe that was ever of the adverſe and contrarie ſide) and contended in much variety of fortune about the crown, with thoſe who then ſwayed the ſcepter. This Mexonius having gathered a power of his tenants, followers, and peſants of the countrie (with whom he carried a great ſtroke and was highly eſteemed, by reaſon of the hatred that they bare unto the Kings race) encamped openly and ſhewed himſelf in action, yea, and forced the King to come into the field, and to trie the title of the crown in a ſet battell by dint of ſword. In which battell, Capuſa, together with many of his peers and nobles were ſlain, and the whole nation and ſeignory of the Maſiliens, was reduced under the rule and obedience of Mexonius. Howbeit he forbore to be called King; and contenting himſelf with the mean name of Tutor or Protector, gave the Kings ſtile to the child Lacumax, who only remained alive of the Kings line and line. He took to wife a noble dame and lady of Carthage, Annibal his neceſſe by his ſiſter, who had been lately wedded unto King Deſaleer; hoping thereby to enter into league and alliance with the Carthaginians: and beſides, for to renew the ancient familiarity and amity with Syphax, he ſent Embaſſadors unto him of purpoſe. Thus made he himſelf ſtrong aforehand againſt Maſaniſſa.

Maſaniſſa like wife for his part, being advertiſed of his uncles death, and alſo how his conſin german was deſcended, croſſed the ſeas out of Spain over to Mauritania, at what time as Boo-cher was King of the Moors. At whoſe hands by humble ſute and importunate prayers in moſt lowly manner, he obtained a power of 4000 Moors to accompany him in the journey, for otherwiſe to employ them in war he might not. And after he had diſpatched a meſſenger afore-hand to thoſe that were his fathers friends and well-willers to himſelf, by that time that he was come with them to the confines of his realm, there met him almoſt 500 Numidians. Having therefore ſent back again the Moors from thence unto the King, according to covenant, albeit there was aſſembled together a ſmaller number of people then he hoped and looked for, and not ſo ſufficient that he durſt adventure upon ſo great an enterpriſe; and ſuppoſing withall, that by entring into ſome action, and by travell and endeavour, he ſhould gather ſtrength ſtill to perform ſome great exploit, he encountred at Thapſus the yong King Lacumax, as he journeyed unto Syphax. And when the Kings company in great fear fled into the town, Maſaniſſa both at the firſt aſſault won the ſaid town, and alſo of the Kings train received ſome that yielded themſelves, and ſlew other ſome that made reſiſtance in their own defence. But the greateſt part with the child himſelf the yong Prince, got away in that tumult and eſcaped unto Syphax, unto whom at firſt they intended their journey.
The ſame of this ſmall thing, ſo happily atchieved in the firſt beginning and entrance of his affairs, N cauſed all the Numidians to revolt and ſide with Maſaniſſa. So as there ſtooked unto him from all parts of the countrie, and out of the villages, the old ſouldiers of King Gala, and incited the yong Prince and ſet him on to recover his fathers Kingdom. Now in number of ſouldiers, Mexonius was a good deal ſuperior: for both himſelf and the ſame army ſtill entire, with which he had van-quiſhed Capuſa, beſides had ſome others that after the ſlaughter of the King, he had received upon their yeelding: and alſo yong Lacumax the infant, had brought great aids from Syphax: ſo that Mexonius was fifteen thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe ſtrong. With whom Maſaniſſa, albeit he were nothing ſo puiſſant either in foot or horſe, fought a battell; yet atchieved he the victory through the approved valour of the old ſouldiers, and his own politick wiſedome, being a captain well-experienced and exerciſed both in the Roman and Punic wars. The yong Prince together with his tutor and protector, and ſome ſmall number of Maſiliens, fled and eſcaped into the territories of the Carthaginians. Thus Maſaniſſa having recovered his fathers Kingdome, and foreſeeing that there remained ſtill behind a far greater bickerment and encounter with Syphax, &c taking it to be the beſt courſe and policy for him, to be reconciled and made friends with his conſin german, addreſſed certain meſſengers both unto the child, for to put him in good hope and aſſurance, that if he would ſubmit and yeeld himſelf under the protection of

of Asdrubal, he should live in a honorable place and degree with him, as Desales himself had done with his father Carthage; and also to Asdrubal to give their word and promise unto him, not only for impunity of his past offences, but also for full satisfaction of all things that were his. By which means he persuaded both of them to take part with him, who made choice of a mean estate as home in their own country, rather than to live in exile, notwithstanding the Carthaginians laboured all they could to the contrary.

Asdrubal happened at that time when Carthage occurred to his mind, to make his abode with Syphax, attending the hand of King Syphax to be his ally, and fully persuaded. Thus it came to pass, as is imported by the words, whether Asdrubal or Asdrubal were King of the Massilians, replied unto him and said, that he was easily deceived if he thought that Massilia would keep himself within those terms; that either his father Gale or his uncle Desales had them concerned with: No, no, (quoth he) there is much more to be done in this and the greater signs of many mind and forward wit and spirit appear in him than ever showed in any of his house and line before him. Full often hath he in private made good proof of rare valor and singular prowess, as well unto his friends as his enemies. And let him Syphax and the Carthaginians look as well upon them as they can, for unless they put out this spark of fire, he will, and even at the first beginning, will be their chance to be caught there with; when it shall burn forth, and able that shall not be to help the matter and quench the rage thereof. Many, as yet his strength is small, and slender, his forces frail, tender, and feeble, and not well united together to maintain his State, unless as he is in his Kingdom. Thus he importuned him fully by reason and persuasion, until at length he reduced him to lead forth an army into the confines of the Massilians and there in that territory, about the time whereof he had often times not only contended by plea and words with Gale, but also by arms and dint of sword, to encamp himself as in his right and undoubted inheritance: with this condition, that if any came against him to war him off the ground, then so to try his interest by sword, which was the only way to be taken and met for the purpose; that in case too fear of him they quit the possession quietly, then to advance for war into the heart of the Kingdom: for either the Massilians would without battell render themselves under subjection, or else in a pitched field put be able to stand up against him. Upon these suggestions Syphax was incited and pricked on, inasmuch as he made war upon Massilia, and in the first battell discomfited and put to flight the Massilians and Massilia with some few horsemen fled out of the field and escaped unto a mountain, which the Indians call Barba. Certain whole families and households with their sheeps and tents, together with their cattle (which is all their riches) went after and followed the King. But all the multitude of the Massilians besides, did remain with Syphax and came under his obedience. This mountain whereof we have said, that they fled their country were possessed of, was plentiful of grass well watered, and being in good posture to feed their cattle, it yielded in few minutes their food abundance, for the people that used to live upon flesh and milk. From hence they began at first to feed out by night and make roads; but after wards in open day light to rob and spoil all the country about, but above all others to fire and burn the territory of the Carthaginians, both because there were more prizes to be had from them, than from the Numidians; & also for that it was more safe robbing and burning there without danger. This they practised so long so licentiously, and in such scornful manner, that now they would carrie their booties to the sea side, and make markets & sale thereof to the merchants, and for this purpose divers ships arrived thither to traffick, and other while there were many of the Carthaginians cut off and came short home, and more of them were either slain or taken prisoner, than oftentimes in their war and battles. The Carthaginians bewailed and complained of this manner unto Syphax, and spurred him forward, disposed well enough as he was of himself to revenge, for to punish the reliques of the war, in his own person. But forasmuch as it was thought to stand with the royal Majesty of a King, to chase and hunt a rabble of vagrants about the mountains, therefore Barba, one of the King's Captains, a right hardy and valiant man, was chosen to do the feat, and to perform that service. Who had the command of four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, and was promised besides, great gifts and mighty rewards, in case he brought away the head of Massilia: but if he could take him prisoner alive, that were also indeed, and a peerless piece of work, of inestimable joy beyond all measure. He waiting his time when the enemies were stragling fetchledeely abroad, came upon them at once, and charged them, and having singled from the band of the armed soldiers, a huge number, both of people and cattle, he forced Massilia himself with some few horsemen to take the top of the mountain. From whence after he had sent away unto the King, as if the war had now been at point of an end, not only a great booty of people and cattle, the which he had taken, but also part of his forces, as being more greater in proportion, then for to dispatch the remnant of a war, accompanied with no more then five hundred foot, and two hundred horse, he pursued Massilia being come down from the hill tops, and there having beset and stopped the passages at both ends, enclosed him within the straight and narrow valley. Where there was committed a great execution and slaughter of the Massilians, but Desales with fifty horsemen and men above got away through the unknown and hidden cranks of the mountain, and escaped the hands of the pursuers. Howbeit, Barba traced him still, and followed him at heels so narrowly, that next to the City Chapsa he overtook him in the plains, where he so stragglely environed him about, that he killed all his company every one, save only four horsemen.

A. At this time Scipio was encamped near Sabra, within a mile of the City: for he was removed from that side, where some few days before a flaming camp close to the sea. Hann having received power of Cavary, nothing loath to charge upon the enemy, but to make sure guard and defend the country from waiting and spoiling, but before all other things a situation and devised, how he might augment his number of horsemen by a new levy and enrolment. And both he rejected none of the suggestions, yet he levied and chose the Numidians especially, the best horsemen simply in all Africa. Now he gathered together upon four thousand men, when he surprised a City named Sabra, almost fifteen miles from the Roman camp. And when war was brought to Scipio, that to great a Cavalry took up their summer standing habitation within a town; Tull (quoth he) I will not, if they were more than they are, so long as they have such one to be their leader. And looking with himself that the more slowly the enemies were to work, the less he was to slack his bullock, he sent Masani before with the horsemen, and gave him authority to ride up and down before the gates, to brave the enemy, and to train him for the fight: with this direction, that when their whole multitude was issued forth, and the shouting given to fight, that he might not when he came the charge, he should give ground and retreat, but demand little, for he would himself come in due time to the battle. And saying no longer behind, then what he thought Masani, who was gone before, had time enough to train the enemies forth, he followed after in person with the Roman horsemen, and reached closely under the hills (which stood fitly for the purpose, opposite between him and the enemy) about every turning of the way. Masani for the purpose according to the direction given him, one while right courageously galloped before the gates, as one that would brave and terrify the enemy, another while as he had been afraid himself, gave back, and by this counterfeit show of fearfulness, he made the enemies more bold and venturesome, and drew them on to pursue him rashly. But as yet they were not altogether forth, and their train was diversely troubled, and had much ado with them, while he was fair to face and comely to see that had given their load of wine, and were heavy-headed and sleepy withal, to turn themselves and to bridle their horses, and to stay others from running out of the gates at once confusedly, without order or array, and without their colours. Masani caught up those, and cut them short, that a part from their company at the first setting on, were venturously forward, and took no heed to themselves: but soon when more of them followed, that once out of the gate, the skirmish was maintained with equal valour on both sides. When the horsemen were forced and joined in battle, Masani was not possibly able to hold out any longer. Howbeit he fled not straight, but as he gave back leisurely, he received them so violently charged upon him, to stop, until he had trained them to those hills, under which the Roman Cavalry lay hidden. Then tore the horsemen from out of their ambush, themselves to war, and their horses fresh; and environed Hann and the Africans, who with fighting and following were tired out and overworn. Masani likewise turned his horses suddenly, and made head against them, and returned to battle afresh: so there were environed, intercepted, and killed in the place together with Hann himself the General, full upon a thousand, even as many as were in the Vanguard, and could not well retire themselves backward. The rest, affrighted with the death of their leader, fled with bridle on horse neck: whom for the space of three miles the conquerors followed in chase upon the spur, and either slew and took prisoners two thousand horsemen of their kindred. Amongst whom there were, as it is for certain known, no fewer than two hundred of small Carthaginians, men of arms, and divers of them of good mark, both in regard of weapons and notes, as also of birth and noble parentage.

It followed that the very same day when this happened, the ships which had transported over the bay in to Sabra, returned back charged with provision of victuals, as if they had prefigured a loss, followed by the army, that they were come for a new pillage and fresh prizes. But all writers do not accord, that two Carthaginian captains of one name were slain in two battles of the Cavalry (for say in Twelfth where) left by telling one thing twice, they might seem to deceive and mislead the reader. Cornel Gallus and Palmer report that Hann was taken prisoner. Then Scipio bestowed rich gifts upon the captains and horsemen according to their good service, and as they everyone deserved: but above all the rest, he highly rewarded Masani. And when he had placed a strong garrison in Sabra himself with the rest of his army made roads; and not only walls and fortified the lands and villages in the way as he went, but also forced and won certain Cities and borough towns; and so having filled all places far and near with the terror of war & hostility, he returned to the camp, the seventh day after he set forth, bringing with him great numbers of people, much flock of cattle, and prizes of all sorts, and so dispatched away the ships a second time from the bay, with spoils of the enemies. After this he set aside all light expeditions, small roads and forays of the country towns, and bent his whole power and all his forces against Ti: supposing if he had once won it, to leave himself there, and to make it his seat from thence forward, and a sure place of defence in all his other exploits that he meant to perform. Thither at one time were the Numidians brought from the armada, to that part of the City where the sea beateth upon the walls: like wise the land soldiers advanced from the hill that overlooketh the

the towns, and journey in manner both to the very work. As for stilling and dragging artillery and great store they had brought with them, and when were first taken off with their wheels, and they new were made in the common store, and Arsenal, where there were carpenters continually kept at work for the framing of such fabricks and peeces of battell. The men of Viterbo being thus round about on every side with great preparation and ordination, they reposed their whole hope and confidence in the Carthaginians; and the Carthaginians relied themselves upon Asdrubal, in case he should relieve Syracus for to set to his helping hand. But all things went but flowward, and they battered themselves not so quickly, as they should have done, who wanted to much aid as they did. And Asdrubal when he had with all the men and the best that he could make, gathered together thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, yet durst he not approach the enemy, before the coming of Syracus to joyn with him. At length came Syracus with fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse; and immediately departing from Carthage, encompassed not far from Viterbo the Roman camp. Whose arrivall yet was so important, and wrought such effect, that Scipio after forty dayes weloock (during which time he had invested Viterbo and tried all malices but in vain) was compelled to remove his siege & dislodge without any good at all. For now the winter approached, and he fortified his standing quarter for winter harbour upon a promontory, which joyned to the continent by a thin and narrow ridge of land, feth out a good way and beareth into the sea. And with one and the self same trench and rampier, he compassed both his army, and also the ships that lay up in the dock. The legions were quartered and lodged in the ends of the said cape: the ships that were drawn up to land, and filled with the files and mariners, kept the strand on the north side of the hill; the horsemen took up the van toward the south, upon the hanging and side therof, shooting to the other shore. And these were the acts achieved in Viterbo until the end of Autumn.

Besides the provision of corn gathered from all parts out of the countries pillaged and wasted round about, and other store of victuals brought out of Sicily and Italy, Q. Fabius the Vice-prefect arrived with a mighty deal of grain out of Sardinia, sent from T. Claudius the Prefect, who had the government of that land: so as not only the old garners already made were replenished, but also more that were newly built. Only there wanted apparel for the army. Whereupon Q. Fabius had in commission to break with the Prefect about that matter, namely, what liveries might be provided out of that province, and sent for the supply of that defect. Which business was not strictly followed, but with all diligence performed in such sort, as in short space there were sent over a goodly number of horsemens coats, and upon short callocks and jackets.

During the time of that summer, wherein these occurrences passed in Africa, R. Sumpsonius the Consul who governed the Province of the Provincia, dismissed suddenly, in a disordered manner, with Annibal upon the very way, within the territory of Croton, where the fight was maintained rather by squadrons and companies one to one, then by any set body or ranged battell. The Romans were discomfited; and having lost in this conflict (which might more truly be called a tumultuous scuffling than a full fight) upon a goodly army, they retired in great haste and fear into their camp. Yet durst not the enemies make an assault upon them within their hold. But the Consul dislodged from thence in the dead time of the next night, and having dispatched a courier before unto P. Licinius the Vice-consul, for to come forward with his legions, he joyned his power unto them. So they returned again unto Annibal, being now two Generals, and two entire armies. And without any stay, to battell they went: whilst the Consul on the one side flood upon this his power redoubled and reinforced, & Annibal on the other side took heart for his fresh victory storelaid. Sumpsonius advanced with his legions into the vanguard; P. Licinius with his kept the reerwards. The Consul at the very first shock and beginning of the conflict, vowed a chappell to Fortuna, under the name of Primigenia, in case he might have the honour of that day, and vanquish his enemies. And surely his vow was heard, and he obtained his desire: for the Carthaginians was discomfited and put to flight, and more than four thousand armed men slain, three hundred or somewhat under taken prisoners, forty horse of service got alive, and a great conquest won and carried away. Annibal dismayed and daunted at his adverse and unlucky battell, withdrew his forces to Croton.

At the same time M. Cornelius the Consul, in another side of Italy held in Hebrus not so much by force of armes, as by rigorous proccesse of law and severe justice: for all that country in manner was turned to Massa, and by his means and favor hoped for a change, and were altogether set upon novelties & an alteration of the state. The examinations and judicial trials of these matters the Consul followed by vertue of commission from the Senat, and not upon his own motive and seeking: and went through therewith, setting aside all partiality, nothing respective of favour or displeasure. In such sort, that many of the nobility of Tyrrhenia (such as either had repayed themselves in person, or had sent their agents unto Massa, for to treat with him about the revolt and rebellion of the States wherein they lived) were at first, as many as made personall appearance, condemned: but afterwards, such as had guilty consciences, went into voluntary exile: and being condemned in their absence, instead of their bodies which were gone out of the way, they yielded and left behind them their goods only, which might be forfeit and confiscate a pawns to pay for the punishment of their persons.

Whiles the Consul was thus employed in divers places one from the other, the Centon in the mean

A meantime at Rome, M. Livius and C. Claudius held a new choice and review of Senators: and Q. Fabius was once again chosen the principall Senator and President of the Senat. Seven in number of them were noted with ignominy and disgrace, but not one of all those had sitten in the ivory chair and borne office of state. They looked narrowly and most faithfully to the Publicans, that had the charge of the City-buildings to see them kept wind-tight and water-tight, and in sufficient reparations. They publicly gave order for a paved cause to be made, from the beasts market unto the temple of Venus, and all about the shops and scaffolds in the shew-places. Also the church * Magna Mater [the great mother of the gods] they caused to be built in the mount Palatine. They instituted also a new tax and impost out of the provision of salt. And whereas both at Rome and throughout all Italy, salt was sold at a Sextant by the Modius, they let and fermed this commodity, to be served out of the same price still in Rome; but in the market towns and fairs, they enhanced the price higher, and in sundry places they rated it at divers prices. This tax was devised as all men verily beleeveth, by the one of the Censors, for anger, and an old grudge that he bare unto the people; because he had been in times past unjustly judged and condemned by them, and therefore in the pension and price of salt they supposed that those tribes were most pinched and charged who were the means of the hard doom that passed against him. Hereupon it came that this Livius was turnamed Salinator. The cense and numbring of the Citizens was finished the latter, because the Censors had sent about into all provinces, that the full number should be taken of all Roman Citizens, who were without in the armies, and presentment made accordingly. So there were registred in all, with those abroad two hundred and seven & fifty thousand persons. And C. Claudius Nero was he that performed and accomplished this numbring and assessment. After this there was a Cense or taxation taken of the twelve Colonies, a thing then brought up and never before. And according to the relation of the Censors they were entred into the subsidy book at Rome: that it might appear upon record in the publick instrumments and writings, what number of able men for war they could make, and what every man was worth in money and goods. Then they began to take a survey of the gentlemen and knights at Rome. And it fortuneth so, that both Censors had hories of the City provision and charges. And when the crier came to cite those of the tribe Polia wherein the name of M. Livius was enrolled, & made some stay to call the Censor himself by name: Call hardly (quoth Nero) for M. Livius. And whether it were upon the reliques of an old cankered malice, or that he took a foolish pride and vain delight to seem forsooth D to be severe and precise, he commanded M. Livius to sell his horse of service, because he had been sometimes a man condemned by the doom of the people. Semblably M. Livius when the crier was come unto the tribe Nerniensis, and to the name of his colleague, awarded C. Claudius to sell and make away his great horse likewise; and that for two causes, the one for that he had borne false witness and deposed wrongfully against him: the other, because he was not soundly and in truth of heart reconciled unto him, when they were made friends. Whereupon there grew a foul jar and contention between them, whiles they passed not to impeach and stein the credit one of the other even with the touch and hazard of their own good name and reputation. At the end of the Censorship, when C. Claudius had sworn to keep and observe the lawes, and was ascended up into the chamber of the Cities treasure, among the other names of those that he left as disfranchised and tributaries, he declared his colleague for one, and gave up his name in the roll. Afterwards came M. Livius into the chamber aforesaid, and setting aside the tribe Metia only (which neither had condemned himself, nor elected him a condemned person for Consul or Censor) he declared the whole people of Rome likewise suspended, even four and thirty tribes; and left them all no better then meer strangers and aliens, in regard of taxes and tributes: and why? because they had both condemned him, an innocent and guiltless man: and being thus condemned, had created him Coss. and Censor notwithstanding: neither could they deny but that they had erred and done amiss in their judgement, and twice in their elections. And among those four and thirty tribes, he pronounced that C. Claudius also should be reckoned for one: protesting moreover, that if he could have found any one precedent, to have led him to the disfranchising one man twice, he would F have left C. Claudius by name, as a noted person by himself, in the checkroll of the City chamber.

* Cybele, or Idaea. At this time it appeareth by Festus and other that that Asses were Sextentarii and not Librales, at Rome so that Sextans which before was the sixth part of an Asses, a cue or half farthing english now was raised to the worth of the whole and valued at three fartherings, the price of a Modius of salt in Rome, set down by Livius Salinator.

Surely that reciprocal debate between the two Censors, in depraving and defaming one another was but a lowd and naughty part by them plaid: but this chastisement of the peoples levity and inconstancy, was a worthy thing, and beserming the Censors gravity of that time. While the Censors stood thus in exceeding disgrace and hatred with the people, Cn. Bibulus a Tribune of the Commons taking his time and occasion hereby to rise and become great, endited them both and commenced an action against them before the body of the people. But this desigment of his was soon dashed and came to nothing, though the generall accord and content of the L.L. of the councell, to the end that in time to come, no such example might be extant upon record, that the Censors dignity should be exposed to the variable and inconstant pleasure of the people.

The same summer in the Brutians country, Petilia had been already forced and won by the Coss. when as Consentia and Pandosa, with other mean and base peeces, willingly yielded themselves to his devotion. Now when the time drew neer of the election of new magistrats, it was thought good that Cornelius should be sent for to Rome out of Tuscany, where there was no war at all, rather then the other Consul out of his province: who being come, created for Consuls Cn. Servilius Capiz, and Cn. Servilius Geminus. After this, the court was assembled for the choosing of Pretours, where-wherein were elected P. Cornelius Lentulus, R. Quinctius Flaminus, P. Atilius Regulus, and P. Fannius Tappianus. These two last were Ediles of the Commons when they were chosen Pretors. The Capitol after these elections were finished and past, returned unto his usury again in Hecoria. Certain Priests and Prelats that year died, and new were chosen in their rooms. P. Vannius Philo, Flamin of Adams was created, installed and inaugurated, instead of M. Aemilius Regillus, who deceased the year before. And in place of M. Pomponius Malar, who was both Augur and Decemvir, there was advanced into dignity of Decemvir, M. Aemilius Capita: and into the office of Augur, Tis. Sempronius Gracchus, a very young man: a rare thing to be seen in those daies, in the bestowing of sacerdotal and church promotions. In that year was set up in the capitol a chaire drawn with 4 flood, all of beaten gold, by C. Livius and M. Servilius Geminus, Ediles of the chair for the time being. The Roman games also were exhibited & renewed again for 3 daies: likewise the plaies & pastimes called Plautii, for other 3 daies by the Ediles of the Commons, P. Atilius & P. Fannius. And for the great honoe of those games, the feast of Jupiter was solemnly kept and celebrated.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the thirtieth Book.

IN Africk, Scipio by the help of Malanilla in sundry battels, vanquished the Carthaginians, together with the afore-said Syphax King of the Nomidians, and Adrubal. He won and sacked two camps of the enemies, wherein there perished by fire and sword, to the number of 40000 men. By the means of C. Laelius he took Syphax alive. Malanilla when he had taken prisoner queen Sophonista, the wife of Syphax and daughter of Adrubal, by and by fell in love with her, and by way of marriage took her to wife: but being chastised and rebuked therefore by Scipio, he sent unto her a cup of poison: which she drank, & thereof died. By manifold victories of Scipio it came to pass, that the Carthaginians driven to despair, were faine to call for Annibal out of Italy, to save the main chance, and defend their whole state: who, in the 16 year of the war, departed out of Italy, sailed over into Africk, & assayed by means of conference, to make peace with Scipio. And when they could not agree about the conditions & capitulations thereof, he fought, & was overthrown in the plain field. The Carthaginians at their suit & request had peace granted. And when Gilgo dissuaded that peace, Annibal plucked him back with his hand, & so after some excuse made of his rudeness in that behalf, himself spoke for peace. Mago who had fought with the Romans in the country of the Insubrians, was grievously wounded, & being sent for home in so Africk by certain ambassadors, in the way died of his hurt. Malanilla was fully restored to his kingdom. Scipio being returned to the City of Rome, had the glory of a most honourable and noble triumph: whom, Q. Terentius Calleo, a Senator, followed with a cap [of freedom] upon his head. Scipio was surnamed Africanus: but doubtfull it is, whether he came by that title through the favour of his soldiers before, or the general applaus and affection of the people. But this is certain, that he was the first general that ever was intitled in his stile, with the surname of a nation by himself conquered.

The thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

VV Hen Cn. Servilius Capio, and C. Servilius Geminus (Coss. in that year, which by computation was the 16 of the 2 Punick war) proposed unto the Senat, concerning the affairs of the State, the managing of the wars, and the government of the provinces: the LL. ordained and gave order, that the Coss. should either agree between themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should go into the Brutian land against Annibal: and whether should take upon him the charge of the province of Hecuria and the Ligurians: with commission for him, whose hap it was to rule the province of Bruttii, to receive the army from P. Sempronius the Consul; and the said P. Sempronius (for he also as Vice-consul was to continue in place of government one year longer) to succeed in the room of P. Licinius, who was to return home to Rome. This P. Sempronius among other commendable parts (wherein no Citizen in his time was counted more sufficiently furnished than himself) was taken also for a brave warrior and man at arms. For being richly endued with all those good blessings that either nature or fortune can afford unto a man, he was both noble in birth, and wealthy in substance. In beautifull personage he excelled, for strength of body he far surpassed. Of tongue and speech he was thought most eloquent, whether he were to plead a cause at the bar, or occasion offered either in Senat house or before the assembly of the people to perswade or dissuade, to give counsel one way or other. In the Pontificall canons and laws, he was singularly well learned and skillfull. Besides all these praise-worthy qualities (I say) his Consulship had given him experience also in military affairs, and made him a worthy soldier. The same order that was taken for the Bruttian province

A vince, was also decreed for Beitarris and the Ligurians. M. Cornelius was commanded to put over and deliver up his army to the new Consul; and himself to continue still in government, and to rule the province of Trans with the strength of those legions which E. Scribonius the Pretor had under his charge the year before. After this, the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. Unto Quintus fell the Bruttii, unto Sparticus Geminus, Beitarris. Then the Pretors provinces also were put to the choice of lottery. And P. Elius his lot was to have the jurisdiction of the City of Rome; P. Lilius to rule Sardinia; P. Velus to govern Sicily; and Quintilius Varus to have the charge of Arbitria with two legions, which were commanded by Sp. Lucretius. And Lucretius had his commission revived again for a longer time, to the end, that he might reedifie the town Genna, which by Mago the Carthaginian had been rased and destroyed. As for P. Scipio, his commission B and government was not limited by any expresse time, but only with the end of the wars, and to command until those wars in Africa were fully determined. A decree also passed, that there should be a solemn procession and supplication holden to this effect, and in these terms, that whereas he had sailed over into the province of Africa, this voyage and expedition of his might turn to the safety and good of the people of Rome, of himself, and his army. In Sicily were enrolled three thousand soldiers. And for as much as the whole strength and manhood of that province had been shipped over into Africa: for fear lest some Armado should cut over out of Africa, it was thought expedient to guard all the sea coasts of Sicily, with a fleet of 40 sail. And Vellus had with him into Sicily 12 ships, newly built; the rest of the old ships in Sicily were repaired. For Admirall of this armada was appointed M. Pomponius the Pretor of the former year, whose government was prorogued, and he embarked the new soldiers brought out of Italy. The like number of ships the LL. of the Senat assigned unto Cn. Octavius the Pretor of the former year, with the same commission of government, for to defend the coasts of Sardinia. And Levulus was commanded to allow unto the Pretor 2000 soldiers for to man and furnish those ships. Moreover, the sea coasts of Italy, because it was uncertain to what parts the Carthaginians would make out their navy (and like it was, that where they should spy any place weak and distarmed of sufficient strength and garrison, thither they would direct and bend their forces) were committed to M. Minucius the Pretor of the former year, that he should scour the seas, and keep that side, with as many ships as the other. And for to furnish that fleet of his, the Consuls by order from the Senat enrolled three thousand soldiers, and referred two legions besides, against all doubtfull chances of war. D And whereas for the two provinces of Spain, together with the armies there, and the whole government they were appointed to the old Generals, L. Lentulus, and L. Minius Acilius. So the Armies was for this year were maintained with 20 legions in all, & with a hundred and sixty ships of war. Then the Pretors were commanded to take their journey into such several provinces. But the Consuls were charged before they departed from the City, to exhibite those great Games, which Sp. Maelius Torquatus the Dictator had vowed against the 3 years end, if to be the Commonwealth established in the same good and fortunate estate, during that time.

Now there entered into mens minds new doubts and strange scruples of conscience, by reason divers prodigious sights and tokens reported out of many places. For beleaved it was that certaine ravens had only pecked and rased with their bills, but also eat and devoured the gold in the Capitol. Wherein the mice and rats gnawed a crown of gold. About Capua, a huge number of locusts (from whence they came, no man knew for certain) overpiled all the grounds, and filled the fields. At Rome there was a horse-colt foaled with five feet. At Ardea were seen in the elements, such self-divers fire-lights shooting and flashing here and there, and afterwards a mighty blinding border burning. At Ardea a certain fire compassed the town with a thin course like unto smoke afterwards a greater shower of fire had enclosed the said towne from without forth. In the city of Ardea the earth in a plain champaign field settled and sunk down and made in exceeding great cracks, gave one of the Consuls killed the first beak for sacrifice, the liver thereof was burnt. The Carthaginians were taught and purged with sacrifices of the highest kind, and the rolling of the Priests and Bishops this was into what gods the sacrifice should be made. These things done and performed, the Consuls and Pretors went forth into their provinces, leaving all of them in full regard of Africa, as if it had been their own province. And when every one of them was gone, either because they saw that therein rested and consisted the whole importance of all things, and the main state of the wars, or else because they would gladly and curiously view with themselves how now the whole City made court to, and chiefly respected. And therefore not only the Ardea as is before said, but also out of Sicily and Spain there was transported thither victuals and wine a year and a more all out of Sicily, and all kind of victuals, for the maintenance of the army. And when it was winter season, yet Scipio feared the winter and works of war, which being many, caused his mind at once on every side, and he continually occupied. For he was besieged and encamped he lay opposite to G. Carthago, and even with his sight, the Carthaginians were with their ships afloat, and put to sea, and every day they shipped, furnished and trimmed, for to intercept all victuals that came out of those cities to furnish the wars. In the love of Syphax, it haply now he had his fill of his sight with his friends, since he had the full view of the situation thereof, as much as heart could desire. But Syphax had resolved himself of peace between the Romans and the Carthaginians, that the Romans should depart out of Africa, and the Carthaginians out of Italy. He had no hope, that he would revolt from the Carthaginians, in case the war

continued still. And for mine own part, I would rather beleve that these matters were treated upon by entercourfe of messengers, as most writers do report, than that Syphax himself in person, as Antius V. lervius recordeth, came into the Roman camp to sparle and conference thereabout. As the first the Roman Generall, would scarcely lend his ear to hear those overtures: but afterwards, to the end that there might be some colourable and probable cause for his people to resort unto the camp of the enemies, he seemed not so straight-laced, nor to deny the same articles so stiffly, but pretended some hope, that by often debating thereof to and fro between them, they should at length grow to some good point and finall agreement. The wintering harbours of the Carthaginians were in a manner all of wood, but built of slender stuff gathered out of the fields at a venture hand over head, where they could meet withall. The Numidians for the most part lay in cabins and sheds, wated and wound with reeds especially, and covered and thatched with mats of sedge and such like, here and there scattering without all order: in such sort, as some of them taking up their lodging at their own pleasure, without direction and commandment of any officer, quartered without the trench and rampier. Scipio advertised hereof, conceived good hope to find some opportunitie one time or other to fire the camp of the enemies. Upon a certain day therefore, he sent in train of those Commissioners whom he addrested unto Syphax, in stead of pages and drudges, and disguised in slaves and bondmens weeds, the bravest souldiers of a band, (men of approved valor, wildome and discretion) who whiles the commissioners were busie in conference, should range about the camp, some one way, some another; to espie and mark all the passages and waies in and out; the site and form generally of the whole leaguer, and particularly of every part; where the Carthaginians quartered; where the Numidians lodged; what distance there was between Asdrubal his tents, and the Kings pavilions; to observe also and learn withal, the order & the manner of their sentinels, their ward and watches, whether by night or by day they lay at more vantage to be surprised by an ambush. And according as there were divers meetings & conferences, and so of purpose some were sent one time, some at another: to the end that more & more still should have the spiall and full knowledge of all things in the enemies camp. Now when as often that this matter was treated of, the greater hope of peace both Syphax had and the Carthaginians likewise by his means; the Delegates or Commissioners aforesaid of the Romans, said that they were expressely forbidden by their Generall to return without a full and resolute answer. And therefore they willed him to make short work at once, and to bethinke himself what to do, either to stand upon his own determinat purpose (if he were resolved) or else to confult with Asdrubal and the Carthaginians, and determine accordingly. For now high time it is, say they either to conclude peace, or to prosecute war freshly, and to go through with it lustily. Thus while Syphax consulted with Asdrubal, and Asdrubal with the Carthaginians, both the espials had sufficient time to view and see all, and Scipio also good leisure to provide necessities for his purpose. Moreover, by this motive and hope of peace, as well the Carthaginians as the Numidians, began (as commonly in such cases it falleth out) to be negligent and slack in forecast, and to provide but in the mean while they came by no harme and detriment from the enemies. At length an answer was returned and some clause put in, without all reason, and sounding to much inconvenience by occasion that the Romans seemed too too faine and desirous of a peace, which fell out very fittly for Scipio whole only desire was to pick some just quarrell for to break the truce and abstinence of war: and so the next day (for in the mean time he said he would confer with his Counsell) he answered the Kings messenger in this wise, that besides himself alone, who laboured all in vain and could do no good, there was none liked of the peace: and therefore he willed him to report unto the King his master, that there was no other hope for Syphax to have peace with the Romans, unless he renounced and cast off quite the friendship of the Carthaginians. And thus he ended the truce, that with free conscience being discharged of his promise in that behalf, he might go forward in his designs, and bring his enterprise to his desired issue. So having put his ships to sea (for now the prime of spring was come) he embarked in them his artillery, his ordnance and engines of battery, as if he meant to assault Putea on the sea side. And sent out two thousand footmen, to possess themselves of the hill that overlooked Putea, which he had held out kept before him both to withdraw the minds of the enemies from that which he secretly designed and intended: & amule them upon the care and regard of another thing; and also to prevent a mischief, that while himself should go against Syphax and Asdrubal, they might not fall forth of the City, and shal his camp, left with a small guard to defend it. Having made this way, and laid this ground behind, he assembled his counsell, where he commanded as well the foresaid spies to lay forth and utter what they had seen and found, as also Masaniissa, who was acquainted with all the manners and fashions of the enemies: and then at last he declared and shewed unto them, what himself intended to execute the next night. Then he gave commandment to the Tribunes or Ko. Marshals, that so soon as the counsell was risen, and the court dismissed in the Generals pavilion, at the first found of trumpets immediately they should bring their legions out of the camp. Thus according to his edict, the ensignes began a little before sun-setting to set forth. About the first watch they put the souldiers in array ready for to march, and by midnight (for they were to journey lever miles) they going a fair and soft pace, approached the enemies camp. There Scipio gave unto Lalio a part of the forces together with Masaniissa and his band of Numidians, with direction to invade the camp of Syphax, and to set fire thereupon. Then calling them by themselves both apart one from the other, Lalio Imo and Masaniissa, he earnestly besought them of all love to make up and recom-

A recompence by carefull industrie and devotie that providence and forecast, which the darkness of the night disappointed them of. As for himself, he meant to set upon Asdrubal and the Carthaginian camp: but begin he would not, before he saw the fire amongst the kings tents. And it was not long first ere it began: for as soon as the fire caught hold of the next pavilions whereupon it was cast, by and by it took all that were nearest, and so forward to those that joynted unto them, it spread into all places of the camp. And verily into a great fright they were all put, as they could not choose, but needs must in a night fire, which was run all over in so short a time. Howbeit they thought it some fire by mischance only, and not the hand of the enemy, by occasion and means of war: and therefore unarmed as they were, and lightly appointed without weapons, they ran forth by heaps to quench the fire, and light fell upon their armed enemies, the Numidians especially, who by Masanissa that was well acquainted with the manner of the Kings camp, were bestowed in convenient places, at the ends of every avenue and passage. Many in their very beds and couches, between sleeping and waking, were consumed with the flame: many running headlong in this their hasty flight, one upon another, were in the streights of the gates troden under foot, or else thrust and crushed to death. The Sentinels and watch of the Carthaginians, espied at first the fire shining and flaming out: after whom others awakened and raised out of their nests by this nightly tumult and alarm, might behold and plainly see the flames: but they likewise were deceived as well as the other, and beleaved verily that the fire began of it self by some misfortune, no man wist how. The confused noise and cry also, which was heard while they were a killing, slaying and wounding, would not suffer them to know the truth indeed, whether the same arose upon their affright and suddain fear by night, or otherwise. And therefore every man naked as he was, and suspecting no practise at all of the enemy, at all the gates as they stood next, did what he could to bring with him such instruments and means as were to put out the fire: and hapned unawares upon the army of the Romans. Now after they were all massacred and put to the sword to the last man, not only upon an ordinary hatred between enemies, but also because there might not escape so much as one to carry newes unto the rest: Scipio immediately entered the gates, being not warded, but altogether neglected, as in such a fearfull garboil and hurlyburly it was no marvell. They fell a flinging of fire upon the lodgings and sheds that stood next, so as the flame brake out and shewed at first as if it had been dispersed in many places: but afterwards catching and spreading from one tent to another as they joynted close together, they were all at once on a light fire, and burnt every stick down to the ground. Men and cattell both, singed and scorched at the first, as they ran in piteous and fearfull sort away: but afterwards as they tumbled one upon another by heaps, stopped and choked up all the waies and avenues of the gates. And look who escaped the fire, fell upon the edge of the sword. Thus in one day were 2 camps clean consumed. Howbeit, both the Generals, and of so many thousands of armed men, only 2000 foot and 500 horse armed by halves, and many of them either wounded or else singed and half roasted with the fire, got away and escaped. There eight were slain or burnt to ashes upon 40000 men: taken prisoners there were above 6000: among whom there hapned to be many gentlemen of the Carthaginians, and 11 Senators. Of ensignes were taken 178. Of Numidian horses for service more than 2700. Six Elephants got alive, eight perished either with fire or sword: and a mighty deal of armor came to their hands: all which the L. General Scipio consecrated to Vulcan, and set on fire. Asdrubal with some few Africans that fled with him, rid away upon the spur to the next City: and thither got all rest, who remained alive, following the tracks of their captain, and there saved themselves. But afterwards lest that City should be yielded to Scipio, he quit the place and departed. Upon the Romans were received within the same at the gates standing open for them: and because willingly of themselves they rendred the town, there was no kind of hostility or violence offered unto them. But two other Cities one after another were forced and put to the ransack. All that pillage, as also whatsoever was saved out of the fire in the two camps, was freely given to the soldiers. Syphax encamped and fortified himself in a strong hold, almost eight miles off. But Asdrubal made halt to Carthage, for fear left upon the suddain fright occasioned by this fresh fall and late overthrow, things should go backward, and the Senat resolve upon some unmanly and unworthy course. Thither at the first arrived such fearfull news, that all men thought verily that Scipio would give over Vicia and forthwith lay siege unto Carthage: whereupon there Suffetes (who are the Consuls as it were, of the City) called the Senat: where three opinions were delivered amongst them. The first advised to dispatch Embassadors to Scipio to treat for peace: the second, to send for Annibal home to the defence of his own country, against so dangerous and deadly a war: the third gave counsell, by example of the Romans constancy and resolution in their adversity, to repair the army and gather new forces, and to request Syphax not to abandon and give over the quarrell. This opinion, because Asdrubal was in place (and all those that sided with the Barchine house and faction, evermore inclined to war) prevailed and took effect. Hereupon they began to take musters in town and country: Orators were addressed to Syphax, who of himself with all his might and main, was busied to levy fresh forces, and preparing for new war. For his wife now, not as aforetime, by inticing words, flattering speeches, and pleasant assurances, that might serve the turn to win and move the heart of an amorous lover, but by way of prayer and pitiful compassion had prevailed so much with him already: yes, and with plentiful tears besought him, not to betray her naturall father and native country, nor suffer Carthage to be burnt with flaming fire, like as the camps were consumed already.

"The Embassadors also brought with them new hopes besides, which were presented unto them in as happy a time as might be; who reported, that they fortuned to meet with 4000 Celtiberians brave and lusty young men, about the City named Otho, which had been levied and hired in Spain by their Commissioners, of purpose sent to take up new souldiers: and that Asdrubal himself in person would be present with a power of no small importance. Syphax not only entertained these Oratours with gracious speeches and courteous answers, but also shewed them a great number of Numidians, gathered out of the country towns; which some few daies before he had furnished with armour and horses, promising besides, that he would assemble all the young and able men for service throughout his whole realm. For well he wist, that the late losse and defeat hapned by occasion of fire, and not by fight: and never in war is a man to be reputed inferiour, before he be vanquished by mere forces in ranged battell. In this wise answered he the Embassadors. And after some few daies Asdrubal and Syphax once again joyned their forces together: so as in all, their host amounted to the number well neer of 30000 armed men.

Now when Scipio was wholly set upon the assault of Vrica, and at the point to bend his ordinance and artillery against the wals, as thinking verily that the war was already done with Syphax and the Carthaginians; the fame of the war renewed by them afresh, averted him from his purpose, and caused him to give over that enterprize for a time. So leaving behind him certain small guards, as well by water as land, only for a sign and shew of siege; himself with all the strength of his army, set forwards to meet the enemy. At the first he fare him down and encamped upon an hill, four miles (or very neer) distant from the Kings camp. The next day after, he descended with his cavalry down into the great Plains or Downs (for so they call them) lying neer the same hill; and spent that whole day in braving the standing corps de guard of the enemies before their camp, and playing upon them with skirmishes. And so for two daies together next ensuing, they passed the time in divers tumultuous excursions between the one part and the other, without doing any great exploit worth the remembrance. On the fourth day, they entered on both sides into the field, and embattailed themselves. Scipio marshalled his men in this wise: Behind the Principes in a vanguard, he placed the formost ensignes of his Hastati, or Spears; and the Triarii he bestowed in the reeward, for to second them. The Italian horsemen he set in the right point: the Numidian horse and Masaniissa he ranged in the left. Syphax and Asdrubal put their Numidians horse opposit to the Italians, and the Carthaginians to affront Masaniissa. In their main battell were planted the Celtiberians, to make head against the ensignes of the Roman Legions. Thus ordered and arranged, they encountered one another, and joyned battell. At the first onset, both wings at once, as well the Numidians as the Carthaginians, were put back and forced to give ground: for neither the Numidians (being for the most part country people and rusticall) were able to receive the Roman horsemen; nor the Carthaginians (raw and untrained souldiers) sufficient to hold out with Masaniissa; who (besides all other things) for his late and fresh victory, was so terrible, as there was no dealing with him. So the battell of the Celtiberians, (naked and disarmed of both her points) stood still; for neither saw they any likelyhood to escape and save themselves by flight, considering they knew not the coast of the country; nor hope to obtain pardon at Scipio his hand, against whom, (deserving so well of them and their nation) they were come into Africk with a power of waged mercenary souldiers. So being environed on every side with the enemies, they fell one upon another, and obstinately dyed to the last man. But while all the enemies were wholly employed about them, Syphax and Asdrubal gained themselves some time to get away & escape. The victors (wearied rather with continual killing than long fighting) were overtaken with the night. The morrow after, Scipio sent unto Lalinus and Masaniissa, with all the Roman and Numidian horse, and the nimblest and appointed footmen, after Syphax and Asdrubal for to follow the chase. Himself with the strength and body of that army, subdued all the Cities thereabout that were within the seignory of the Carthaginians, whom he partly forced by assault, and partly took by surrender for fear. Great was the fright ye may be sure at Carthage: and they thought no other but that Scipio being now in the train of conquest, would make hast to overrun the countrey; and when he had once brought under his subjection (and that with speed) all the other States there bordering, then at once he would come to assault Carthage. Therefore they fell to repair and make up the breaches of their wals, and to fortifie them with strong bulwarks: and every man did his best to bring out of the country all kind of provision, against the time they should abide a long and tedious siege. Few words or none at all of peace, but much talk of sending Embassadors to call home Annibal. The greatest part were of mind & gave advice, to make out the armado which stood ready rigged, for to intercept the Romans victuals, and to surprize and assault the Romans fleet, riding before *Vrica*retchedly without fear; and distrusting nothing: for peradventure they might also force the navall camp, left with a small guard for the defence thereof. And to this counsell the most enclined; yet they thought it good to send Embassadors to Annibal. For suppose that their navy should speed full well, and have the happiest success that they could wish, this only good would come thereof, that Vrica thereby might be in some sort eased of the freight siege wherewith it was invested: as for the defence of Carthage it self, they neither had any other Generall besides Annibal, nor army left but only his. Whereupon the next day after, the ships were shot into the water, and set afloat: and withall the Embassadors took their way towards Italy. All things were huddled up and done

A in-halt; such was their fortune that pricked them forward, and gave them no further time. And look if any one man slackt his business never so little, he was reputed to betray the whole state, and the safety of all.

Scipio now marching with an army, laden with the spoil and pillage of many Cities; sent the prisoners away, and all the prizes besides, unto the old camp before Vesca. And wholly set upon the conquest of Carthage; he surprised Tunis (a City abandoned of her guard left for defence) situate from Carthage almost twelve miles. The place, both by mans hand was strongly fenced, and by nature surely seated: and as it might be easily seen from Carthage, so it yeilded a goodly prospect to Carthage, and also to the sea all about Carthage. From thence the Romans (as they were hard at work, in fortifying themselves with a trench and rampier) discovered the enemies fleet, sailing from Carthage towards Vesca. Laying therefore their work aside, they sounded the remove, and presently in all haste advanced their ensigns, to prevent that their own ships which stood close to the shore, bent wholly to the siege, and nothing fitted and furnished for a sea-fight, might not be surpris'd and boarded. For how possibly could ships heavily charged, carrying artillery, ordnance and engines of battery, be ever able to withstand an Armado nimble appointed, rigged and trimmed for the purpose with all ship furniture meet for battell, and manned besides with armed souldiers? How might our ships (I say) withstand the enemy, which either are converted to the use of merchant-ships of burden; or else so near set to the wals, that they serve in stead of a platform and bank, or else of bridges to enter upon the City? Scipio therefore, after he was thither come, and had bestowed his wars ships with brassen beaks behinds in the rereward near to land, which (as the manner is in fight at sea) might guard and defend the rest: opposed the Hulks and Caricks in a four-fold rank and course, in stead of a wall afront the enemy. And because that in the tumult of the fight, those ranges might not be broken and disordered, he laid the masts and sail-yards over-crosse, reaching from ship to ship; and with strong cables he linked and fastned them all in one together, and laid boards and planks over them, that men might passe every way from one ship to another. But under those very bridges, he left certain spaces between, from whence the light pinnaces and frigots might make out to charge and recharge the enemy, and retire themselves thither again in safety. Having thus in haste (according as the time would give him leave) set these matters in order; there were to the number almost of a thousand elect and choise souldiers put aboard into those ships of burden, to make head in the forefront, & withstand the violence of the enemies; and furnished they were with offensive weapons, but missive especially, to shoot and sling from them: and such store thereof they had together, as might serve for the assault were it never so long. Thus appointed and prepared, they waited the coming of the enemies. The Carthaginians, who if they had made good speed, might have surpris'd them unawares, and found all pell-mell and out of order whiles they were troubled, frighted, and to seek what to do upon that sudden occurence) fearing still as men out of heart and dismayed, with so many foils by land, and thereupon distrusting themselves even at the sea also; where (no doubt) they were the better and more puissant: and having trifled out all the live-long day, and sailed but slowly; about the sun-set arrived in the haven, which the Africans call Ruscinon. And the next morning by sun-rising, they put forth into the open sea, and ranged their ships in order, as against a set navall battell: supposing that the Romans would make out and receive them. When they had stood thus a long time, and perceived the enemies not to stir or once to set forward, then at last they charged upon the foresaid hulks and ships of burden. The service was nothing like a sea-fight, but resembling for all the world the ships that are to assaile the wals of some Town. For the hulks were a good deal taller and stood a loft over the enemies. And the Carthaginians out of their war ships armed and breasted with brassen beaks let flie many a dart in vain, as lancing them from beneath faintly against the higher place; whereas the shot from above out of the Caricks, was levelled with more strength and by reason of their own poise light also with greater force. The light pinnaces for spial, and the other small barks, which made sallies from under the bridges aforesaid, framed of planks upon masts and sail-yards, at the first were encountered, overcharged and hidden only with the violence and greatness of those war-ships: but afterwards they were some trouble to the defendants of their own side; for that being intermingled amongst the enemies ships, their own fellows were forced oftentimes to stay their hands, and neither shoot arrow, nor lance dart, for fear of misting their enemies, and lighting amongst their own part. At the last, the enemies from out of the Carthaginian ships, began to cast out certain loggets, with iron hooks at the end (which the souldiers use to call Harpagones) [Grapples] for to take hold upon the Roman ships. Which when the Romans were not able to cut in sunder, no more then the very chains whereto they hung, and whereby they were slung, then ye might have seen (as any one of their enemies war-ships and gallees rowed back, and towed after it a Roman Carick hanging by the grapple end) the boards and ropes cut asunder, by which it was tied and fastned unto others, or else another range and course of more ships together, to follow after the tail of the other. By this device especially were all the bridges torn and rent in peeces, and scarcely had the defendants any time and space to retire and passe into the second rank of ships behind. Thus there were about six Caricks of the Romans drawn away to Carthage, hanging at the poops of their gallees. Their gladness and joycing hereat was much greater than the thing it self came to, and the more acceptable in that amidst so many continuall losses and plentiful tears of theirs, one only joy as small as it was, shining upon them beyond their expectation, cald and lightned their hearts: considering withall how neer by all likelyhood and appearance the Roman armado was to a mischief and finall destruction, had not the captains of their own gallies foretold so much, and Scipio come in time to help.

It fortuned about the same time, that Lalio and Masanissa were come within 15 daies into Numidia; the Masseylians rendered Masanissa the ancient realm belonging to him by inheritance from his father, and received him with joy, as their King whom they had long time desired. Syphax seeing his captains and garrisons disceizd and displaced, kept himselfe within the ancient limits of his own Kingdome, but was not like to be long at rest and quiet. For his wives father on the one side, and his wife again on the other, set him on, and pricked him forward continually to make arms against the Romans: and so doted he on her in excessive love, that needs he must yeeld to her, there was no remedy. Besides, so mighty he was in numbers of men and horse, that the puissance of a Kingdome flourishing so many years together, offering and presenting it self daily to the eye, had been enough to have made a Prince proud, that was not so barbarous and uncivil as he, and had some better rule and mastery of his affections then himself had. When he had assembled together as many as were able for service, he furnished them with horses, and with armour, as well offensive as defensive. The Cavalry he sorted and divided into small troops and cornets, the infantry into the cohorts and squadrons, according as he had learned long since of the Roman centurions. And thus having raised an army, equall for number to the former, but standing altogether in manner, of new and untrained souldiers, he put himself on his journey against the enemies. And after he had encamped neer unto them, at the beginning some few light horsemen advanced forward from the corps de guard, in especiall, so neer as they might with safety, but being set back from thence with arrows & javelins, they retired unto their companies. After this they began on both sides to make out one against another, and to maintain light skirmishes; and when of any part they had taken the foil, they would again for anger return in greater number which is the wonted manner to kindle a battell between horsemen: for whiles the winners hope still of better, and the looser chafes for having the worse, the company ever encreaseth on both sides. And thus now, after some few had scuffled and blowed the coals, at length the whole armie of either part, came forth into the field eager of fight, and to strike a set battell. So long as the horse service, the Masseylians were so many, as there were hardly any dealing with them, Syphax sent them out in such great troops: but after that the Roman footmen once had suddainly entred between the cornets of their horsemen, which gave way as they came, and had gotten sure footing and made head, and so frightened the enemy: charging so free upon the spur as he did then, the Barbarians began to ride their horses more easily, and within a while gently to stand still, and in the end, not only to give ground to the footmen, but also to retreat from the horsemen, who now were the more bold and hardy, being flanked with a guard of footmen.

And now by this time the standards of the legions advanced forward, and approached neer hand. But when the Masseyli were so far from receiving and enduring their first charge, that they might not abide the very sight so much, as of their ensignes and armour, so mightily wrought with them either the remembrance of former overthrowes already passed, or the present fear of imminent danger. Where Syphax, while he rode bravely in the face of the enemies troops and squadrons, if happily for very shame, or for the perill of his own person, he might stay his men from running away, had his horse under him fore wounded, and being cast off his back to the earth, as overpresed with the number, taken prisoner, and brought alive unto Lalio, for to represent unto Masanissa above all others a goodly shew and joyfull sight to behold. Now was Cirtba, the head City of all the Kingdome of Syphax, and thither after the flight, betook themselves a mighty multitude of people. The slaughter in this battell was less in proportion, then the victory, because the horsemen only maintained the conflict. Not above five thousand were slain, and not halfe so many taken prisoners. And when they had made an assault upon the camp whither the frightened multitude after the losse of their King, had retired, Masanissa came unto Lalio and said, that for the present there could be nothing more pleasing and honourable unto him, then upon his victory to visit and see his fathers Kingdome, which he had recovered and won again after so long a time. But as in adversity, so likewise in prosperity (qd. he) tract of time and delays are never good. In case therefore Lalio would permit him and his horsemen, together with conquered Syphax to go before unto the City Cirtba, he would surprize them on a suddain, finding all out of frame and to seek by reason of this to suddain and unexpected fear: and Lalio with his footmen might travell fair and softly, and come after with easie journies. Lalio yeelded hereunto. Whereupon, being gone afore unto Cirtba, he commanded the principall Citizens of Cirtba to be called forth unto a parle. But all the whiles that they were ignorant of the Kings unhappy fall, and so long as Masanissa uttered nothing of that which was hapned, he might not prevail either with threats or faire words and perswasions untill he presented the King before them a bound prisoner. Then at so heavy an object and miserable spectacle, they lift up a pitifull cry, and made great lamentation. And partly for fear they abandoned the defence of the wals, and partly by a generall consent to court the Conqueror, and to seek for grace and favour at his hands, they set the gates open. Then Masanissa, after he had bestowed about the gates, and in convenient places of the wals, certain strong guards, to keep that no man should stir and make an escape, he rode a gallop to the royall

A roiall pallace, for to be possessed of it. As he entred within the fore-gates thereof, even in the very entrance of the porch, Sophonisba the wife of Syphax, and daughter of Asdrubal the Carthaginian, met him on the way: and espying in the mids of the armed train Masanissa full gorgeously dight, as well in his brave armor, as in other goodly stay and ornaments, imagining him to be the King (as he was indeed) she fell down prostrat at his feet, and spake in this wise: " True it is (quoth she) O Masanissa, that the Gods above, together with your own vertue and fidelity have given you full power and puissance, to doe with us according to your pleasure: but if it be lawfull for me a poor prisoner and captive woman, to open my mouth and make an humble speech unto my Lord, and in whose only hands lieth my life and death: if I may be so bold to touch your knees, and that victorious right hand of yours: I would beseech and pray you for B, the honour of the roiall majesty of a Prince, wherein we also our selves erewhile were interested; in the love and name of the Numidian nation, which now is common to you and Syphax, by the domesticall gods, protectors of this regall house and princely palace, who vouchsafe to receive you into it at this present with better presages and more fortunat tokens, then lately they sent Syphax out of it; to deign me a lowly suppliant this favour, and grant me this petition, as to determin your self of me your captive whatsoever pleaseth you, & not to suffer me to fall into the proud hands and inhumane disposition of any Roman. If there were nothing else but this, that I was sometime wife and Queen to Syphax, yet would I rather trie the courtesie and humanity of a Numidian, and one born in Africk as well as my self then of a stranger and alien. But what hard measure a Carthaginian lady, and the daughter of Asdrubal, may fear at a Roman's hand, you see and know full well. Wherefore once again I request and intreat your highnesse upon my knees, to regard my suit: and if there be no way else to save and keep me from the will and appetite of the Romans, to put me to death out of hand. For beauty she surpassed and was incomparable: for years lusty, and in the very best of her age. And therefore when as now she held him fast by the hand, and requested his protection and honourable word, only for this, that she might not be delivered and betrayed to a Roman, placing & setting her words so well, and couching them so cunningly, that they founded neerer to speeches for to win love, then prayers to crave pity: see the fanisie and affection of this victorious Prince! he enclined presently not only to mercy and compassion, but also (as all the kind of these Numidians are full of love, and have no stay of their wapon lust) a conqueror otherwise though he were, yeelded himself prisoner to the love of his captive: D and after he had given her his right hand for assurance to perform her request, he went into the palace. This done, he began to cast about with himself how he might make good his promise unto Sophonisba: but finding no meanes else to compass and bring it about, he borrowed foolish, rash, and shameless counsell of blind love. He made no more ado, but commanded in all hast to prepare that very day for the solemnization and marriage with Sophonisba, because he would give neither Lalius, nor Scipio himself, any liberty at all to proceed against her as a prisoner, after she were once the wedded wife of Masanissa. The wedding was no lonner done, but behold Lalius came, a guest unsest for and nothing welcome: who so little dissembled how much he misliked the thing, that he was once about to have plucked her forth of the bride-bed, and sent her away even with Syphax and other prisoners to Scipio. But overcome with the earnest prayers of Masanissa, who besought and importuned him to refer the matter over to Scipio, for to arbitrate and decide unto whether of the two Kings Sophonisba should be awarded, for to mend their state, and better their fortune, he sent away Syphax alone with the rest of the prisoners, and by the help of Masanissa, wan and recovered the other Cities in Numidia, which were held by the garrisons of the King. When news came into the camp that they were bringing Syphax thither, all the multitude went forth as it were to behold a triumph. Himself went bound before all the rest, and a number of Numidian noblemen and gentlemen followed after. Then every man to set forth and amplifie this victorie, magnified what he could the greatness of King Syphax, and the glorious renown of the nation, in these termes: That he was the King, unto whose majesty the two most mighty and puissant states of the world, to wit, the Romans and the Carthaginians attributed so much, that F Scipio the Generall of the one, for to seek his amity, left the province of Spain and the army there, and with two Caravals or Gallies ruled with five banks of oars, sailed over into Africk; and Asdrubal the great commander of the Carthaginians, not only repaired himself in person unto him into his Kingdome, but also gave him his daughter in marriage: so as at one time he had in his power the two grand-captains, of Carthaginians and Romans both. And like as both these nations killed sacrifices unto the immortall gods, and craved thereby their grace and favour, so of both parties at one time was his friendship sought for, and desired. And as for his power and puissance, it was so great, that he expelled Masani out of his own Realm, and drove him to this narrow point, that the best meanes he had to preserve his life, was either the running rumour of his death, in the lurking holes of the wild woods, wherein he was glad to live G by rapine and stealth, after the guise of savage beasts. The King thus talked of in every mans mouth that stood about him, was brought at length into the Buxtorium or Generals pavilion, and there presented unto Scipio. And Scipio verily was much moved in mind to consider the former state and fortune of the man, compared now with his present condition: and to remember withall and call to mind the hospitall intertainment, the giving interchangeably of the right hand, and the covenant between them made both in publick and private. In these regards likewise Syphax took heart, and spake more frankly unto the conquerour. For when Scipio demanded of him

"What he meant, and for what intent he not only renounced alliance with the Romans, but also "began himself first to make war upon them: he made answer again and confessed, That he had "indeed done amiss, and plaid the fool. As for his taking armes against the people of Rome, "that was not the beginning of his folly, but rather the very end of his frantick foolishness. Then it "was, and never else but then, that he went besides himselfe and was bereft of his wits; then he "abandoned out of his mind and cleane forgot, as well private enmity by a hospitall entertainment, "as all publick alliance by solemn covenants; when as he received into his house a Carthagini-
 "an lady for his wife: then his royall court and palace was set on fire & burned with those nuptial "torches. That furious fiend it was (quoth he) and pestilent dame, that by all kind of pleasant al-
 "luring baits, and flattering enticements possessed my mind, drew away and alienated my heart; and "never rested she, untill with her own hands she laid upon my body impious and ungodly armour "against my owne guest and loving friend. And yet as desperate and as wofull as my case is, in all "my miseries and calamities, this one thing doth me good and enjoyeth my heart, that I see the "same pestiferous fury, that fiend of hell, and lim of the Devill, gotten into the house and family of "him, who is the most deadly and mortall enemy that I have in all world. Neither surely will Ma-
 "sanissa demean himself more wisely, soberly and constantly then Syphax: nay, considering his "youthfull years, he wil be as apt to be mis-led by love, and more subject to the temptations of a "woman. Certainly in this action of espousing her, he hath shewed more folly a great deal, and "want of government. When he had uttered these words not only upon a spitefull hatred against "an enemy, but also upon some new pricks of jealousy rising in his heart, seeing her whom he lov"ed, in the possession of his concurrent, Scipio was driven into no small dumps, and wist not well
 "what to make of it. And as he began to be suspicious of Masanissa for this marriage, so, to speak
 "a truth, the circumstances thereof hammered in his head, and made him conceive hardly of him;
 "for fear that another day by the suggestions of the same woman, he would play false, and tres-
 "passe as well as Syphax. The marriage was so huddled up as it were in the mids of war and hostility, "without the advice, without the privy, and without the expectation of Lelius his company. Such "hast he made all on the head, & without advisement, the very same day that he set eye first upon the "queen his prisoner, he must needs espouse and marry her out of hand, and in the very house of his "greatest enemy consummate and solemnise the complements of sacred wed-lock. Moreover to ag"gravate these matters and make them seem more foul and shamefull, Scipio knew full well, that "Masanissa during the time that he remained in Spain a lusty young gentleman, it was never known "that he was enamoured upon the lovely beauty of any captive woman. As he toiled and revolved "these things in his mind, Lelius and Masanissa chanced to come in place. And after he "had welcomed them both alike, and shewed them a loving and gracious countenance, yea and "honoured them with singular praise and commendations openly in a frequent audience and court,
 "he within his lodging took Masanissa into a secret place apart, and began to speak unto him in this "manner: I suppose Masanissa, that you saw in me some good part, for love whereof both at the first
 "you were induced to come into Spain and contract amity with me; and afterwards also in A-
 "fricke, you reported of our self and all your hopes in my fidelity and protection. But of all those ver-
 "ties, for which I have seemed worthy of your affectionat love, there is not one wherein I may
 "so much glory and take joy and take comfort, as in temperance, continency, and the bridling of "carnall delights, and fleshly pleasures. This vertue Masanissa, I wish that you also would have
 "joynd unto the rest that are in you so rare and excellent. For our ages (trust we truly) stand-
 "eth not so much in danger of armed enemies, as of those earthly pleasures that compass us on "every side. And he that by his sobriety and governance hath been able to rule and tame the same,
 "hath won himself more honour, and gotten a greater victory, then we have done by the con"quest and subduing of Syphax. What valiant exploits and worthy acts you have archived in mine
 "absence I have willingly reported, and still remember. For the rest I had rather you would con"sider of them by your self, then change colour and blush at my rehearfall of them. Syphax through "the good fortune, and by the forces of the people of Rome, is vanquished and taken prisoner.
 "And therefore himself, his wife, his realm, his lands, his towns, the inhabitants thereof, and "finally all things else whatsoever that belongeth unto Syphax, are become a bootie to the people "of Rome. The King himself, and the Queen his wife, in case she had not been a citizen born of "Carthage, in case we had not seen her Father to be at the grand Captain of our enemies, ought "by right to have been sent to Rome; that the Senat and people of Rome might passe their cen-
 "sure, award and judgement of her, who is reported to have alienated a confederat King from us,
 "and to have caused him rashly and inconsiderately to take armes against us. Strive then to rule
 "and master your lusts and affections, take heed you stain not many good vertues with one bad
 "vice. Marre not the grace, deface not I say, the thank of many worthy deserts, by one fault and "trespass greater indeed, then the subject cause and occasion thereof. Masanissa, while he heard
 "these words, not only blushed as red as fire, but also began to water his plants. And when he had "promised for his part to be overruled and let down by the Generall, and requested him withall,
 "so far forth as possibly the case would permit, to tender and regard his promise, wherein rashly
 "and inconsiderately he had entangled himself, (for given his faithfull word he had, that he would "not deliver and betray her into the hands and power of any other) he departed out of the Preto-
 "rium or Generall his court, all dismaied and exceedingly troubled in spirit and betook himself to "his own pavillion. Where all solitary and alone by himself, after he had passed over some time,
 "with

A with fetching many deep sighs and sobs, so as he might easily be overheard by them that stood about his tent, at the last he gave one grievous groan above the rest, and with that called for one of his trusty groomes, who had under his hand the keeping (as the manner was of Kings and Princes) of a speciall poyson, against all doubtfull chances that might happen. Which he commanded him to temper in a goblet of wine, and to carry it to Sophonisba, and withall to tell her thus much from him. "That Masanissa would have been most willing to perform his plighted troth and first promise, which an husband ought unto his wedded wife. But since that the superiour powers, and those that were mightier than himself, had bereft him of that puissance and liberty, he was ready and able yet to accomplish a second behest, namely, that she should not come alive into the hands of the Romans; and therefore he advised her, that in remembrance of her father a noble warrior and Commander, of her native country, of two Kings to whom she had been married, she would provide for her self, and save her own honour. This credence and message, together with the poyson, the servant when he was come unto Sophonisba, delivered unto her. Whereat, I accept (quoth she) this marriage present, and welcome be it to me, if this be the best token that a husband could find to send unto his wife. Yet thus much signifie unto him from me again, that better content I would have been to die, if my marriage bed had not stood so neer to my grave. She spake not the word so stoutly, but she did the deed as resolutely; for she took the cup in hand, and shewed no sign at all of fear, she roundly drank it off. When tidings hereof came unto Scipio, for fear lest the hot, humorous, and passionat young Prince, might do him self some mischief, he presently sent for him. One while he gave him good & comfortable words; another while he gently rebuked him, in that he would seem to make amends for one folly with another, and to play a more cruell and tragicall part then there was need. The next day after, to the end that he might withdraw his mind away from this present fit of troublesome fancies, he mounted up into his Tribunal seat, and assembled an audience. There first, he openly styled Masanissa by the name of King, and honored him with singular praises and commendations; which done, he gave him a golden crown, a fair cup likewise of gold, a chair of estate and a scepter, both of ivory, a rich long robe imbrodered of divers colours, and a coat wrought with needle work, representing the Date tree. These honourable presents wanted no words to set them out. For as (quoth he) there is nothing among the Romans more stately and magnifical than triumph, so they that ride in triumph, have no ornaments more rich and sumptuous then this, which the people of Rome esteeme. Masanissa only of all strangers and aliens to be worthy of. After this he gave Lalius also his due and deserved praises, and bestowed upon him a coronet of gold. Other martial men likewise according to the service which they had done, were rewarded with sundry gifts. The King having these honours done unto him, was quieted and contented in mind, and conceived some assured hope, now that Syphax was displaced & rid out of the way, shortly to compass and enjoy the whole kingdom of Numidia. Then Scipio having sent C. Lalius with Syphax and other captives unto Rome, accompanied also with the Embassadors of Masanissa, returned himself with his power again to Tunes. And there what fortifications and works he had begun afore, now he finished perfectly and brought to an end.

* Vt tunica recta toga pura; clavata pretextae, sic palmata, toga picta respondet. Cyprianus Sig. De Indis, lib 3. cap. 19.

The Carthaginians who were filled with a kind of joy that was not only short, but also in manner vain and foolish, grounded upon their late assault of the Armado, which (considering their present state) was fortunat enough; after they heard that Syphax was taken prisoner, in whom they had reposed more hope (well neer) then in Asdrubal and their own army, were mightily affrighted and daunted; and would give no more ear to any that perswaded war, but sent as orators to sue for peace, thirty of their principall ancients: and they amongst them were (as one would say) their privy counsell of state, and had the greatest power and authority to sway and overrule the whole body of the Senat. Who being entred into the Roman camp and the Generall his lodging and pavillion, fell down prostrat (after the manner and guise as I take it, of the country) from whence they were first descended like those that worship & adore the gods. And to this their humble reverence, their language was suitable and correspondent; not excusing themselves and their fault, but transferring the beginning and occasion thereof, upon Asdrubal and his favorites about him, and soothed him and bare him up in his wilfull pride and insolent ambition craving pardon for their City of Carthage, which twice already had been subverted and overthrown by the inconsiderat folly of her own citizens: yet once again you would gladly be saved and stand upright by the meanes and goodnesse of their enemies: for as much as they knew full well, that the people of Rome sought not the utter extermination and destruction of those whom they had vanquished by force of arms, but only the sovereignty and rule over them: promising fealty and homage to them ready to serve in all loyalty, and to perform whatsoever it should please them to impose and lay upon them. Scipio made them this answer again, and said, that as he came into Africa upon hope to return home with conquest and not with peace: so that hope of his by the prosperous and happy successe of his wars hitherto, was much bettered and augmented. Howbeit although he assured himself of the absolute victory, as if he had it fast enough in his hand, yet a good accord he would not refuse: that all nations of the world might know, that the people of Rome can both begin wars rightfully, and also end the same as justly. My will therefore (quoth he) and pleasure is, that the conditions of peace shall be these. Inprimis, that the Carthaginians shall restore and deliver back all the prisoners that they have taken in the wars: with all the renegates and fugitives that have fled to their side from us. Item, that they remove their forces

* Tyrus in Thénicia. Where, like as in other countries of Asia, the people are most servile and very Idolatrous to their Princes.

"forces out of Italy and France. Item, that they forbear to meddle in Spain. Item that they abandon "and quit all the Ilands between Italy and Africk. Item, to yeeld up all their ships of war saving "only twenty. Item, that they deliver unto the Romans, of wheat 300000 Modii, and of bar"ley 300000. [Now what was the sum of money that he required or demanded, of them, it is "not certainly agreed upon. In some writers I find 5000 talents: in others, five thousand pound "weight only of silver: and there be that have set down, that they laid upon them a double pay
 "of all the souldiers.] Upon these conditions (saith he) whether ye will like of peace or no, ye "shall have three daies respite and liberty to consult and consider. If you will accept thereof in these
 "termes, make a truce with me for the present, and sent your Embassadors unto Rome to the Senat
 "there. Thus the Carthaginians, when they had agreed together, and concluded to refuse no ar"ticles and conditions of peace whatsoever, were dismissed. But in truth they sought for nothing "else but delays and tract of time untill Annibal were sailed over into Africk. So they "addressed certain Embassadors unto Scipio to enter a truce: others they dispatched to Rome to treat
 "for a peace: who brought with them for a shew, some few captives, renegates, and fugitives, to the "end they might obtain their sute more easily. But Laelius with Syphax and other captives (the "principall nobles and gentlement of the Numidians) was many daies before arrived at Rome, and
 "had declared unto the LL. of the Senat all things in order as touching their good speed and successe
 "in Africk, to the great contentment and joy of all men for the present, and with exceeding hope "for the time to come. Then the LL. after consultation had, gave order that the King should be leag to "Alba, there to lie in ward and safe custodie, and that Laelius should be kept still at Rome, untill the "Carthaginian Embassadors came. A solemn procession for four daies was decreed. And P. Aelium
 "the Pretor, after he had dismissed the Senat, called presently an assembly of the people, and to"gether with C. Laelius went into the Rostra (or pulpit for public orations.) Where the people hear"ing that the Carthaginian army was defeated, that the King of great name and renown was o"vercome and taken prisoner; that all Numidia was overrun from one end to the other with a
 "noble and singular conquest; they could no longer contain their joy in silence, but in shouts and "acclamations and other tokens (usuall in the assembly of a multitude) expresse and signifie their "exceeding gladness and contentment of heart. Whereupon the Pretor immediately made procla"mation, that the Church-wardens and sextons should set open all the holy temples and chappels
 "throughout the City, and give the people liberty, and leave all the day long, devoutly to go about "the gods, reverently to salute them, and heartily to render thanksgiving for this atchieved victory.
 "The next day following, he admitted the Embassadors of Masanissa into the Senat house, and gave "them audience. Who first and formost rejoyced in the behalt of the Senat, for the prosperous "wars and happy successe of P. Scipio in Africk: than they gave thanks, that he not only had en"titled Masanissa their lord and master by the bare name of King, but also invested him a King in"deed by restoring him to his fathers Kingdome. Wherein it it pleaseth the LL. of the Senat, he "might reign, now that Syphax was removed and gone, without fear and trouble at all. Also for "that he solemnly in the open assembly praised him in most honourable termes, and adorned him "richly with right stately and precious gifts. For to deserve which favors and honours done unto "him, as he had indeavoured already, so would he henceforth not fail to do his best. Then they "made a petition that the Senat would confirm and ratifie by their act and decree, his royall style "and title of a King, with other benefits and favours received of Scipio. And this moreover particular"ly Masanissa would request (if he might be so bold, and that it stood with the pleasure of the Senat)
 "that they would enlarge and set at liberty all the Numidian captives that lay in prison in Rome: for "this would be a thing whereby he should acquire much honour and reputation, and gain great "love and favour amongst his people and countrey men at home. To these points the Embassador "received this answer. Concerning the prosperous affairs of the wars in Africk, they "congratulated likewise, and rejoyced reciprocally with the King. As for Scipio, they liked well, and "confirmed his act in giving Masanissa the name of King: and therein he had done well and justly "and according to good reason. And whatsoever he had passed else to the honour of Masanissa, the "LL. approved and commended the same. Then they decreed certain presents that the Embassa-
 "dors should carry unto the King: to wit, two purple souldiers cassocks, each of them with a clasp "of gold; and as many rich coats embrodered and bestudded with purple. Also two couriers bar"bed and trapped, with their rich caparisons: two complete armours for horses, with their curre-
 "ces: likewise pavillions, with all their military furniture, in as full and ample manner as a Con"sul is allowed. These presents (I say) had the Pretor direction to send unto the King. As for the Em-"bassadors themselves, there was bestowed upon them no less then 3000 Ases a peece; and upon "their followers in the train, each of them 1000 Ases. Also a double suit of apparell for either of "the Embassadors, and one single sute to every one throughout their train: as also to those Numidi-
 "ans, who being set at large out of prison, were to be delivered again to the King. Over and be"sides, there was appointed for the Embassadors, lodging of free cost; gardenage and walking "places of pleasure; allowance for their table, and all provision else whatsoever, at the Cities ex-"pences.

In that summer when these decrees passed at Rome, and those affairs were atchieved in A- frick, P. Quinctilius Varus Pretor, and M. Cornelius Vice-consul, fought a set battell with Ma- go the Carthaginian, in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France. In the vanguard

vanguard were placed the legions of the Pretor. Cornelius kept the legions in the reeward, and himself in person rode to the standards in the forefront. And before both wings, the Pretor and Vice-consull encouraged all that ever they could, the souldiers for to advance the ensigos, and give a charge upon the enemy. But seeing he could not prevail nor do any good, then quoth Quintilius to Cornelius: you see how the fight slaketh and waxeth cooler, and the enemies that were timorous, are hardened and heartened by this resistance beyond their hope and expectation; yea, and it is to be feared, that they will turn to be hardy also, and make head against us. We must needs raise up a storm of Cavalry, if we would disorder them, and put them out of array. And therefore either do you maintain fight either in the front, whiles I bring the men of arms into the battell, or else will I fight here in the vanguard, whiles you send out the horsemen of four legions upon the enemies. And when the Vice-consull was willing to accept of whether service the Pretor would, then Quintilius the Pretor, with his son aforesaid Marcus, a lusty young gallant, went to the horsemen, commanded them to mount on horseback, and suddainly all at once sent them against the enemy. The tumult and noise which the horsemen made, was answered & redoubled by the shout that the footmen set up. And verily the enemies battell had not been able to have kept their ground, but that Mago at the first stirring of the Cavalry, made out the Elephants forth with into the battell, whom he had in readiness for such purpose. At the uncouth braying, the strong smell, and hideous sight of which beasts, the hortes were affrighted: and so the aid of horse fight proved vain. And as the Roman Cavalry interlaced among the Infantry was more strong and forcible, where they had the use both of lance point aloof, and of sword edge close at hand: so when they were transported and carried far off with their panting and fearfull hortes, the Numidians horsemen had the more room to shoot their darts against them with better advantage. Besides this disorder, the twelfth legion of footmen (whereof a great part was beaten down and slain, more for shame then upon any strength and valour, kept their place still; but never had been able to have held out any longer, but that the thirteenth legion drawn forth of the reeward into the vanguard, reenforced the battell that was in hazard and lay a bleeding: and Mago withall for his part, came in with the Frenchmen out of the reeward, and opposed them against this fresh legion; but when they were once discomfited and put back (which required no great ado nor long fight) the Hastati or Javeliniers of the eleventh legion gathered round together and charged upon the Elephants, which now also began to break the ranks of the footmen. But when they had lanced their javelins against them standing thick together in multitudes (and lightly there was not one of them hit amisse but did his errand) they forced them all to turn back upon their own battell: so four of them were sore wounded and fell down dead. Then the vanguard of the enemies began somewhat to give ground; and withall, the whole strength of the Roman footmen seeing the Elephants turn tail, came forward at once for to encrease the disordered tumult, and put them in greater fear. But so long as Mago stood stoutly to it, and standing in the forefront of the ensigos, the ranks and files as they went back softly, and retired by little and little, still maintained fight as before in good order: but after that they saw him shot through the thigh and fallen; and therewith carried forth of the battell for dead, incontinently they were all defeated and put to flight. There were slain of enemies about five thousand, and of military ensigos eighteen won and carried away. The Romans likewise bought not this victory without losse of blood. For of the Pretors army were lost two thousand and three hundred, and the greater part of them by far were of the twelfth legion. Whereof two Tribunes Military or Colonels also lost their lives, M. Coscennius and M. Manius. Likewise of the thirteenth legion, which came last to the conflict, Cn. Helvius a Colonell, in renewing the fight was slain, and eighteen men of arms besides, most brave and excellent horsemen, with Centurions who were by the Elephants troden down, trampled under foot, and so perished. And no doubt the battell had continued longer, but that by occasion of the Generall his hurt, the victory was given away and yielded. Mago in the dead time of the next night dislodged and departed; and stretching out his journey so far as possibly for his wound he might, he marched away untill he was come to the sea side, unto the Ingauni in Liguria: where the Embassadors sent from Carthage (who a few daies before were arived in the French gulf) repaired unto him, commanding him with all speed possible to sail unto Africk, for as much as his brother Annibal likewise (unto whom also there were Embassadors gone with the like message and commission) would do the same. For the State of Carthage now was not in case, nor upon terms to defend and keep in obedience by force of armes France and Italy, but to see to home. Mago not only moved with the commandment of the Senat, and the danger of his country, but fearing also lest the enemy following the train of his victory, would pursue and set upon him, if he made long stay; and doubting lest the Ligurians likewise, seeing Italy abandoned by the Carthaginians, would revolt and turn unto those, under whose obedience they were like shortly to be reduced: albeit he had no hope that his hurt should have lesse shaking at sea by sailing, then on land by travelling, or to find things there more handsome and ready for the cure, embarked his army and departed. But before he was well gotten beyond the point and lands end of Sardinia, he died of his wound before said. Certain ships also of the Carthaginians, being scattered a-funder in the deep sea, were by the Roman Armado, that kept about the coast of Sardinia surprised and boarded. These were the Acts performed both by sea and land, on the side of Italy which lieth along the Alps.

Cn. Servilius the Consul having performed no worthy and memorable exploit, either in his province Hetruria, or in France (for thither he went also in the end) but only that he redeemed his father Cn. Servilius and his uncle C. Laetanius, from servitude and bondage, now sixteen years after they had been taken prisoners by the Boii before the village Tanetum, returned to Rome, with his father going on the one side, and his uncle on the other: a man famous rather for his private deeds, then renowned for any publick and honourable act worthy of remembrance. And a bill was preferred unto the people, that it should not be imputed for a trespass unto Cn. Servilius, that while his own father (who had sitten upon the ivory chair of estate) was living (and that unknown to him) he had been both Tribune and Edile also of the Commons against the laws in that behalf provided. This act being passed and granted, he returned again into his province. Unto Cn. Servilius the Consul who was in the Brutians country, there revolted Consentia, Ugentum, Verge, Besidia, Hetriculum, Sypheum, Argentannum, Dampetia, and many other peccets of small account, upon occasion that they saw the Carthaginians war to wax cold and feeble. The same Consul fought a battell with Annibal in the territory of Croton: the manner of which fight is darkly and obscurely reported. For Valerius Antias saith, there were slain five thousand of the enemies: a thing of such consequence, that either it was meer impudency to forge it, or great negligence to overslip it. But the truth is, from that time forward nothing was done by Annibal in Italy: for to him also there came from Carthage Embassadors to call him home into Africk, even about the same time that the others did unto Mago. And as it is reported of him, all the while that he gave audience to the Embassadors, he gnashed and grinded his teeth, he kept a sighing and groaning, yea, and hardly could forbear to shed tears. After they had delivered their Message according to their commission, Yea, mary, qud he, now they go no more about the bussh with me by covert means and under-hand to send for me home, but openly are seen in the action: who all this while in suffering no supplies either of men or money to be transported over unto me, sought to draw and hale me from hence. Well then, it is not the people of Rome so often by me defeated and put to flight, that hath by armes overcome Annibal, but it is the Senat of Carthage, with their backbiting and malicious envy. Neither will P. Scipio rejoyce so much, and beare himself proud upon this disgrace of my return, as Hanno will: who with the ruine and subversion of Carthage, hath overthrowen our house and family, when by no other means he could effect it. Now Annibal, whose mind fore-gave him that such a thing would fall out, had prepared shipping afore-hand. And therefore after he had sent away the multitude of souldiers that were of small or no service, into the towns of the Brutians country, under a colour and shew of garrisons for defence, which towns were but few, and the same rather held in by awe and fear, then abiding in obedience for love and loyalty, he took with him the whole strength and flour of his army, and crossed over into Africk. But before he went to sea, many of the Italian nation, who refusing to follow him into Africk, had taken for sanctuary the chappell of Iuno Lacinia, which never to that day had been violated and broken; notwithstanding the liberty of the place, he cruelly massacred in the very temple. Seldome by report had ever any man been known to leave his native soil and country, and depart into exile with more heavy heart, then Annibal did when he went out of his enemies land. Oftentimes he looked back to the coasts of Italy, blaming both God and man, yea, cursing himself and his own life, for that he led not straightwaies upon his fresh victory at Cannae, his souldiers embred as they were with blood directly even to Rome. Scipio (quoth he) had the heart to go to Carthage, who when he was Consul, had never seen in Italy the Carthaginian enemy: and my self, having slain at Thrasymenus and Cannae 100000 armed men, have sitten still about Casertum, Cumes, and Nola, wearing and decaying in strength every day more then other. In this manner he blamed himself, and complained of his hard hap and cursed fortune: and so he was pulled out of the possession of Italy that he held so long.

News came to Rome about one and the same time, that both Mago and Annibal were departed and onward on their journey: The joy of which twofold gratulation was the lesse in two regards, both for that their own captains seemed to have either little courage or small force to stay them behind, and impeach them for going, considering they had expresse order from the Senat so to do: as also because they at Rome were pensive and doubtfull, what would be the issue and end of all, seeing the whole weight of the war to bear and rest upon the shoulders of one only Captain and army.

And much about this time came the Saguntine Embassadors, bringing with them certain Carthaginians prisoners, who were taken with sums of money upon them, and had sailed into Spain for to levy and wage men for aid. The money they laid down in the very port-hall or entrie of the Senat-house, amounting to 250 pound weight of gold, and 800 pound weight of silver. The men they received and clapt them up fast in prison, the silver and gold both, they delivered again to the Embassadors, with many thanks, over and besides they gave them rewards and ships to return again into Spain. Then the grave and ancient Senators began to reason and discourse in this wise "That men naturally have lesse sense of good things then of bad: and feel not so soon their own weal as their woe. We remember say they, what fear, what fright and terrour we were put in, when Annibal passed over into Italy. Lord, what losses, what lamentable mistakes hapned thereupon! The enemies camp was discovered and seen from the wals of the City, what vowing, what praying was there then, both of all and some! How often in assemblies and counsels were men seen to stretch out their hands to heaven, & to utter these words & cry aloud; When

A When will that day come? and will it never be, that we shall see Italy again clear of enemies, obtain repose, and flourish once more injoying happy peace? Now at length, even at 16 yeers end and not before, the gods have vouchsafed us this blessing; and no man saith a word, nor maketh a motion of thanksgiving to their divine majesty therefore. And surely, if men know not how to accept with joy and thankfulness a benefit when it first cometh, they will be far short, and fail much more to remember the same when once it is past. Hereupon they cryed out and called aloud with one voice from all parts of the Senat-house to P. Atilius the Pretor, for to propole the matter to the court there assembled: and a decree was granted, that for five daies there should be solemn processions and supplications in every church and chappell before the shrines of the gods and goddesses: and greater beasts killed for sacrifice to the number of 120.

B Now when Laelius and the Embassadors of Masanissa had their dispatch and were dismissed, tidings were brought of the Carthaginian Embassadors coming to the Senat to sue for peace, were seen at Portus, and that from thence they would travail by land unto Rome. Whereupon it was thought good unto the Senat, that Laelius should be sent for again and called back, that he might be present, and at the hearing of the treating of peace. Q. Fulvius Gellus a Lieutenant of Scipio had the conducting of the Carthaginian Embassadors to Rome: who being forbidden to set foot within the City, were lodged without the in great hall named Villa Publica, and had audience given them of the Senat, assembled in the temple of Bellona. Who made in manner the very same speech that they had before unto Scipio, clearing the whole State and their publick councill, and laying all the fault and blame upon Annibal for making war: saying, that he had no warrant, commission, and commandment from the Senat to passe over the Alps, no, nor so much as over Iberus: and that of his own head he took arms; and warred not upon the Romans only, but also upon the Saguntins. In consideration whereof, he that would esteem all things aright, and weigh the truth indeed, must needs judge, that for any thing done by the Senat and people of Carthage, the ancient league made with the people of Rome, hath continued to that day sound and entire. And therefore nothing else had they in commission to sue for and request, but that they might maintain and remain still in that accord & league which was last concluded and contracted with Lusitanus the Consul. Now when the Pretor, according to an ancient custome of their forefathers, had given liberty to whomsoever that would for to put interrogatories unto the Embassadors, and the elder sort, such as had been present at the making of the capitulations and covenants concerning the said peace, and demanded of them, some one thing, and some another; and the Embassadors answered again, that by occasion of their yong age (for they were all in manner but yong men) they remembered no such thing: the whole court from all parts thereof cryed out and said, that this was but a fraudulent and traiterous Carthaginian trick, to chuse and send such for to sue for the old peace which they themselves could not remember. And when the Embassadors were voided out of the Senat-house, and the opinions of the LL. demanded, M. Livius was of this mind, that Cn. Servilius the Consul, who was the neerer of the twain, should be sent for, that the treaty of peace might in his presence be consulted upon. For since that there could not lightly a weightier matter then it was, come afore them to be determined of, he thought it stood not with the honor and reputation of the people of Rome, that such a matter should be debated of without the personall

D E presence of both, or at the leastwise one of the Consuls. Qu. Metellus (who three years before had been Consul and Dictator) spake to the cause in this manner. For as much as P. Scipio by defeating and putting to the sword whole armies, by waiving and spoiling the territories of the enemies, had driven them to this exigent, that in humble sort they came to crave peace: and considering that no man living was better able to judge with what mind and intent they sued for this peace then himself, who warred ever before the gates of Carthage; therefore no mans advice was to be heard, but only his, either to accept of the said peace in question, or to reject it. M. Valerius Levinus, who had been twice Consul, argued, that they were spies and not Embassadors, who now were come; and that it were a good deed to command them to avant and be packing out of the confines of Italy: & to send with them certain men of purpose to guard them to their ships;

F yes, & to write unto Scipio to go forward with his wars & not to slack one jot. Laelius & Fulvius added moreover and said, that Scipio laid this especially for his ground, to hope there might be peace, in case Annibal and Mago were not called out of Italy: As for the Carthaginians, they would make semblant of any thing whatsoever, so long as they expected those leaders and those armies: but afterwards without remembrance of covenants, were they never so fresh and new, yes, and without respect of all the gods, they would (no doubt) maintain and continue the wars. In these regards they inclined the rather to Levinus, and approved his opinion. So the Embassadors were sent away without any peace obtained, or certain answer returned unto them.

G Much about that time, Cn. Servilius the Consul, who made full reckoning that he should have the honour of bringing Italy into quietness, made pursuit after Annibal, as if he had been coured & driven out by him; and first failed over into Scily, and then into Africa. Which being commonly noised and bruited abroad at Rome, at the first the LL. of the Senat thought good, that the Pretor should write unto the Consuls to this effect, that the Senat judged it meet and reason for him to return into Italy. But afterwards upon the Pretor his words, saying that the Consul would forought by his letters, P. Sulpicius was created of purpose Dictator, who by vertue of that more sovereign rule and authority, called the Consul peremptorily home into Italy. And the rest rest that year, he together with M. Servilius the Generall of the horse, spent in progresse and visiting all the Cities of Italy which in time of war had shaken off their allegiance, and in taking due knowledge of all their causes and reasons severally.

During the time of the truce, there let forth also out of Sardinia from Leontium the Pretor, an hundred hulks laden with victuals, together with a convoy and guard of twenty galleies of war, and passed over into Africk safe, both from the danger of the enemy, and also from the perill of tempests by sea. But Cn. Octavius as he was in his voyage from Sicily, with a fleet of two hundred hulks and thirty strong galleies, had not the like good speed. For as he sailed (well near) within the kenning of Africk, first he was calmed; then the wind turning South, troubled and disordered his ships, yea, and scattered them over the sea one from another. Himself with his galleies of war wrought against the wind and the current, and with exceeding toil and labour of the oare-men, doubted the point of the cape of Apello, &c. there in the bay rode at anchor: but the hulks for the most part fell with the Iland Agimurnus (which shattereth upon the foreland, and lieth in the very mouth of that creek from the sea wherein Carthage standeth) almost ten leagues from the City: and some were driven by wind to a place called the Horwaters, over against the City. All this hapned within the sight of Carthage. And therefore out of all parts of the City, was great running to the market place. The magistrats assembled the Senat; the people at the entry and porch of the Council house, called upon the Senators and cried out, that they should not let slip so great a booty out of their eies and hands. Some alledged against them, the fidelity of treating of peace: others also objected the faithfull promise of truce (the terme whereof was not yet expired.) But at last when both Senat and people were intermingled all in manner together, agreed it was by a general consent, that Asdrubal with a fleet of fifty sail, should cut over to Agimurnus; and so from thence rally and gather together the Roman ships disperfed along the coasts and the havens. And the hulks (abandoned of their mariners that were fled, first from the Iland Agimurnus, and afterwards from the Horwaters aforesaid) were drawn and towed as it were at the tails of their own ships to Carthage. As yet the Embassadors were not returned from Rome, neither knew they what the resolution of the Roman Senat was concerning war or peace, nor the day of the truce determined. Scipio taking the wrong and indignity to be more hainous, in that the hope of peace and the assurance of truce should be violat by them first, who sought both for the one and the other; presently dispatched an embassage to Carthage M. Bibius, L. Servilius, and L. Fabius; who being by the concourse and running together of the people, peerto a shrewd turn and mischief; and foreseeing their return like to be a dangerous, craved of the magistrats (who saved them from violence) to send certain ships to waite them. So they were allowed two galleies called Tiremes, which having conducted them until they were arrived at the river Bagrada, where they were within sight of the Roman camp, returned back again to Carthage. Now the Carthaginian Armado lay in the rode before Vrica. From thence there made out three galleies of four ranks of oars; whether it were upon some secret direction from Carthage so to do, or that Asdrubal the Admirall of the fleet, upon his own head adventured to foul an action (the state having no hand therein, and therefore not to be blamed) and espying the Roman Galley of five banks of oars past the point of the cape, suddainly assailed her from the main sea. But neither could they invest and strike her with their beak heads, making so good way, and shifting so well by reason of her swiftness: neither could the armed souldiers from out of their lower vessels boord her, being so tall a ship over them. And right valiantly she defended her self as long as shot lasted; which when it once failed, and that she had no other means to help her self, but only the nearness of the land and a number of souldiers who from the camp were run to the shore, with the losse only of the ship all the passengers escaped safe to land.

Thus the truce being doubtless broken with one wickedness coming in the neck of another, L. Livius and Fulvius came in the very nick from Rome, together with the Carthaginian Embassadors; unto whom Scipio; having given his word, that though the Carthaginians had not only broken the faith and assurance given of the truce, but also the law of arms, in abusing and evill intreating the persons of the Embassadors, yet himself would do nothing to them unworthy either the order of the people of Rome, or unfitting his own maner and custome, dismissed the Embassadors, and made preparation for war.

When Annibal now approached the land of Africk, one of the mariners was commanded to climb up to the top of the mast to discover the coast, and to see what part they were directed to; and when he made answer and said, that the prow made head upon a place called, the Ruine sepulchre; he misliked the omen and preface of that place, and commanded the pilot to passe by, and leave it: and so he put his fleet within the bay of Lepis, and there set his army a shore. And these were the affairs of Africk for that year. The acts ensuing, reach to that year, wherein M. Servilius Geminus, who then was Generall of the horse, and T. Claudius Nero were made Consuls. But in the end of that former year, when the Embassadors of the confederat Cities of Greece made complaints, that their territories were wasted by the Kings garrisons: and when they sent their Embassadors into Macedonia, for to demand satisfaction and restitution, they could not be admitted unto the King, nor have audience: and moreover, they gave intelligence, that there were four thousand armed souldiers transported over into Spain, under the conduct of Sopater to aid the Carthaginians: and certain summes of money likewise sent with them: the Senat gave order that Embassadors should be addressed unto the King, to give him to understand,

A. that the L.L. of the Senate took all this to be done against the tenure and form of the league. So there were sent G. Hieronymus Varro, C. Marius and M. Aemilius. And three galleys of five oars each of ours they were allowed.

This was a year of several losses; first a great scarce fire, whereby the publick cliff was burnt to almost down to the ground; and for much abundance of rain and many floods, and exceeding cheapness of victuals. Notwithstanding all this, was open by reason of a general peace throughout. At Valencia Falcas, at Bilba, Pubine Donay, &c. died; of the which divided the great store of corn that was sent out of Spain; among the people, free by free, and let the price be four. After the Modius. The same year Q. Fabius de Aquila departed this life; a man of great years and exceeding old, if it be true which some writers report; that he was August 42 years. But certain it is that he was a man worthy of so great and honorable a surname, yea, and if it had begun first in himself. He surpassed the dignities of his father; he was equal in honor to his grand-father: Rullus his grand-father, I must needs say, had more titles of Nobles; and of greater battails; but our enemy of this, Ambal, may counterpoise them all, as many as they were. However, this man was counted more wary and advised, than hardy and forward; and as a man may well doubt whether by natural disposition he loved to take pleasure in all his actions, or that it was a policy of his agreeable to the wars properly then in hand; so verily nothing is more certain than this; that as the Poet Ennius saith:

C His son Q. Fabius Maximus was invested or installed Abur in his place, and for Bithop in his room (for two sacred pontifical dignities he had) Sw. Sulpicius Galba was chosen. The Roman places were exhibited one day and the Plebeian Games thrice wholly renewed by the Ediles M. Sextus Sabinus, and Cn. Terentilius Placcus. They both were made Pretors; and with them C. Livius Salinator, and C. Aurelius Cotta. The solemn selection of the Magistrats for that year, whether Cn. Serranus the Consul held, or (because of important business in Thessaly, about the examinations of the conspiracies these of certain great men, by commission from the Senate, which might keep him there.) P. Sulpicius the Dictator by him nominated; it is uncertain, by reason of the variety and difference of writers in that behalf.

In the beginning of the year next following, M. Servilius and T. Claudius, after they had assembled the Senat in the Capitol, moved concerning the Provinces. And forasmuch as both of them desired Affrick, they were willing that Affrick and Indy, should be put to the choice of a Lottery. But by the especial travail of Q. Minucius, the Province of Affrick was neither granted nor denied to either of them. And the Consuls were commanded to deal with the Tribuns of the Commons, that if they thought so good, they would prefer a bill unto the people, to know whom they would have to war in Affrick. So all the tribunes general gave their voices with P. Scipio. Nevertheless, the Consuls (for so the Senat had decreed before) cast lots for the Province of Affrick. Thus Affrick befall unto T. Claudius, namely, that he should sail over thither with an armada of fifty ships, all gallies of five ranks of oars, and be joynd in equal commission with Scipio. And M. Servilius had Herrania allotted unto him. In the same Province Cn. Servilius also was to continue in government, in case it pleased the Senat to stay the Consul in the City. Of Pretors, M. Sulpicius by lot had the rule of Gallia, with order, that P. Quintilius Varus should make over unto him the Province and two legions. And O. Lollius took the charge of the Bruttii with the two legions, which the year before were commanded by P. Sempronius the Vice-consul. Cn. Tremellius was appointed to govern Sicily, and to receive of P. Villus Tappulus the Pretor of the former year, that Province and two legions. And ordered it was, that Villus as Propretor, should keep in obedience and defend the coast of Sicily with twenty ships of war, and a thousand souldiers, and that from thence M. Pomponius should in the twenty ships behind embark one thousand and five hundred souldiers, and transport them over to Rome. Unto C. Aurelius Cotta was the civil jurisdiction of the City assigned. All the rest continued still in their government, and had their commissions newly signed, according as they had either provinces or armies under their hand. And with sixteen legions and no more, was the State of Rome that year maintained. Now to the end they might begin all enterprises in the name of the Gods and proceed therein with their grace and favour, order was given, that the Consuls before they went out to war, should set forth those games and plaies, and sacrifice those greater beasts which T. Manlius Dictator, in the year that M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quinctius were Consuls, promised by solemn vow, in case the Common-weal continued for five years following, in the same good estate as then it was. So the games were exhibited in the great Cirque or show-place four daies together, and the sacrifices slain accordingly, as they were vowed to the Gods.

“But all this while, as mens hope, for their fear also increased daily more and more, whiles they G “could not certainly resolve with themselves, whether they had more cause to rejoyce, that Annibal “Annibal after sixteen years had abandoned Italy, and left the possession thereof free unto the peo“ple of Rome; or to be afraid, for that he had passed over into Affrick with the safety of his ar“my. For why? the place was only changed, and the danger all one. And surely Q. Fabius late “deceased, no vain Prophet of so great a perill and hazard, was wont to foretell, and this was ever “his song, That Annibal would be a more dangerous enemy at home in his own country, than “he had been abroad in a forrain Land. And Scipio should find, that he had to deal neither with

" Syphax

“Syphax (King of a rude, untaught, and barbarous country, who was wont to lead armies of black “grooms, and little better than water-bearers and camp-slaves to keep one place, and never re“move) nor with Asdrubal his father in law, a Captain of all others in flight of foot, and rea“diest to run away, nor yet with tumultuary armies taken up in haste and raised in a day, consist“ing of a rabble of rustical clowns and peasants armed by the halves but with Annibal himself, who “never within the camp, yet, and in the royal pavillion of his fathers a most valiant Captain, bred “and brought up amongst armed men: who long ago was no sooner a child, but he was a soldier, “and before he came to the prime and flower of youth, became a General: who growing to be “old in a continual course and train of victories, hath filled Spain and France from the one side “to the other, and Italy from the Apes to the narrow seas, with the marks and memorable moni-“ments of worthy and noble exploits: and leadeth still an army of as long standing and continu“ance in warfare as himself, hardened and hardened to endure all those things which hardly one “would believe, men could abide and suffer, embroiled and bathed a thousand times in the blood of “Romans, and carrying with him the spoils not of common souldiers only, but also of most brave “Generals themselves, Scipio should be faine to encounter and meet in battail those who with their “own hands had slain Perors, and killed Consuls of Rome: all bedight and goodly to be seen in “mural and vallare coronets, for their good service in scaling of walls, and mounting over rampiers; “those I say who at their pleasure have ranged through the won camps and forced Cities of the “Romans. Neither at this day have the Magistrates of the people of Rome so many bundles of rods, “with axes born before them; as Annibal hath taken from the Roman Generals whom he hath slain, “& can if he list shew and carry before him. Casting and tossing these doubts and fears in their mind, “they themselves increased their own care, and doubled their dread in this point also, that whereas “they were wont for certain years to make war in sight of home, in diversie and sundry places of “Italy, with a lingering kind of hope, without regarding any issue thereof like presently to enforce now “Scipio and Annibal, Captains marched together (as one would say) to make a final end & tryal of all, “had set all mens minds a work to expect the event now or never. And even they also who had re“posed exceeding confidence, and grounded no small hope of victory in Scipio, the more their spi“rits were amuled upon it, and desirous to see a speedy effect, the greater was their care and doubt “of the sequel. The Carthaginians for all the world were likewise affected and disquieted in mind.
 “One while, beholding Annibal, and considering his noble and worthy acts, they repeated that “they sued for peace. Another while again, when they looked back and remembered, how twice “they had been defeated in battail, Syphax slain themselves driven out of Spain, chased and hunted “out of Italy, and all this by the valor and policy of one man Scipio: they trembled for fear of him, “as if he were the fatal Captain born for their ruin and utter destruction.”

Now by this time was Annibal come as far as Adrumetum: from whence, after he had bestow“ed some few dayes in refreshing his sea-sick souldiers, he was roused with fearful posts that “brought newe, how all about Carthage was full of enemies and hostility: whereupon he made “long journeys till he came to Zama. This Zama is a Town distant from Carthage five dayes jour“ney. From thence he sent out espials, who being taken by the Roman warders, were brought be“fore Scipio, and he caused them to be delivered unto the Tribuns or Marshals, with command“ment, that they should be led throughout the camp: and suffered without all fear, to see whatso“ever they desired. And when he had asked of them whether they had perused and considered “every thing to their content, and enough to serve their turn; he sent them back again to Annibal, “with a safe conduct to accompany them. Annibal took no pleasure at all in hearing of any thing “that they reported: for (among other particulars) they brought newe, that Majanius chanced “that very day to come thither with six thousand foot and four thousand horse. But most of all, “he was troubled and cast down with the resolute confidence and assurance of the enemy; which “no doubt (he thought) arose not of nothing. And therefore albeir himself was the only cause of “that war, and by his arrival had disturbed the truce concluded, and the hope of peaceable cove“nants; yet supposing, that a more indifferent accord might be obtained, in case he sued therefore “while he was entire and unfoiled, rather than after he were vanquished and overcome; he addres“sed a messenger or pursivant unto Scipio, requesting that he might confer and commune with him.
 “Whether he did this of his own accord, or by direction from the publick Council of the State, I “have no reason to set down or avouch for certain, either the one or the other. Valerius Antius “writeth, That he was by Scipio defeated in the first battel, wherein were slain in field 12000 armed “men, and 1700 taken prisoners, whereupon himself in person came as Ambassador, with other ten “Orators into the camp unto Scipio. But howsoever it was, Scipio refused not to emparel; and so, “both Generals of purpose advanced forward and approached with their camps, to the end they “might be neerer one to the other when they should meet in conference. Scipio made choise of a “plot of ground not far from the City Nadagara: which as it was handsome and meet in “other respects, so especially in this, that it had a watering place within an arrow shot. Annibal “took an hill four miles from thence, sure enough and commodious otherwise, but only that they “were far from water. In the mid way between they chose a plain, open on every side, where they “might discover and see all about them, that no ambush there were laid: and after they had caused “their armed souldiers to retire a like distance from either party, then came together with one “truch-man or interpreter apeece, not only the grearest and bravest Captains of their time, but al“so equal to the mightiest Kings or Emperors of realm or nation that ever had been afore them and Annibal.

The Oration
of Annibal to Scipio.

A in any age and remembrance of man. For awhile they stood one beholding the other, and said never a word, swilled and astounded with a mutual admiration: and at last Annibal began and spoke in this wise. The Gods by destinies have appointed, that I who first levied war against the Romans, and who to others have had the victory as it were in mine own hands, must needs of my self and mine own motion, come now first likewise to thee for peace: glad I am and well pleased, that it is my good hap to meet with you above all other men, at whose hands I should seek the same. And certainly, you also for your part among many your singular and excellent praises, may score up this for none of the least, namely, That Annibal (unto whom the Gods have vouchsafed the upper hand over so many noble Captains of the Romans) hath yielded the battles, and given place unto your self: now that you have had the honor to end this war, more notable and renowned at the first for your losses and overthrows than ours: and that fortune (as it is fallen out) hath made this pretty sport with me, who at the beginning took arms when your father was Consul, gave him battail first of all other Roman Generals, and am now come unarmed unto his son to crave peace. Verily much better it had been, and simply the very best, that the Gods had infused into our fore-fathers this mind, That both you might have contented your selves with the Dominion of Italy, and we likewise of Africa. For surely, Spain, and Sardinia both, are nothing sufficient to make amends and satisfaction, and it were but only of your part, in recompense of so many brave fleets, so many puissant armies, and so many noble Captains that we have lost. But faults done and past may well be blamed and reprov'd, when they can not be corrected and reformed. So greedy were we on both sides to conquer the backs of others, that in the mean time we have hazarded our own. Neither had ye war in Italy only, or we again in Africa alone: but both ye have seen the ensigns and armies of enemies hard at your gates, and in manner under your own walls: and we likewise from Carthage have heard the noise and drum of the Roman camp. Now then, that which we have cause most to desire and labor, and you to wish above all other things in the world; the treaty of peace is fallen out in time of your better prosperity, and more favourable aspect of fortune unto you. We both are the seekers of the self, whom it most standeth upon and importeth that there should be peace, and who are assured, whatsoever we conclude, that the States and Cities from whence we come, will approve and ratifie the same. There needs no more but a willing mind, well affected and contented with the course which tend to repose and quietness. For mine own part, I am while ago hath caught me, who am returned an old man into my country, from whence I came forth: another while prosperity and adversity both, hath so schooled me, that I would have rather gotten my reason than wayed by fortune. But I fear me greatly, that you as well in regard of youth, as in of your continual felicity and fortunat train of success, are over-hasty and stout, for to yield unto any peaceable waves. For commonly he fore-casteth no variable chances, who never tasted of adverse fortune. And the same are you at this day, that sometimes were the conqueror of Hannibal at Canna. You being hardly come to that age which is meet for war, you have the charge and command of an army: and look what enterprises you took in hand to achieve, you have the same you ever enjoyed as happily. You pursued the vengeance of fathers slain, and sought war by the calamity of your house and family a notable name and reputation: but verily, and piteously, Scipio full and whole you have recovered and conquered a famous name, and the names of Carthaginians you have chased from thence: no sooner were you created a Consul, but when all other men heers failed them to defend and keep Italy, you failed never: and after you had defeated here two armies, forced and burnt in your two camps of your enemies, taken Asdrubal prisoner, a most mighty and puissant Captain, who was to many Cities both of his Kingdom and of our dominion: you pulled me mangle from the jaws of Italy, which for I had been now fifteen years possessed. Well may you haughty and wanton glory rather than incline to peace. Full well I know at what spirit and stomack you are more respective to grandeur and honor, than to your good and profit. And the time is past, when I also had the sight of the countenance of fortune smiling and smiling to approve me. But now we are so blessed of God as to have our right wits and perfect senses in time of prosperity, we should consider and think not of things only which have happened, but of those which may happen hereafter. But if you should forget another, I alone might serve as a sufficient example, of accidents of fortune whatsoever. For whom not long since you either lay siege to, or have been besieged, between the river Asio and your City, and ready in manner to capture the walls of Rome, you see me now after the loss of my brethren, two right valiant warriors, renowned Generals, even here before the walls of my country little better than beaten and vanquished, in humble manner to avert and avoid those dangers from mine own City, which were otherwise imminent upon you. Well, the greatest and happiest fortune is least to be desired, when it is wholly lying on her than when she is to rise & bountiful. Now that you are now and we are, whines you are alone, and we seek a peace unto you that giveth it is a glorious and goodly manner to us that crave a more necessary than honorable. Better it is yet and more we want to enjoy a certain peace, than hope for a doubtful victory. The one lieth in our hands, the other as it pleaseth the Gods to dispose. Beware therefore, how in one hour you may lose the felicity of so many years. And as you consider your own strength & forces; so think what upon the power of fortune: let before your eyes the alternative course of Mars in war, you shall see armor and the edge of the sword: you shall see the bodies of men as well of

"one side as the other and no where less than in war do events answer to our hope and expecta"tion. And make full account of this, that you shall not gain so much overplus of hope, (if "haply you should win a field) above that which by granting a peace you may presently have in "hand and be possessed of as you shall forgo and lose of the principal, in case you should be vanquished "and take the foil. One hours misfortune is able to overturn all the honors and triumphs and tri"umphs as well past & gotten already, as in future hope to be obtained. In knitting and concluding "a peace, O P. Cornelius, all lieth in your power. Refuse that once and come to the tryal of a bat-
 "tall, you must take your hap as God shall appoint. If M. Anibal in times past being conqueror, "would have granted peace unto our fore-fathers at their suit and earnest petition: a rare and sin"gular example had he afforded of vertue and felicity, and few comparable unto him: but not ha"ving the grace so far when he was well; not able to set a gage to his prosperity in some measure "and in due time: not willing to restrain and stop the pride and haughtiness of his good fortune,
 "the higher he was heaved, the fouler was his fall; and the more he mounted, the greater was his
 "overthrow. It is for him (I confess) that giveth peace, to capitulate and set down the covenants "and conditions, and not for him that craveth the same. And yet peradventure we might not be "thought unworthy, to set upon our own heads a fine and forfeiture. We refuse not therefore
 "but are content, That all shall be yours, for which the quarrel and war first began Sicily, Sardi"nia, Spain, all the lands whatsoever lying in the Sea between Affrick and Italy. And we Cartha"ginians holding our selves enclosed within the bounds and coasts of Affrick (since the will and "pleasure of God is so) can abide to see you to rule and govern in forain lands and strange seas. I "cannot deny, but that you have good cause to suspect the Carthaginians for their faith & truth,
 "whose late desire of peace and attendance about the same, was not so plain and simple as it "should have been: Yet Scipio, take this wisdome: That it importeth much to the assurance of keep"ing and observing peace once intertained, to consider who the persons be that seek and crave
 "the same. And even your own Senators and LL. of the Councel, as I hear say, were moved not "a little to deny and reject the motion of peace, for this cause, that our embassie seemed unto "them not so honorable as it ought to have been. But now I, even I, no worse a man than An-"ibal, do sue for peace; which as I would not seek, unless I thought it profitable so I will maintain "it in regard of that profit for which I fought it. And like as when I had once begun the war, so "long as the Gods impeached and envied me not, I maintained it so, as no man of ours had cause
 "to be weary thereof: so will I endeavour that none shall repent of the peace obtained by my "means. When Anibal had thus said, the Roman General made answer again in this sort. "I "knew full well, O Anibal, that the Carthaginians upon the hope of your coming have been di"sturbed the assurance of the present truce, and also troubled the hope of the future peace. Nei"ther do you your self dissemble so much, in desaling all out of the former conditions and capitu-
 "lations of peace, save only those things which long since have been in our power and posses"sion. But as you have a great care, that your fellow citizens should know & perceive, what heavy "burdens they are by your means discharged and eased of: even so must I endeavor and labour,
 "that the points which then they covenanted and agreed upon, they deduct not this day out of "the articles and conditions of peace, for the hire and reward of their falsehood and treachery.
 "For unworthy you are to have the overture and possibility of any peace at all, ye seek also, that "fraud and deceit may turn to your profit and commodity. Neither began our predecessor first "to make war for Sicily, nor we since for Spain. But as then the danger wherein our allies the "Mamerins stood: so now the ruin and destruction of Saguntum, moved us to take arms most "justly, even for pity and compassion. That you began the quarrel and provoked us first, your self
 "confess, and the Gods do witness: who, as in the former war, they granted and gave the same, ac"cording to right, equity, and justice: so they do in this, and so they ever will. For mine own part,
 "I remember well, and think upon the frailty of mankind, and the fickleness of this world: I con"sider also the power of fortune and what she is able to do: I know likewise, that all our actions "whatsoever, are subject to a thousand hazards and inconveniences. But as I would acknowledge
 "my self to have dealt proudly and outrageously, if before I passed over into Affrick, when of N
 "your self well nigh you abandoned Italy, when you had imbarked your army, and came of your "own accord to seek peace, I had then rejected you and cast you off: even so at this time, when I "have haled and drawn you into Affrick by strong arm, as it were to trie an issue in law (all the "hasting, all the shifting and resistance you could make to the contrary notwithstanding) I am not "bound to have any respect or regard at all of you. Wherefore, if besides these points and capitu"lations, under which the peace at that time was like to be concluded (and what those were you "know as well as I can tell you) you bring with you any recompence and amends for our ships,
 "which being charged with victual and munition, you took perforce from us in time of the cala"mity of arms: as also for the outrage and violence committed upon the persons of our Ambassa"dors: there is some reason that I should consider thereupon and be advised by my Councel. But "if you think hardly thereof also, as being thereby too sore pressed; look for battel, you that could "not like of repose; provide for war, since you would abide no peace. Thus without any conclu"sion of accord they left parling; & being returned to their own companies, they related unto them
 "how their conference came to nothing, and all their words were but wind, and did no good: and "therefore the matter was to be determined and tried by dint of sword, and they to trust to that for"tune which the Gods had appointed for them. So soon as they were come into their camp, both

 Scipio to An-ibal.

A of them made proclamation, that the soldiers should buckle themselves, make ready their armour, pluck up their spirits, and address themselves to a final tryal of the quarrel; where, if they stood well, they were to be victors, not for one day, but for ever and aye. For before the morning next at night, they should know, whether Rome or Carthage should give laws unto all nations of the earth. And as neither Africa nor Italy, but the whole world shall be the prize and guerdon of the conquerors: so they, whose hap were to lose the field, must make account of danger and damage, equal to the winnings and gain of the other. For as the Romans had no way to escape, nor place of safe retreat, being in a strange and unknown land: so Carthage (having laid all upon this one cast) if they now missed, made account that all was gone, and present destruction at hand. So the next day there advanced forward to this doubtful and dangerous tryal, two most noble and renowned Captains, of two right mighty and puissant states: two most valiant and hardy armies came forth into the field, resolute that day either to win the butts or lose the saddle; to gain more glory to their former honour, or else to lose all that ever they had gotten. Thus therefore between hope and fear, their minds were perplexed and distracted; and beholding one while their own forces, and another while their enemies power; measuring rather by their eye, than weighing by reason their strength they had at once presented unto them, objects of joy and content, as well as of sorrow and heaviness. And look what the soldiers themselves could not think upon, the things their leaders put them in mind of, suggesting unto them by way of admonition and exhortation, what ever was thought expedient and good. Annibal rehear'd his noble acts achieved in Italy for the space of sixteen years, he reckoned up how many Roman Captains he had slain, how many armies he had defeated and put to the sword: and ever as he met with any soldiers of note and mark for some worthy and memorable battail, he put them in remembrance of their honourable service and good deserts: Scipio related the conquest of Spain, recounted the fresh foughten fields in Africa, alleged the very confession of the enemies: who neither for fear could do other but seek for peace, nor yet upon an inbred falshood imprinted in their hearts, continue long in the same. Besides, he interred the commendation and speech of Annibal had with him in secret and apart from others: which according as he was disposed to devill, he might turn at his pleasure to fit his purpose. And forasmuch as the Gods had shewed unto them as they went out into the field the same signs and tokens of birds, by direction whereof their fathers before them fought in times past before the lands Agates: he offered and prelated that the war was come to an end, all dangers and troubles overblown, that the spoil and pillage of Carthage was at their devotion, and they at the point to return home unto their countrey, their parents, wives, children, and domestical Gods. And this he spake with such a lofty gesture of his body, with so pleasant and lovely a countenance withal, that a man who had seen him, would have thought verily he had achieved the victory already. Then he embattailed first his Hastari (or spears) in the vanguard behind them the Principes; and the reeward he guarded and fortified with the Triarii. Neither marshalled he whole cohorts thrust thick and close together, in the head of the battail before their ensigns, but divided them into Squadrons, distant a pretty way asunder one from the other: to the end there might be room and space to receive the Elephants of the enemies, that they should not break the arrayes and ranks. As for Laelius (whom he had employed before as Lieutenant, but that year in quality of a Questor by a special order and direction from the Senat, and not by choice of lot) him with the Italian Cavalry he put in the left point, and Masaniissa with the Numidian horsemen in the right. The open waies and void spaces between the Squadrons afore said, placed in the front before the ensigns, he filled with the Velites or light footers, who at that time were light armed soldiers: with this commandment, that presently upon the violent charge given by the Elephants, they should either retire behind the files, or else run to a hide, both on the right hand and the left, and join close to the foremost ranks, and make the Elephants way to run upon their foot from the one side and the other. Annibal to strike a terror into the enemies, first arranged the Elephants in the front, who were in number forty score, and more than ever he had before in any battail. Then he embattailed the aid-soldiers of the Ligurians and Frenchmen, with the Balearic slingers and the Moors intermingled amongst them. In the main battail, he placed the Carthaginians and Africans, with the legion of the Macedonians; behind whom (leaving a little space between) he set in array the battalion of the Italian soldiers in the reeward for succour: and those were most part of them Bruttii, who followed him more perfectly and by constraint, than of any good will, when he departed out of Italy. The Cavalry also he displayed and led round like wings about the two points: whereof the Carthaginians kept the right, and the Numidians the left. Sundry and divers were the exhortations throughout the army, amongst to many men: whose language was different, whose complexions far unlike, whose manners and conditions were divers, who differed in laws and customs, whose armours were not all one, whose raiment and apparel not alike, and finally, whose quarrel and cause of war was not one and the same. The auxiliaries and aid-soldiers fed themselves with the hope of ready and present payment and wages for the time past, yea, and with a double and triple augmentation thereof to boot, out of the spoil and pillage. The Frenchmen upon a special hatred of their own, and the same deeply rooted, were soon kindled and enflamed against the Romans. The Ligurians, who were brought out of the rough and craggy mountains, and whole youth watered at the fruitful and plentiful fields of Italy, were quickly by him moved to hope after victory. The Moors and Numidians he terrified with the proud and tyrannical rule of Masaniissa, under which they should ever after live. Before the Carthaginians he presented the walls of their native City, their houses and houses of Gods, the sepulchres and tombs of their ancestors, their children and parents, yea, and their timorous and fearful wives: he set before their eyes either final destruction of all those things and slavery of their persons, or else the empire and sovereign dominions of the whole world: and no mean between these extremities either of fear or hope.

When as the General was most busie thus in exhorting the Carthaginians and the Captains of the strangers, amongst the souldiers of their own Nations, and that for the most part by means of interpreters, intermingled for the same purpose with them; the Trumpets sounded, and the horns blew from the Roman host. And such a wonderful shout arose from thence, that the Elephants turned upon the Mores and Numidians of their own side, especially in the left point of the battail. Whom M. Janissa seeing once affrighted, he soon redoubled their fear; and riding upon them with a hot charge, laid naked the battailion of footmen on that side, and clean without the aid of their Cavalry. Howbeit, some few of the Elephants driven without fear full upon the enemy, made foul work among the ranks of the light-armed Velites, and overthrew a number of them, not without many a wound and much hurt done to themselves. For the Velites leaping again nimely to the Squadrons, after they had made way for the beasts, fearing they should be troden underfoot by them, let flie their javelins at them from both sides, lying open as they did like burs to the shot on either hand. Neither lost they any time, who were in the vanguard before the Ensigns, nor gave over flinging their darts at them, until they were driven by a volley of shot lighting upon them from all parts, clean out of the Roman battail: and then they turned head also upon the very Horsemen of the Carthaginians in their own right point, and forced them to run away. Lulus for his part, seeing the enemies in disarray and sore troubled, charged upon them with his Horses, and increased their fright. So as now the Carthaginian battailion was disurnished and stript of their Horsemen on both wings. By which time the Cavalry joynd battail, whose hope was now quailed and strength abated, and therefore not able to make their parts good. Besides another thing there was, a small matter to speak of, but yet in fighting time and in the very conflict, of great consequence and importance. The shout and cry from the Romans was ever alike and consonant in all parts, and therefore the greater and more terrible: but the enemies made dissonant noises, according as they differed in language, being as they were, of many and sundry Nations. The manner of the Romans fight was sure and steadfast, by reason of the peise of their own bodies, and the weight of their armour, bearing still a d pressing hard upon the enemies: but they on the other side, shewed more swiftness and agility, than force and violence. And therefore at the very first shock the Romans incontinently enforced their battailion to retire and lose their ground. Afterward they fell to shoudering and knocking them with the pikes and bosses of their bucklers: which done, they set foot forward a good round pace, and gained some ground of them, marching on still, and no man seemed to make head against them; whiles they that were hindmost in the files, perceiving once that battailion to go on and win ground, still put forward the foremost, which was the very thing that availed much, and was of great efficacy to put the enemies to flight. But the second battailion which consisted of Africans, and Carthaginians, were so far from seconding and upholding the auxiliary strangers thus dismarching; that contrary-wise, for fear lest the Romans by killing them in the forefront (who stood to it lustily and made resistance) should come as far as to them behind, they likewise retired and gave backward. Whereupon the aid-souldiers also suddenly shewed their hin-parts and turning their face upon their own fellows: some of them retired for refuge into the second battailion; others fell to killing of them that would not receive them within their ranks: and good reason they had, for as a while before they had no help at all of them, so then they were altogether excluded and shut out from them. So as now the Carthaginians had to deal at once in two skirmishes shuffled together, whiles they were compelled to close and come to handfight, both with their enemies, and also with their own fellows. Yet notwithstanding for all they were either so affrighted, or so angry with them receive them they would not in no hand into their battailion: but keeping their ranks and files close together, they cast them to side to the wings and the void ground without the place of conflict, and all because they would not intermingle any souldiers thus scared upon running away and many wounds, with that battailion which stood still sure enough, and as yet unfoiled. But the place where a little before the auxiliaries were ranged, was so full of slain bodies, and weapons and armour thrumbled one upon another, that the Romans had welneer more ado to pass that way now, than they should have had through the press of the enemies standing thick together. And therefore the foremost of the Hastati following after the enemies, every one as well as he could over the heaps of bodies and armour on the earth, and through the slippery filth of the blood, made a pelmell of their own ensigns, and confusion of their ranks. Whereupon the ensigns also of the Principes began to wave, when they saw the battail afore them so wandering and inconstant. Which Scipio when he once perceived, commanded in all hast to sound the retreat unto the Hastati: and when he had withdawn as many of them as were wounded and hurt, and bestowed them in the rearward, he brought the Principes and the Triarii to the out-wings and flanks thereof; to the end, that the middle battailion of the Hastati should be more sure and strong. By this means there began a new skirmish. For now were they come to their very enemies indeed: such as for armour and weapons of all sorts, for practise and experience of warfare, for fame and renown of worthy

A worthy exploits, and list of all for greatness either of hope or peril, were equal and comparable unto them. But both in number and also in courage, the Romans were superior, for that already they had discomfited the Cavalry, put to flight the Elephants, beaten back the vanguard, and were ready now to encounter with the main battail. Now Adriani and Aspurgis having had the horsemen in chase a good way, whom they had compelled to flee as is before said, returned in good time and charged hotly upon the tail of the enemies battail. And this assault of theirs it was, that struck the stroke, this did the deed and amazed the enemies. Many of them were environed and killed in the place, many fled and were scattered over the plains and open fields, and by the horsemen who had taken up all the avenues, and ranged all about, were caught up here and there, and so slain. Of Carthaginians and their Allies, were killed that day above twenty thousand, and B we know as many taken prisoners: of military ensignes there were gotten a hundred thirty three, and eleven Elephants besides, alive. Of the conquerors there died about two thousand, Annibal with some few horsemen made shift to escape out of the tumult and heat of the execution, and fled to Adrumetum, having assayed and tried all means possible, both in the very conflict, and also before the battail, ere he departed and left the fight. And this praise and commendation he won even by the confession of Scipio himself, and all others that were expert warriors, that with singular skill that day he ordered the battel, and marshalled the field. For the Elephants he had placed in the forefront, whose adventurous force and intollerable violence in giving the onset, might impeach the Romans from following their colours, and keeping their arraies: the only thing wherein they reposed their greatest hope and confidence. Then, before the main battail of the Carthaginians, he set the auxiliaries and aid-souldiers, of purpose, that being a confused rable and medley of all sorts of nations, such as were not bound by allegiance, but tied only by gain and wages, should have no liberty to retire themselves, and escape by running away: who also, as the forlorn hope, bearing the furious heat of the first brunt, might weary the enemies with charging upon them, and if they did no other good, yet with receiving many a wound in their bodies dull and turn the edge of the enemies sword. After this, in the battel, where all his hope was, he placed the Carthaginian and African souldiers; that being otherwise in all things else equal to the enemies, they might in this regard have the ods, in that they were to fight with them wearied and wounded, when they themselves were in heart and lusty. As for the Italians, who also were divided from the rest by a good space between, he removed far off into the rearward, as doubtful whether they were friends or enemies. Annibal having done this doughty deed and work, as it were for the last proof of his vertue and valour, fled to Adrumetum, and was from thence sent for to Carthage: whither he returned in the 36 year, after that he first departed thence a very child. Where in the Council house he confessed and said, "That overcome he was not only in a battel once, but also in the main war for ever hereafter: protesting in plain terms, that now there was no other way but one to save themselves, and that was peace, if they could obtain it."

Scipio immediately after this battail, having forced by assault and rifled the enemies camp, returned with a huge booty to the Sea and his ships, being advertised afore by a messenger that P. Lentulus was arrived at Utica with five ships of war, and a hundred Hulks laden with provision of all kinds of victual. And supposing it good policy now that Carthage was troubled and thoroughly affrighted, to come upon them with all terror on every side: so soon as he had dispatched Lentulus away to Rome, with tidings of this victory, he commanded Cn. Octavius to lead the legions by Land against Carthage. Himself in proper person, after he had joined this new fleet of Lentulus, unto the old Armado of his own, weighed anchor and departed from Utica, and sailed directly to the Haven of Carthage. He was not far from thence, when there met him a ship of the Carthaginians, garnished with insules, ribbands, and white flags of peace, and beset with branches of Olive: wherein were ten Orators embarked, the best men of the City, sent by the advice and motion of Annibal to crave peace. Who as they approached the hind-deck and poop of the Admiral ship, put forth the vails and tokens of suppliants, praying and beseeching the protection and mercy of Scipio. Who had no other answer made them, but that they should repair to Tunes, whither he intended to remove. Then himself after he had well viewed the situation of Carthage, not so much to have the full knowledge thereof at this present, as to terrifie the enemies, returned to Utica, whither he had called back Octavius also. As he marched forward from thence toward Tunes, he had intelligence given him, that Vermis the son of Syphax was coming to aid the Carthaginians with a power of more Horsemen than Footmen: whereupon, part of the army together with the whole Cavalry was sent: whereof the light horse and van-couriers charging the vanguard in their march, after a light skirmish discomfited the Numidians: and having stopped all passages every way with the Horsemen, so as they could nor get out and flee, there were upon a fifteen thousand men of them slain, 1200 taken prisoners, 1500 Numidian Horses also were gotten from them alive, and 72 military ensignes. The young Prince himself in the midst of the tumult and conflict, with some few escaped. Then encamped Scipio near Tunes, in the same place where he lay before: and thither repaired unto him thirty Embassadors from Carthage. And they verily, as they were in harder case and greater distress, made much more pitifull entreating than before: but in their audience found less favour and mercy by a great deal for their late treachery and falshood so fresh in remembrance. Now albeit when they were set in counsell, all of them had just cause to be angry, and thereupon were provoked to destroy & rase Carthage: yet upon better advisement and consideration, how great and difficult and enterprize, and what a long long peace of service it was to besiege a City so strong and so well fortified: and for that Scipio himself was troubled in mind with the expectation of a successor, who should come to what the credit and honor of finishing the war; which indeed was gotten by the travail and labor of him, that all their hearts were turned and inclined to peace. The morrow after the Orators were called again before them: and after they had been well checked, rebuked; and plainly told of their treachery, and warned withal, that after so many losses and overthrowes which they had received, they should now learn to be wise, and at length believe that there were Gods in Heaven, and that an oath was to be regarded, these conditions of peace were tendered and offered unto them. Imprimis, it was capitulated, That they might live free, according to the form of their own Laws. Item, What Cities, what territories (and within what bounds and limits) they held and were possessed of before the war began, the same they might keep still. Item, That Scipio and the Romans from that day forward should not waste and spoil the countrey. Item, That the Carthaginians should deliver all renegade traitors, all fugitive persons, all captives and prisoners, yea, and yield unto them all ships of war with brazen heads, above ten triremes or galleys of three ranks of oars. Item, That they should put into their hands all those Elephants which they had already tamed and manned, and should break and tame no more of them. Item, They should make war neither in Affrick, nor without Affrick, but by order and warrant from the people of Rome. That they should make restitution and amends to Masanissa for all harms, and enter into league with him. Item, That they should find corn and money for the maintenance of the aid-souldiers, until their Embassadors were returned from Rome: yea, and tender payment of ten thousand talents of silver by even portions in fifty years. Item, That they should put in a hundred hostages at the pleasure of Scipio, and none of them to be either under fourteen years of age, or above thirty. Last of all, they would grant a truce upon this condition, That the ships which were taken during the time of the former cessation of arms, should be restored back again, with all things else that were therein: otherwise, no truce for the present, nor hope of peace hereafter. These articles and conditions the Embassadors were willed to return home withal. Which after they had related in the general assembly of the people, Gisco mounted up the pulpit to disswade peace, and had audience given him with great applause of the multitude; who as they were heartless and unmeet for war, so they were as peevish and unruly, and could not long continue in repose. Hereat, Annibal took great indignation, and was highly displeased, that in such a time, those things should either be delivered or heard: and he made no more ado, but stepped to Gisco, laid hand upon him, and pulled him down from the pulpit out of which he spoke: whereat the people were moved and grumbled in great discontent to see so strange a sight and unusual, in a free City. Then Annibal, as he was a meek martial man and could not skill of civil affairs, nor well away with these citizens liberty: "I went," quoth he, "from you when I was but nine years old, and now after 30 years I am come again. All military skill and knowledge, which fortune sometime in my private matters, and otherwhiles in publick affairs, hath taught me from my childhood, me thinks I have learned sufficiently: many for the rights and privileges, for the laws, customs and fashions of the City and the common Hall I must be informed and instructed by you." Thus having pleaded ignorance for his excuse, he discoursed at large of peace, arguing how reasonable and equal, yea, and how necessary it was. The greatest point of difficulty in all the capitulations ministered unto them was this, That touching the things abovesaid which were taken during the abstinence of arms, there was nothing now forth-coming and to be seen but the bare vessels; and no easy matter was it to seek up the rest. Now when as they that gain'd the peace were convinced and put down by reason, agreed it was, that the ships should be redelivered, and the men likewise be sought out and found: as for all the rest that was wanting, there should an estimate be made according to the value, at the discretion of Scipio, and so the Carthaginians to make all good in money. Whence there be that have delivered how Annibal presently from the field sped him to Sea, and thence finding a ship ready prepared for him, straight-ways embarked, and went directly to King Antiochus: Also, when Scipio demanded above all other things that Annibal should be yielded into his hands, answer was made, that Annibal was not in Affrick. After that the Embassadors were returned to Scipio, the Quæstors or Treasurers were commanded to draw an exact account according to their books upon record, of all such things as were in the ships, and appertained to the City: and look what belonged to private persons, the owners thereof were willed to declare and testify. In consideration and recompense whereof, there was a sum of money set down, amounting to 25000 pound weight of silver, and the same to be paid presently out of hand by the Carthaginians. Thus a truce was granted to them for three months: with this clause annexed over and besides, That during the said term they should send their Embassadors to no other place but only to Rome: and what Embassadors soever came to Carthage, they should not let them depart before they had certified the Roman General both who they were, and what their message and errand was. Then with the Carthaginian Embassadors were sent to Rome, L. Veturius Philo, M. Martius Ralla, and L. Scipio, brother to the General. At that time there came such store of grain and victuals out of Sicily and Sardinia, and thereby corn was so cheap, that the Merchant was fain to leave corn behind him, to furnish the shipmen and mariners for the portage and carriage thereof.

Now there had been much trouble and fear at Rome upon the first news and alarm, that the Carthaginians had taken arms again: and T. Claudius had commission to conduct a fleet with all speed

A speed into Sicily, and from thence to pass over into Africa: likewise the other Consul was commanded to stay still at Rome, until it were certainly known in what terms all matters stood in Africa. But T. Claudius went but slowly so work either in preparing and rigging an armada, or in putting it to sea: because the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that as touching the peace and the conditions thereof, it was rather at the disposition of Scipio, than of the Consul. Moreover, there were certain prodigious signs reported even presently before the very rumour of the fore-said rising and insurrection, which caused men to fear greatly. At Coma, the circle and compass of the sun appeared less; and it rained a good shower of stones. Also in the territory of Velutro, the earth seized and sunk, and made huge hollow chinks in so much as trees were quite swallowed up under the ground. At Aricia the market-place and the shops all about, likewise at Erasine the wall of the City in divers places, yea, and the gate, were smitten with lightning from heaven: and in mount Palatine it rained stones. This wondrous sight last rehearsed, was expiate after the ancient custome, by keeping a Novendial sacrifice and feast for nine dayes: the rest by killing of greater sacrifices. Among all there were unusual deluges and inundations of waters, which troubled the minds and consciences of men: for the Tyber so swelled and rose so high, that by reason that the shew-place of the Circus was overflowed, preparation was made for the setting forth of the games Apollinaries, without the gate Collina, near the chappel of Venus Erycina. But upon the very day when the plaies should be exhibited, it grew to be so fair weather of a sudden, that the pageant and pompous train of the shew, which was a going to the gate Collina, was called back and conveyed into the Circus: and word brought, that the water was fallen and gone clean out from thence: so the people were more joyous, and the pastimes celebrated with greater resort, for that the usual and ordinary place served again for the solemnity to be performed.

Claudius the Consul at last departed from the City of Rome, and went to sea: where between the havens of Cass and Laurentium, he was overtaken with a terrible and fearful tempest that arose and put him in exceeding fear. From thence he came to the Papilionis, and there staid until the tempest was overblown and gone. Then he fell with the Ile * Illa, and from Illa he sailed to Corsica, and from Corsica he passed over to Sardinia: where, as he doubled the point and was passing the race of the mountains called * Insani, there arose a far more cruel gust, and in places of more peril and hazard, which scattered the fleet. Many of the ships were weather beaten and sore shaken, many lost their tackling quite, yea, and some were cracked and split. Thus the Armado being much tossed and torn, arrived at length at Coma: where, whilst the ships were drawn up into the dock to drie Land, and there a repairing, the winter came upon them, and the year turned about. And so T. Claudius (as a private person, by reason that no man renewed his commission for a further time) brought the Armado back to Rome: But M. Servilius, because he should not be called home to the City for the solemn election of Magistrates, after he had declared Dictator, Cn. Servilius Geminus, departed into his Province. And the Dictator chose P. Aelius Paetus General of the Horsemen. Oftentimes went the writs out for publishing of the election, but by reason of tempests it held not, nor was performed. And therefore when the old Magistrates left their office after the Ides of March, and no new substituted in their room, the City was clean without any Magistrates of state to sit in the ivory chair. A. Manlius Torquatus a Bishop, that year died. In his place was invested C. Sulpicius Galba. The Roman games were thence exhibited anew by L. Lucullus Lucullus and Q. Fulvius Ediles of the chair. The Clarks and Scribes belonging to the Ediles, together with their beadies and summoners, were detected for carrying forth certain money out of the treasure and chamber of the City: and being thereof convicted, were therefore condemned, nor without some touch and discredit of Lucullus himself the Edile. P. Aelius Tiberius and L. Letterius Ediles of the commons, for that there was some error and default in their election, resigned up their places. After they had represented the playes, and in regard thereof solemnized the feast of Jupiter, and set up besides in the Capitol three images made of the silver that was forfeited and raised upon the fines of the persons condemned aforesaid. The Dictator and General over the Horsemen, by order from the Senat exhibited the games called Cereales to the honour of Ceres.

When the Roman Embassadors and Carthaginians together, were come out of Africa to Rome, the Senat assembled to give them audience in the Temple of Bellona where L. Fannius Paculus after he had declared (to the exceeding joy of the LL. of the Senat) that they had fought a battail with Annibal, (the last that ever the Carthaginians were like to fight) and that this grievous and lamentable war was now come to an end, he went on still and related, that Fernius the son of Syphax was vanquished and subdued; which was no small increase of the other exploits so happily achieved. Then he was commanded to go forth from thence directly to the assembly of the people, there to impart their glad news unto the multitude. Whereupon (for exceeding joy and in token of thanksgiving) all the Temples in the City were set open, and solemn processions devised for three dayes. Now when as the Embassadors of the Carthaginians and King Philip (for they also were arrived) required to have a day of audience in the Senat, the Dictator by direction from the Senat, returned them this answer, That the new Consuls should satisfy their request. After this, was the solemn assembly holden for the election of Magistrates: and Consuls were created Cn. Cornelius Lucullus and P. Aelius Paetus: for Praetors, first M. Junius Pennus, who was allotted to have the civil jurisdiction in the City: then M. Valerius Flaccus, unto whom the Brutian country fell by lot to government, M. Fabius Buteo, whose hap was to rule Sardinia, and and P. Ennius Tribune, to be L. deputy of Sardinia. Concerning the Provinces where the Communes were to be employed, it was not thought good to determine any thing, before the Embassa-dors of King Ptolemy and likewise of the Carthaginians had delivered their embassages: for as they saw the end of one war, so they foresaw the beginning of another. C. Leutius the Consul was impaired with an ardent desire of the Province of Africa: for if the war continued, he aimed at an easy victory: and if it were at the point of an end, he hoped at the honor of finishing the same, and hoped to have the name, That determined it was while he was Consul. And therefore he protested plainly, that he would suffer nothing to pass before that the Province of Africa were assigned to him. His colleague (a sober, temperate, and discreet man) gave his consent for he saw full well, that as the contending for that glory with Scipio, was unjust and unreasonable, so in it he would be overmatched, and never able to import and carry it away from him. P. Mucius Ther- psidius and M. Acilius Glabrius, two Tribunes of the commons, gave out and said, That C. Cornelius were about to compass that, which was commenced and assailed in the year before by C. Gracchus the Consul. For when by warrant from the Senat a bill was proposed into the people, whom their pleasure was to nominate for government of Africa, all the 35 Tribes gave their voices and awarded that Province to P. Scipio. Much contention there passed and many bickerments both in Senat-house and before the people, in the debating of this question: but in the end they grew to this point to refer all to the judgement of the Senat. So the LL. of the Senat having taken their oath (for so it was agreed upon) thus concluded and gave this order. First, that the two Consuls should either agree together between themselves, or else call lots for their Provinces; namely, which of them should have the rule of Italy, and who the charge of a fleet of fifty sail. Item, to whether of them would belee the navy, he should sail over into Sicily: and if peace might not be fully concluded with the Carthaginians, then to cross over into Africa: where the Consul should war by Sea, and Scipio by Land: by virtue of the same commission and authority that he had already. Moreover, if the conditions of peace were accepted of both parts, that then the Tribunes of the Commons should propound unto the people, as touching their will and pleasure, whether the Consul of P. Scipio should conclude the peace; and which of them (if the victorious army after conquest obtained) were to be brought back out of Africa: should have the conduct thereof home again. And, if they nominated Scipio for to make the peace, and bring away the army likewise, then the Consul should be cut over from Sicily to Africa. As for the other Consul who had the government of Italy, he should receive of M. Scipio the Pretor, two legions, so P. Scipio had his commission sealed again for to remain in the Province of Sicily, with the same forces which he there had. On M. Pulchellus P. also the Pretor in the Britians country was allowed those legions whereof C. Isidrus had the command the year before. It was further agreed that P. Scipio the Pretor should take the two legions in Sicily of C. Terentius: and that one legion which P. Domitius the Propetor had under his conduct, was appointed to M. Fabius for Sardinia. And M. Scipio the Consul of the former year, continued also in his government with his own two legions for Italy. As concerning the provinces of Sardinia, then L. Carminius Leu- lus and M. Acilius Glabrius had been there for certain years, the said Consuls were to deal with the Tribunes, that if they thought it good they should propound unto the Commons, for to know their mind, whom they would appoint to govern Sardinia: and that he who soever it was, should out of two armies take one entire legion of Roman soldiers. And of the allies of the Latin nation make up armed cohorts or regiments, and with the strength of them jointly, keep in obedience, and defend the province. Item, that D. Corneilius and P. Mucius should bring over the old soldiers into Italy. Unto Corneilius the Consul was assigned a fleet of fifty ships, to be deputed and drawn out of two other Armies: the one of C. Scipio which was in Africa, the other of P. Scipio which guarded the coasts of Sicily: and to choose thereout what ships he would: and that P. Scipio should keep those fifty ships of war which he had already. And in case his pleasure was that C. Scipio should be Admiral over them, like as he heretofore: then O. Octavius was to continue in government for that year as Vice-pretor: but if he made Leutius the Admiral, then O. Octavius should depart and come home to Rome, and bring back with him those ships that the Vice-consul had no more need of. M. Scipio likewise had ten cohorts of service allowed him in Sardinia. And the Tribunes were appointed to muster and enroll two legions of citizens: that with the power of sixteen legions, and as hundred ships of war, the arms of Rome that year might be managed. These things thus ordered, they began to debate in tomes about the Embassadors of Ptolemy and the Carthaginians: and thought good it was to admit the Macedonians into place for to have audience. Divers and many speeches they made, while they laboured partly to clear that point as touching the complaints that the Embassadors sent from Rome made before the King for the robbing and spoiling of his country: and partly complained themselves of the allies of the people of Rome, for as much as their charge: but far more bitterly accusing M. Acili- us, for that he being one of the three Embassadors sent unto them, had behaved and took munitions of soldiers: and had so in the covering and compassing in the legions made war upon them, and oftentimes given them the captains and Governors in open field: partly also they demanded: that the Macedonians and their Captains Scipio, who had served in the wars of Rome for wages, and were taken prisoners and kept bound in prison, might be charged and let at liberty.

A To these points M. Fulvius of purpose from Aurelius out of Macedonia made answer brief-ly in this wise. That Aurelius who was left behind, for fear that the associates of the people of Rome; wearied with roads and incursions into their territories and other injurious oppressions, might retaliate to the King, never departed out of the confines of the associates aforesaid, and endeavour'd only, that those robbers and ravagers of the country should not invade and over-run their lands, and go clear away without any harm. As for Scipio, he was a state and peer of the Macedonians and with money to aid and assist Annibal and the Carthaginians. When as the Macedonians being required what they could say to these challenges, framed but a doubtful and intricate defence, before they had well made an end they received this for their answer: That since the King Antiochus was if he proceeded and went on still, he should shortly have his hands full; but forasmuch as he had broken the league in two points, first in offering wrong to the allies of the people of Rome, and molesting them by way of war and hostilities; and secondly, in helping their enemies with men and money, they deemed thus much of it, that not only P. Scipio both did & doth well and justly, in keeping them still in prison as enemies, who bare arms against the people of Rome, and were taken captive; but also M. Aemilius performed good service to the State, and a great pleasure to the Senat, in defending the Allies of the people of Rome by force of arms, when by negotiation could not. When the Macedonians had their dispatch, and were sent away with this heavy answer, then the Carthaginian Embassadors were called in.

C When they beheld their reverent age, and the dignity of their personage (for they were the best and principal men simply of their City) then every man was fully perswaded for his own part and sake. Thus now they desired no longer, but meant indeed and good earnest to crave & have peace. But the chief and most portly person of them all was one Asdrubal, in his country and among his citizens surnamed Hædus, a man that ever perswaded peace, & opposed himself against the Barchine faction. And therefore he had the more credit and authority, when he derived the blame from the Commonwealth, and laid all the fault upon the wilfulness and greedy avarice of some few. Who after he had used diverse and sundry speeches, one while excusing and clearing the crimes, another while confessing somethings objected, lest if they had denied certain truths, they should with more difficulty have obtained pardon and peace: now and then also giving the LL. of the Senat an admonition and warning by the way, to use their prosperity and good fortune modestly and with moderation, he added moreover and said, That if the Carthaginians would have been ruled by him & Hanno, and had been so wise as to have taken their time and the opportunity when it was, they should themselves have given those conditions of peace, which now they are constrained to crave. But for men to be fortunate and wise both at once, it is a rare and special gift, and seldom seen. And here it is that the people of Rome (quoth he) is invincible, because in prosperity they can remember to be wise, and to take the best way for themselves. And certainly, a wonder it were, if ever they should do otherwise. For those commonly who happen to meet with some new good success, and have not been used thereto before, are stiff-foot and pass themselves too much in excessive joy, which they have not the grace to govern with sobriety and discretion: whereas the people of Rome have ever been accustomed to the continual felicity of joyous victories, inasmuch as they are grown into a dislike of taking pleasure and delight in them (so common they are) and have increased their dominion and Empire, more (in manner) by sparing and pardoning those whom they have conquered, than by the very conquest of them indeed.

F The speech that the other Embassadors made, was more pitiful and lamentable, whiles they recounted before the Senat from what high estate, and to how base condition they were fallen: who but a while since held by force of arms, as it were the whole world, & had nothing left them now but the bare walls of the City of Carthage, within which they were shut up, and could see nothing either by land or sea, which they might rightfully claim as their own. Nay, the very City it self and their houses, they were to enjoy no longer than the people of Rome is willing, and forbearth to proceed by rigour and extremity against the same, since there is nothing else behind to work upon. Now when as the LL. of the Senat seemed to incline to mercy and compassion one Senator there was amongst them (by report) who upon a deep and inveterate hatred of the Carthaginians treachery, spake out aloud and said, What Gods will they regard and swear by in making of a new League, who have broken their oath, and taken their name in vain whom they called to witness in the former? Many (quoth Asdrubal) even those and no other that are so sharp revengers and heavy enemies to the breakers of league and covenant. So when all their minds were inclined to peace, Cn. Lentulus the Consul, who had the government of the navy, opposed himself against the decree of the Senat for to cross the same. Then M. Atilius, and Q. Minucius Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a solemn bill unto the people, in this form: Pleaseth it you, and will you grant, That the Senat shall resolve and determine, that peace may be concluded with the Carthaginians? Pleaseth it you to chuse and appoint who shall be the man to make that peace; and who shall bring the army out of Africa? As concerning peace, the tribes every one as they were demanded their voices, granted affirmatively (Res rogatus) that Scipio should conclude it, and also bring away the army. By virtue of this Act passed by the people, the Senat made a decree, that P. Scipio by the advice and counsel of ten Commissioners, should conclude an accord with the people of Carthage, under what conditions he thought good. After this the the Carthaginians rendered thanks to the L. of the Senate, and requested that they might enter into the City, and talk with their fellow citizens and country-men, who had been taken captives aforetime, and lay in the common goal and prison. For there were amongst them some of their kinsfolk and friends, noblemen of birth and of good quality: others also, unto whom they were to deliver some message and credence from their kinsmen. When they had spoken and remained with them, they came with a new petition and made earnest suit, to give them leave to ransom and redeem as many of them as they would: whereupon they were willing to give them their names, and when they had named (as upon two hundred) an order was drawn out of the Senat, that the Roman Commissioners should take over with them into Africa, unto Scipio two hundred of those captives whom the Carthaginians would make choice of, and declare unto him from the Senat, that in case the peace were fully agreed upon and finished, he should deliver those two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely without paying any ransom. Now when the heralds of arms were appointed to go into Africa, for to confirm and establish the peace according to the solemn order, at their own request there passed an act of the Senat framed in this form and tenor. Imprimis, That they should carry with them every one by himself certain distinct stipes of their own, and likewise Vervens Heru, That the Roman Prætor should command them solemnly to pronounce the league, and then they to ask of the Prætor sacred herbs or Vervens. A kind of grass or herb this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitol hill, and given to the Heralds.

Thus were the Carthaginians dismissed and sent from Rome: who being come into Africa to Scipio, concluded peace with the same capitulations as is above said, and so they delivered up their galleys and ships of war, their Elephants, the renegade traitors, the vagrant fugitives, and four thousand prisoners. Among whom was Q. Terentius Castus, a Senator by his calling. As for the ships, so soon as they were lancht forth into the deep, Scipio caused them to be set on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in number, one with another, of every sort, and all directed and guided by oars. Presently were they set a burning: a dolorous sight and heavy spectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthage it self had been on a light fire. The renegade traitors and rebels were punished more grievously than the fugitives. As many of them as were of the Latin Nation lost their heads: all that were natural Romans, were crucified and roundly trussed up on the gallows. Forty years before was the peace last made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Lutatius and A. Manlius were Consuls. The war began three and twenty years after, whilst P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And the same ended in the eighteenth year after, P. Cornelius and P. Scipio being Consuls. Many a time after, Scipio by report, would say that the villain and covetous desire of T. Claudius first, and afterwards of C. Corneli, was the only stay and let, that this was ended nor with the final ruin and utter destruction of Carthage.

When as the Carthaginians, who by long and continual wars were grown bare & poor thought the levy and contribution of money for to furnish out the fifth payment, lay heavy and sore upon them, so much as in their Senat-house, there was great sorrow and heaviness, yea, and piteous weeping: it is said that Annibal was seen to laugh a good while. And when A. Hedus rebuked him for laughing in that public lamentation of the City, considering that himself was the cause of those tears, "If god, Annibal as we see by our eye the outward disposition of the face and countenance, so we could look within & behold the affection of the mind, ye might soon perceive, that this laughter of mine, which ye to much blame, proceedeth not from an heart that is glad and joyful, but rather senseless, stupified, and astonished, with the exceeding griefs and calamities that have hapned. Yet is not it so unreasonable and impertinent to our present condition, as these tears of yours, and weeping that you make, is absurd and nothing to the purpose. Then should ye have wept and shed tears, when our armor and weapons were taken from us, when our ships were set on fire, when we were interdicted and forbidden to make war with foreign nations: for then had we our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never think that the Romans have proceeded hardly against you, in comparison of the hatred that ye have bare one to another. No great City and mighty State can long continue and rest in quiet. It is have no enemies abroad, it hindeth some at home: much like unto strong and lusty bodies, which seeming sure enough against all outward accidents and causes of sickness, are overcharged with their own strength and fulness of humours, and thereby subject to most deadly maladies. So much, forsooth, and no more we feel of the publick miseries & common calamities, as toucheth and concerneth our selves in particular: wherein nothing pincheth us more, nor goeth nearer to the quick, than to forgo our money, and part with our pence. And therefore when Carthage was conquered and depoyled of all her ancient honors, when ye saw her disarmed and stripped naked, when ye saw her forlorn of all the armed nations of Africa: no man then sighed, no man groined thereat: but now when the tribute imposed, is to be paid out of your privat purses, ye keep a weeping and wailing, as in some publick funeral and mortuary carried forth. But alas, I fear me greatly that ere it be long, ye shall find and feel, That your weeping this day hath been for the least loss of all the rest. Thus spake Annibal to the Carthaginians.

Scipio having assembled his whole army together before them all, restored Adasani to his fathers Kingdom: and over and besides, endued him with the possession of the City Ciriba, and other Towns and territories which belonged to the realm of Syphax, and were now in subjection

A to the people of Rome, unto Cn. Octavius he gave order to conduct the fleet into Sicily and there to make it over to Cn. Cornelius the Consul. The Carthaginian Embassadors he willed to go to Rome, that those sets and capitulations which were concluded by him with the advice of the said Commissioners, might likewise pass under the approbation of the Senate, and the consent of the people, and so be ratified and confirmed forever.

Thus Scipio having obtained peace both by sea and land, and embarked his army, sailed toward Sicily, & arrived at Lilybæum. From whence he sent away a great part of his army by sea, and himself passed by land through Italy, which now was joyfull as well for the peace concluded, as the victory achieved. Where all the way as he went, not only the people came forth in multitudes out of the Cities to do him honour, but numbers also of the country peasants out of the Villages, filled

B all the high-ways along untill he came to Rome: where he entered the City, riding in the most stately and magnificent triumph that ever had been. He brought into the City Chamber 100033 pound weight of silver. He divided among his souldiers out of the spoil four hundred Attics a peece. Syphax by his death rather disappointed the people of a goodly show and pageant in the triumph, than diminished any while the glory of the triumph: he died at Tyber not long afore, to which place he had been removed from Alba: howbeit his death was not obscure, by reason that he was solemnly carried to his burfall, with the pomp of a publike funerall at the charges of the City. But Polibius a writer of good account, reporteth, That this King was led in the very triumph. As Scipio rode triumphant Q. Terentius Culleo followed after with a cap of liberty set upon his head, and ever after, so long as he lived, he honoured him (as befitting it was) and acknowledged him the author of his freedom. But as concerning his surname Africanus, I cannot for certain learn, whether it were the favour of his souldiers first, or the affectionate love of the people afterwards that brought it up, or rather began upon some of his own house and lineage that courted and flattered him therewith: like as in our fathers daies Sulla was surnamed  Felix*, and Pompeius,  Magnus*. This is certain that he was the first General that ever took his name of the country and nation by himself subdued, and thereby was renowned. But by his example afterwards, others nothing comparable to him in victory and conquest won goodly titles and glorious inscriptions to their images, and honoured their houses with noble files and additions.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and thirtieth Book.

E The causes of the war began again with Philip King of Macedony, which had discontinued, are to be remembered. In the time of the holy feast of Ceres, two young men of Acarnania, who had not been professed in those sacred mysteries, came to Athens, & chanced among other of their countrymen to go into the Chappel of Ceres. For which, as if they had committed some heinous fact in the highest degree, they were by the Athenians executed. The Acarnanians moved with indignation for the death of their neighbours, required aid of Philip to be revenged for them: Some few months after peace was made to the Carthaginians, in the five hundred and fifty year from the foundation of the City of Rome, when the Embassadors of the Athenians, who now were besieged by Philip, craved aid of the Senate and the people of Rome, and requested to help them, not without thinking the Commons gain said it by reason that they thought the continual troubles of so many wars were grievous and heavy unto them: yet so far prevailed the authority of the Nobles, that the people also gave their consent to succour their confederate City. The war was committed to the managing of P. Sulpicius the Consul, who led an army into Macedony, and fought certain battles fortuitously against Philip, which were performed by horse-service. The Macedonians, distressed and beleaguered round about by Philip, following the example of the Sagarinians, slew their wives and children, and their own selves after them. L. Furius the Praetor overthrew in a fight P. Sulpicius, the Consul, and his army, and the Consul himself was slain. The Consul's army was in these parts, where Amilcar was slain, with him five and thirty thousand men. Moreover, the Consul's army was in these parts, where Amilcar was slain, with him five and thirty thousand men. Furius the Praetor overthrew in a fight P. Sulpicius, the Consul, and his army, and the Consul himself was slain. The Consul's army was in these parts, where Amilcar was slain, with him five and thirty thousand men. Moreover, the Consul's army was in these parts, where Amilcar was slain, with him five and thirty thousand men.

The one and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

F well again, I like well, that I am now come to an end once of the Punic war, as if it had been in person there, and born my part in the toil and danger thereof. For albeit many of our writers have undertaken and professed to boldly to write a compleat and full history of the Romans, to be wanted in the several parts of so great a work: yet when I think and consider, how threescore years and three (for so many are reckoned from the first Punick war, to the end of the second) have taken up no fewer books of mine than four hundred eighty eight years before, even from the foundation of Rome unto the Consulship of that Appius Claudius, who was the first that warred upon the Carthaginians; methinks I foresee already, that like as they who being once entred into the shallows near the shore, are trained on still, and venture to wade into the sea, even so I, the farther I go forward, the deeper I step, and am carried away in a vast Ocean, and bottomless gulph (as it were) which cannot be sounded; and that my work groweth still upon me in my hands, which as I went away apace, and tid matters at the first, I would have thought by this time should have decreased.

H h h

The Carthaginian peace was no sooner concluded, but the Macedonian war straightwaies ensued: nothing comparable to the Punick, if ye regard the hazard and danger, the vertue of the Captains for direction, or prowess of the souldiers: but if a man consider the Nobility and reputation of the ancient Kings, the fame and antiquity of the nation, the greatness of their seignory and dominion, who in times past had conquered and held by the sword much in Europe, and the better part of Asia, I dare well say, as noble and renowned, if not more. But the war commenced against Philip ten years almost before, had ere three years end been laid down and discontinued by means of the Ætolians: who as they gave occasion to enter into arms, so they wrought a composition of peace. But afterwards in process of time, when the Romans by reason of peace with the Carthaginians, had nothing to do, and were at leisure; and yet bearing an inward grudge, and owing a displeasure to Philip, as well for his faithles peace with the Ætolians and other allies and confederates of that country, as also for aid both of men and money lately sent into Affrick to Annibal and the Carthaginians: behold, the Athenians, whose territories he had clean wasted and spoiled, and whom he had driven within their City walls, importuned them with their prayers, and perswaded them to take arms and renew the war aforesaid. And much about the same time there arrived Embassadors from King Attalus, as also from the Rhodians, giving notice that divers Cities and States of Asia were solicited likewise by Philip to band against the Romans. These Embassadors had their dispatch, and received this answer. That the Senat would have a carefull eye to the affairs of Asia. But the entire treaty and consultation concerning the Macedonian war was wholly reserved and referred unto the Consuls, who then were employed in the war with the Boii. In the mean season three Embassadors were addrest unto Ptolemæus the King of Egypt, to L. I. wit, C. Claudius Nero, M. Aemilius Lepidus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, with this commission: First, to signifie and let him understand, that Annibal & the Carthaginians were subdued: secondly, to give thanks unto the King for continuing so fast and faithfull unto the Romans in their distress and adversity, when other of their allies, and even their next neighbours forsook and abandoned them: last of all, to request him, that in case they should be forced by wrongs and injuries offered, to wage war against Philip, he would vouchsafe the same mind still and his wonted affectionate favour toward the people of Rome.

Near about this time, P. Aelius the Consul being in France, advertised that the Boians before his coming had made rodes into the lands of the friends and allies of the Romans, presently well haste levied and enrolled two legions upon the rumour of this tumult and trouble; and joyning thereunto four cohorts of footmen out of his own army, sent C. Appius a Colonell or Captain of the Confederates, with this power so suddenly raised, and with commandment to march through that part of Umbria, which is called, the Tribe Sappinia, and to invade the territories of the Boii, whiles himself in person led his forces the open way traversing through the mountains, and came thither. Appius being entred into the confines of the enemies, at the first had a good hand, and sped well in foraging the country with safety of himself. But afterwards, having made choice of a meet place near unto a Castle called * Mutilum, for to cut down and reap the corn, (for now the fields were ready for harvest) but yet, without espials sent out to discover the coasts about, without setting strong and sufficient guards, which being well appointed and armed might defend the unarmed that were busie in their harvest work: he chanced himself and all his forragers and reapers to be surpris'd at unawares by the Frenchmen, and assailed on every side. Whereupon they also that were armed, fled in great fright: and 7000 men stragling here and there over the corn fields were slain; and among them C. Appius himself their leader. The rest for fear were driven to put themselves within their Camp: from whence without direction and guidance of any certain Captain and only upon a generall consent of the souldiers, the night next following they abandoned their hold, left much of their baggage behind them, and through blind forests, chales, and wild mountains (in manner unpassable) they came in the end to the Consul: who, after he had performed in his Province no memorable act, save only that he wasted the borders and frontiers of the Boii, and in league with the Ingauni (a nation of the Ligurians) returned to Rome. So soon as he had assembled the Senat, all the whole house with one voice called upon him, to treat and consult upon no other matter before they had determined of King Philip, and the complaints made by their allies: so he propos'd that out of hand to be debated in Councill. And the Senate in a frequent number there met, pass'd a decree, that P. Aelius the Consul should send whom he thought good with commission and authority for to receive the Armado, which C. Octavius was to bring out of Sicily, and therewith to cross over into Madagascari. So M. Valerius Levinus the Vice-Prætor was sent; and when he had taken the charge of the fleet, com-

A King of eight and thirty fell at the hands of Ca. Octavius about Edus; he passed the day to Adridonia. Now when M. Annius the Lieutenant was come, and had informed and advertised him, what puissant armies, what numbers of ships the King had prepared, and got together; how partly himself in person by going about, not only to all the Cities of the Continue, but also the Islands in the sea; and partly by sending his Embassadors every way, had solicited unto war; and raised much people to take arms: shewing moreover, that the Romans were not to enterprize that war without preparation of greater forces; and the more speedily, for fear lest if they made slow haste and lingered, Philip might enterprize that, from thence, which Pyrrhus the Potentate and Prince of a far lesser Dominion, had done before he was thought meet that Antiochus should dispatch his letters to the same effect unto the Consuls and

B the Senate, as it is describ'd but it is not so in the original but it is so in the translation.

In the end of this year, when a motion was propounded in the Senate-house, as concerning the setting out of lands unto the old soldiers for recompence of their good service, who, under the conduct and fortunate government of Scipio the Pro-Consul, had fought the war in Africa to an end: the LL enacted a decree, that M. Junius the Praetor of the City, if he thought it good, should create ten Decemvirs as lawyers, for to measure out and divide among them the lands in Samnium and Apulia, so much as had been forfeit and confiscate to the people of Rome. And these were they, namely, P. Terentius, Q. Caelius, Marcus, Cornelius and Marcus, named Servilius, and both surnamed Gemini, Lucius and Aulus both Hofilius, and surnamed Cato likewise, P. Fulvius, Terren- tius, M. Fulvius, Placcus, P. Aelius Paullus, and Q. Flaminius.

C At the same time P. Aelius the Cos, called the assembly and high Court of Parliament for election of Magistrates: and for Cos. were created P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. After them were the Praetors chosen to wit, Q. Minucius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureus, Q. Fabius Gillo, and C. Ser- gius Plancus. The Roman stage-plays were that year exhibited with great state and magnificence most sumptuously, by L. Valerius Placcus, and T. Quintus Flaminius, Ediles of the Chair; and for two daies together were represented anew. These Ediles distributed and divided most faithfully among the people a mighty deal of corn, which Scipio the Pro-Consul had sent out of Africa, at four asses the Modius: whereby they won great love and favour of all men. Also the Plebeian plays were thrice set forth all whole again by the Ediles of the Commons, L. Apustius Falla, and Q. Minucius Rufus. This man from his Edileship stepped to the Praetors place. And by occasion D of those plays there was a solemn feast celebrated in the honour of Jupiter.

In the 54 year from the foundation of the City, when P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius were Cos, the war with King Philip began, within four months after peace granted to the Carthaginians. And before all other matters this affair was propounded in the Senate by P. Sulpicius the Cos, upon the Ides of March, the very day on which at that time they used to enter upon the Consulship. Whereby the Senate it was decreed, Imprimis, That the Consuls should sacrifice with greater beasts to what gods themselves thought good, with a solemn prayer in this form: That whatsoever the Senate and people of Rome minded and intended to do, either concerning the affairs of the Common-wealth, or the undertaking and enterprize of this new war, the same might speed well and happily in the end, to the behoof of the people of Rome, their allies, and

E namely, the nation of the Latines. Item, That after sacrifice and divine prayer they should consult with the Senat about the state of the City, and the government of the Provinces. At the same time it fell one very fitly to provoke and stir up their minds unto war, that not only letters were brought from M. Aurelius the Lieutenant, and from M. Valerius Lavinus the Vice-Praetor:
but also a new Embassie of the Athenians arrived: the one importing, and the other reporting, that the King drew near and approached their confines, and within a while would be not only Lord of their lands and territories, but also Master of their City, unless the Romans set too their helping hand. After that the Consuls had openly pronounced and declared, that the sacrifices were performed rightly and according to order, and that the Gods gave ear unto their prayer, and accepted thereof: and the soothsayers and so well-priests likewise out of their learn-F ing made answer and shewed, that the inwards of the beasts were as they should be, and signified happiness, namely, the enlarging of their confines and frontiers, with the achieving of victory and triumph. Then were the letters above said of Valerius and Aurelius read, and the Athenian Ambassadors had a day of audience. After this, there passed an Act of the Senate, That thanks should be rendred unto their allies, for that they being long tempted and solicited for to revolt, yet notwithstanding had not failed in their allegiance, nor forsaken their fealty, nor for fear of a present siege. As touching sending aid unto them, it was thought good to give answer, when the Consuls had their Provinces allotted unto them: and when that Consul whose his should be for to go into Macedony, had proposed unto the people, That defiance should be given to Philip King of Macedony, and open war proclaimed against him. Now it fell by lot unto P. Sulpicius to take that charge in Macedony, who preferred and presented a bill unto the peo-G ple in this manner: Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed and denouced against King Philip and the Macedonians within his Realm and Dominion for the wrongs offered and the war levied by them upon the friends and allies of the people of Rome: and unto the other Consul Aurelius be fell the Province of Italy. Then upon this the Praetors cast lots for their Provinces, C. Fabius Placcus had the jurisdiction of the City, Q. Fulvius Gillo was to govern the Province of Spain, Q. Minucius Rufus of the Bruttis, and L. Furius Purpureus of France.

The Oration
of P. Sulpitius to the people
of Rome.

The foresaid bill as concerning the Macedonian war, in the first Parliament assembled about it, was in manner by all the Centuries in the foremost scrutinies ripped & flayed denied. Which thing, partly men of themselves were forward enough to do, as being over-wearied with long and sore wars, and worn out for very irksomeness of tedious travel, and painful perils; and partly Quintus Fabius a Tribune of the Commons, failed not to set them on a who taking the old course and way of blaming and accusing the nobles, had laid to their charge, that they sowed the seeds of war still, and ceased not to raise war upon war, to the end, that the commons might never be at rest, and enjoy the repose of peace. The LL. of the Senat took this to the heart, in such sort, that the Tribune was shaken up and much reviled in the Senat-house with most opprobrious and reproachfull terms; and every man did his part to encourage the Consul to publish a new assembly and scrutiny, for the proposing of the same bill; to chastise the sloath and idleness of the people; yea, and to open and shew unto them what great damage and loss, how much shame and dishonour they should incur by these delays before the war began. Then the Consul having assembled the people for this purpose in Marston field before that he cited the Centuries to give their voices, called them all together and made a speech unto them in this wise: "It seemeth (quoth he) that you are ignorant, my Masters and Citizens of Rome, that the matter put to question is not, whether ye would have war or peace, (for Philip will not permit that to be at your disposition and pleasure, who already prepareth mortall war both by sea and land) but whether ye would rather choose to transport the legions into Macedony, or receive your enemy here within Italy. And what difference there is between the one and the other, you have had sufficient proof and experience (if ever at any time before) even in this last war, especially with the Carthaginians. For who is he that maketh doubt, but if we had with speed relieved the Saguntins besieged, who fled unto us for help, and earnestly craved for our protection, like as our ancestors and progenitors in due time assisted the Mamertins; we should have turned the whole violence and force of the war into Spain, which by our long driving off & lingering delays we entertained in Italy, to our great loss and grievous calamity. Neither need we to doubt of this, but that we have hitherto staid Philip in Macedony, (who without question had combined with Annibal by means of letters and intercourse of Ambassadors, for to have passed over into Italy before this time) only by sending of Levinus with a fleet, to begin with him at home, and to make war in his own kingdom. Defer we then to do that now, when Annibal is chased out of Italy and the Carthaginians defeated; which then we did, when we had the same Annibal, our enemy within Italy? Go L. we on still and suffer the King by winning the City of Athens (like as we permitted Annibal by forcing of Saguntum) to try and see our slackness and cowardise: we shall have him I warrant you arrived in Italy, not at five months end, as Annibal was after his departure from Saguntum; but within five daies, after he is disanchored once & under sail from Corinth. Set case ye will not compare Philip with Annibal, no, nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians; yet I am sure ye will make them matches, and equall with King Pyrrhus: so far forth I say, as one man excelleth another in valour, and one nation surpasseth another in power. Epirus hath never been accounted, nor is at this day, but the smallest appendant to the kingdom of Macedony, and of least importance. But as for Philip, the whole and entire seignory of Peloponnesus is under him, and Lord he is of Argos it self, a City nobled as well by the death of Pyrrhus, as the ancient name and renown that goeth of it. Compare now again the times of our state. How much flourished Italy in those daies more than now? Our affairs were then much more sound and unfoiled: our Captains safe, our armies all, so many as they were, untainted; whom the Carthaginian wars afterward consumed: yet as puissant and great as we were, Pyrrhus assailed us, he put us to trouble and sorrow enough, yea, and came in train of victory to shake our free hold, even wel-near to the City of Rome. So as not only the Tarentins, and all that tract of Italy, which they call the greater Greece, banded with him in such sort, as a man would have thought they had followed the very language and thoe of their name: but the Lucans also and the Brutians, yea, and the Samuits revolted from us, and rebelled. And are ye of believe that these will be quiet and remain in loyalty and obedience, if Philip once were passed over into Italy? yes many will they, there is no question; for they stood fast afterwards, and continued true in the Punic war. Nay, nay, never make reckoning that these States will not revolt from us so long as they know any one unto whom they may turn and range themselves. If ye had thought much of it, and been loath to pass over into Affrick, in truth at this day ye should have had Annibal and the Carthaginians your enemies (still in Italy). Let Macedony therefore be the seat of war rather than Italy: let our enemies Cities and lands be destroyed with fire and sword. We have found well by good experience, that our fortune is better, and our forces more puissant abroad in forrain parts, than at home in our own Country. Go to therefore in the name of God to the Scrutiny and give your voices; and those things that the LL. of the Senat have devised to do, grant ye the same, and yield your assent. Ye have not only the Consul author of this advice and counsel, but also the immortal gods (who as I offered sacrifice and prayed devoutly unto them, that this war might redound to the good and benefite of my self, of the Senat, of you, of our allies, of the Latine nation, and finally of our armies and armadoes) have vouchsafed me all the signs and tokens of comfort and joy, and assured me that all shall be well, and according to our hearts desire. This Oration of his once ended, they went presently to deliver up their voices, and gave affirmatively for the war, & suffered it to pass according as he had propounded. Then by an order from the Senat there was a solemn supplication for

A For three daies proclaimed: and in all Churches and Chappels, and before every shrine & altar the gods were praised, that the war (which the people had allowed of) against K. Philip might be war achieved, and have an happy end. Moreover, the Consul Salpurius conferred with the heralds, and asked their advice. Whether they would ordain, that the war to be denounced against King Philip, should be intimated to himself in person: or thought it sufficient to be proclaimed within the confines of his dominion, at the next frontier town of all, where he kept a garrison and guard: they pronounced again, That it mattered not, but the Consul should please himself, and do full well in the one and the other. Then the Consul was permitted by the LL. of the Senat to chuse whom he would, to be were not a Senator, for to lend as a messenger or purveyor of arms, to give the King defiance, and to publish war. After this it was debated in Council, how the armies should be disposed as well of Consuls as Prætors. The Consuls were commanded to enroll two legions, and to discharge and call the old armies. Salpurius, who by a decree was to manage this new war of great name and consequence, was allowed to take with him out of that army which Scipio the Vice-Consul had brought out of Africa, as many volunteers as he could procure: but in no wise to urge any old soldier against his will. Also it was decreed, that the Consul should allow unto the Prætors L. Furius Purpureus, and Quintus Minucius Rufus 3000 men apiece of the associates of the Latine nation, whom they should employ, the one in the Province of Gallia, and the other in the Brutian country to defend those parts and keep them in obedience. Q. Fulvius Gellus was himself likewise commanded to chuse out of that army which P. Valerius the Consul commanded, as many as had served several years, until he made up the number of 3000 also of the allies & Latines; which should be a garrison to keep in order and safety the Province of Sicily. P. Valerius Prætor the year before, and L. Deputy of the Province of Campania, had his Commission signed anew, to continue for the term of one year longer, and as Vice-Prætor to pass over into Sardinia, with direction to chuse one of the army there 3000 of the allies and Latines, such as had served least time. And the Consuls were commanded to take up two legions of Citizens, which might be sent to any place, as need should require, considering that many nations in Italy tainted and infected with the fellowship and company of the Carthaginians during the wars and ever since, were swelled with anger and despite against the Romans. Thus the Common-wealth for that year was to use the employment of his Roman Legions.

D Amidst these preparations for war, there arrived Embassadors from K. Ptolemy, giving intelligence, that the Athenians had craved aid of their King and Master, against Philip. And although they were confederate as well with him as the Romans, yet the King would send into Greece neither a fleet of ships, nor an army of men, defensive, or offensive to any, but by authority and consent of the people of Rome. In case therefore the Romans were resolved, and sufficient withall of themselves to defend their allies, he would be willing to sit still and take his repose at home. Otherwise, if the Romans were rather disposed to rest and take their ease, he would himself be well content to send such forces to the aid of the Athenians, as should defend them easily against all the power of Philip. The Senat returned great thanks unto the King, with this answer, That the people of Rome were purposed to protect their own allies: but if during this war they stood in need, upon any occurrence that might happen, they would give knowledge thereof to the King: as

E being assured and making full account, that all the puissance and wealth of his kingdom was a sure prop and trusty pillar of their State and Common-wealth. This done, by order from the Senat the Embassadors had given them for a reward * five thousand Asles apiece. Now whiles the Consuls were busie in taking musters, and providing all things meet for the war, the City very devout and given much to religion, in the beginnings especially of all new wars, after they had performed their supplications aforesaid, and done their devotions at every altar and shrine: because nothing might be for-let and left out, that at any time heretofore had been done; ordained that the Consul, unto whom the Province of Macedony fell, should vow solemnly to exhibit to the honour of Jupiter, the great games and plaies, and a rich present beside. But Licinius the High Priest staid this publicke vow for the time that it went not forward, alledging that it was not lawful to make a vow of an uncertain sum of money not determined: & if such money might not serve for the use of war, it ought presently to be set by and laid up safe, and not be mingled and shuffled with other monies: and unless that were duly done, the vow could not be paid and performed according to the order of holy rites. Albeit the thing it self and the person of the man that moved this scruple, touched and troubled them much, yet they would needs that the Consul should propound the matter to the college of the Priests and Bishops, to know their resolution, whether a vow might not directly be made of an uncertain peece of money. The Bishops set down their opinion and judgment, that it might be well enough, yea, and better than otherwise. Whereupon the Consul pronounced the vow, according to the very same form of words (as the High Priest entided and spake before him) which aforesime they were wont to use, in making the quinquennial vows from five

G years to five: save only thus much, that he vowed and promised to represent the plaies, and to present oblations unto Jupiter, amounting to such a sum of money, as the Senat should set down when the vow was to be performed. So many times before had the great games been vowed, and a determinate sum of money ever assigned: but these were the first that were not limited within any certain stint and compass.

Now when all mens minds were wholly bent upon the Macedonian war, behold on a sudden, when they feared nothing less than such a thing, there arose a rumour of French troubles and recruits for the Insubrians, the Cenomani and Boii, having solicited and raised up by way of instigation the Salli, the Illyrians, and other states of Liguria, under the conduct of Amilcar the Carthaginian, who in those parts staid behind with the remnant of Asdrubal's army, were seized of Placentia; and after they had sacked the City, and for very disreputable reasons burnt a great part of it, leaving hardly two thousand persons of all sorts, which amidst the fire and ruin chanced to save themselves, crossed the river Po, and advanced forward to the spoil and village of Cremona. But the inhabitants of that Colony, having heard of the misery and calamity befallen upon their neighbour City, had some respite and time to shut their gates, and to bestow their guards upon the walls: so as, they should at least wile be first besieged or ever they were forced, and might be able to dispatch messengers unto the people of Rome. L. Furius Purpureo was governor of that Province for the time: who having by order from the Senat discharged all the rest of the army but only five thousand of allies and those Latines, abode with that power in the next country to that Province about Ariminum. He then addressed his letters unto the Senat, signifying in how bad terms the province stood, namely, that of those two Colonies, which all the time of the Punic war had escaped those great storms and tempests of troubles, the one was won by the enemies and put to the sword, the other now besieged, and at hand to be lost: neither would his forces be sufficient and able to help the distressed Cremonians, unless he should wilfully cast away five thousand allies, and expose them as a prey unto forty thousand of the enemies: (for so many they were strong to have their throats cut, and to be hewn in peeces: and by so great a loss and overthrow of his, to give more heart and courage to the enemies, who are now in their rage, and puffed up with pride for the ruin of one Roman Colony already. Upon the reading of these letters, there went forth a decree from the L., of the Senat, that C. Amilius the Consul should send out precepts for the army to be ready at Ariminum that very day, on which he appointed them to the Rendezvous in Hetruria: and that either himself in his own person, if it might stand with the good of the State, would go with a power to suppress these French commotions, or else write to L. Furius the Praetor that when the Roman Legions presented themselves unto him out of Hetruria, he should send in their stead his own five thousand allies for the guard of Hetruria in the meantime, and make a journey himself in person to raise the siege before Cremona, and to set the Colony free that now was beleaguered. They thought good besides to dispatch Embassadors into Affrick, who should go to Carthage and afterwards to Masanissa in Numidia. To Carthage, for to intimate unto them, That Amilcar a Citizen of theirs left behind in France, (and L whether he were of the army of Asdrubal before, or afterwards of Maca, they knew not for certain) waged war there against the covenants in the League contained: that he had assembled certain forces of French and Ligurians, to enter into arms against the people of Rome; and therefore, if they had any love to entertain peace, they should call him home, and deliver him to the people of Rome. Over and besides they had in commission to give them to understand, that delivery was not yet made of all the runagate rebels, but many of them, by report, were retired to Carthage, and there went up and down, and converted openly, which persons were, after diligent search made to be attached and apprehended, that they might, according to the tenor of the accord, be sent home again, and delivered into the hands of the Romans. And thus much concerning their message to the Carthaginians. Now they had in charge besides to congratulate with Masanissa, and to declare what joy they took in his behalf, namely, for that he had not only recovered the inheritance of his fathers kingdom, but also enlarged his dominion, by conquest of the most flourishing part of the Realm of Syphax. Moreover, commanded they were to signify unto him, that they had undertaken to war upon King Philip, because he had befriended and aided the Carthaginians: and by offering and doing wrong to the friends of the people of Rome, even at what time as all Italy was full of troubles and wars, enforced and put them to it, for to send their armies and their armadoes into Greece, and so by dismembering and dividing their forces into sundry places, was the principall cause that they were so late ere they passed over into Affrick: requesting him for the maintenance of this war, to lend over certain aids of Numidian horsemen. These Orators had great gifts and honourable presents given them for to carry unto the King, to wit, divers peeces of plate both of gold and silver, a purple robe of State, with a rich cassock or coat wrought in palm-tree work, with a royall Scepter of Ivory, also a robe embroydered before with purple, with an Ivory chair of state. Last of all, they are willing to make promise unto the King, that if he could think upon any thing needfull and expedient either to establish his kingdom, or to advance his royall estate, the people of Rome would endeavour respectively for his good demerits to compass the same to the uttermost of their power.

There arrived also about that time Embassadors from Vermina the son of Syphax, and presented themselves unto the Senat, excusing the errour, and pretending the youth of the Prince, clearing him of all fault, and laying the whole blame upon the fraud and treachery of the Carthaginians, promising for their King and Master in this wise, That like as Masanissa of a professed enemy was become a sworn friend to the Romans, even so would Vermina do his best, and strain himself, that in all offices of friendship toward the people of Rome, neither Masanissa, nor any other should surpass and go beyond him: and making petition in his name, that the Senat would vouchsafe to give him the titles of King, of Ally, and Friend unto the Romans. These Orators had this for their answer, That not only Syphax, his father before him, of a confederate friend, suddenly without any cause at all proved an enemy to the people of Rome: but also himself had perjured already in his young

A young years; and laid the first ground of his warfare in annoying and troubling the Romans by war; and therefore he was to seek pardon and crave peace at their hands, before he might be involved by them with the terms of King, or Ally, and Friend for the honour of that title the people of Rome were wont to vouchsafe to none, but those Kings only who had deserved highly well of them. Many there should be certain Roman Legats in Africa, unto whom the Senate would give order to minister and tender unto Pyrrhus certain conditions of peace, according to a large and absolute commission that they had from the people of Rome. To do what they thought good. And in case the King insisted ought in those capitulations; and were desirous to have any article added, put out, or altered, he must recome again to the Senate, and demand the same; so there were Legats or Commissioners sent into Africa with such a Commission above said, whilſt C. Terentius Varro, S. Lucius, and En. Octavius; and each of them had a galley directed with five rows of oars.

After this were the letters read of Q. Minutius Prator in the Province of the Bruttii, importing thus much; That the consecrated money of Proserpina at Luzi was by night stoln out of her treasury; but to say who should do the deed, they had no presumptions to give out or lay down directly. The Senat took the matter in very ill part, and grieved exceedingly. That sacrilegious men fell still to Church-robbing, and would not give over: and that the late and new examples of Pleminius (so notorious as well for the heinous fact as the fearful punishment) was not able to restrain them and give them warning. So C. Aurelius the Col. was enjoined to write unto the Prator into the Bruttian country to this effect: That it was the Senats pleasure, that the enquiry and examination should be had of the Treasury thus robbed: after the same precedent and course that M. Pomponius the Prator took three years before. And look what money could be found, it should be laid up duly in the place; and what was not forth-coming, it should be replenished and made good again. Also, if he thought meet, that there should be certain purgatory sacrifices according as the Bishops before ordained in the like case, for the expiation and satisfaction of the violating and defiling of the Temple. Moreover, there chanced about the same time divers prodigious tokens from many places to be reported. In the Lucania country the rumor and voice went, that the welkin was on fire; and at Prudentium, while the sky was bright and fair, the sun appeared red all day long. At Lanuvium, in the Temple of Jupiter Optimus, there was heard in the night seasons mighty great noise. Nay, and more than this, in sundry places as men say, were many monstrous and strange births seen. In the Sabine country one child was born, and no man knew what to make of it, male or female: and another likewise was found of sixteen years of age, a very Hermaphrodite of doubtful sex between both. At Freges there was a Ram yeared with a swines head: and at Sinussa a sow farrowed a pig with the head of a man. In the Lucania country there was foled upon the common ground a colt with five feet. All these monsters were ugly to see and abominable, and holden for great defects and errors of nature working strangely out of kind. But above all others, those births both male and female, for rather neuter were most abhorred and detested, and order was given presently, that they should be cast into the sea: even as of late daies when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Consuls the like deformed monster was chafed had away and drowned. Nevertheless the Decemvirs were commanded to turn over and peruse the books of Sibylla, to know what such prodigious monsters might portend: who by their learning and out of those books, gave direction to make the same sacrifices, which last of all for the like uncouth sights were made. Moreover, they gave commandment, that certain hymns and songs should be chanted throughout the City by three severall quires, of nine virgins in every one; and an oblation to be offered by them with all devotion to queen Juno. C. Aurelius the Consul caused all this to be performed according to the order and direction of the Decemvirs. And as in our fathers daies Livius composed the ditty of the hymn, so at that time P. Etricius Figulus framed and set down a form of song which they could sing. Thus when all things were expiate, and satisfaction made accordingly for the appeasing of the wrath of the gods, (for even at Luzi also the sacrifice was found out by Q. Minutius, and the money missing was raised out of the goods of the offenders and guilty persons, and bestowed there again in the treasury) as the Consuls were minded to take their journey into their Provinces, there repaired many private Citizens unto the Senat, unto whom the third payment was due that year for the loan of money, which in the time of M. Valerius and M. Claudius Consuls they had lent out and disbursed, because that the Consuls had made them answer, That the Rock of the City Chamber was hardly able to defray the charges of a new war, which required maintenance of a mighty Navy and of puissant armies, and therefore flatly denied them, and said, That they had not wherewith to satisfy and make present payment. The Senat could not endure that they should have this occasion to make complaint; considering, that if the Common-wealth would still employ the money upon the Macedonian war also, which was granted in loan for the Punic war, this would be the end of it, that (one war following thus in the neck of another) their own money which was lent upon a cutesie and benevolence out of their private purses, should be little better than confiscate for some forfeiture, and fall to the Exchequer and common Chest of the City. These private persons demanding nothing but reason and right, and the City withall not able to discharge her debt, the Lords set down a middle and indifferent course between honesty and profit; and that was this: That forasmuch as many of these men said, that the City had much land upon sale, and they were to buy and make purchase, therefore the common grounds grounds lying and being within fifty miles of Rome every way, should be granted unto them in fee H farms, and the Consuls to set down an estimate of their value and worth, and charge them with a chine rent or tribute of three farthings an acre by the year, to testify only that they were the Citizens lands: to the end, that if any man hereafter (when the City should be storehouse and in case to repay the former debt) were desirous to have money rather than land, he should restore the lands and possessions again into the Cities hands and receive his money. These private Citizens (who were the former creditors) accepted gladly of this offer and condition. And hereupon the land was called by the name of Trientalis and Tributus, because it was set out and granted in lieu of a third part of the lone money. Then P. Scipio after he had pronounced his vows above-said in the Capitoll, and departed out of the City in his coat of arms, with the Lictors and Users afore him, arrived at Brundisium; and so with the old voluntary souldiers drawn out of the army that was returned from Affrick, (whom he had enrolled into legions) and ships choien out of the fleet of Cornelius the Consul: he loosed from Brundisium, and the next day after landed in Macedonia: where attended him the Embassadors of the Athenians; who humbly besought him to deliver them from the siege that invested their City. So C. Cato was incontinently sent to Athens, furnished with twenty long ships of war, and a strength of men for the King himself in person besieged not Athens, but even then made hot assault upon the town Abydos, as having already given proof of his forces in sea-fight, both with the Rhodians and King Attalus, and in neither battell had good success. But besides the ordinary stoutness and pride engraffed in him by nature, he was aloft now and looked high, by reason of the alliance made between him and Antiochus King of Syria, with whom he had parted the riches and Realm of Egypt, unto which they both aspired, upon the news they heard of the death of Ptolemy. Now the Athenians had drawn upon themselves the war against King Philip, upon a small occasion and of no importance: who of all their ancient estate and glory, retain nothing else but great heart and happy spirit. It fortuned that two young men of Acarnania, who had taken no orders and were not consecrate, entered among the other multitude into the Temple of Ceres, in the time of the festivall daies, and celebration of sacrifices to that goddess belonging: and being altogether ignorant in the custome of that solemnity and religion, and asking some foolish absurd questions, nothing fit for that time or place, were soon bewrayed by their speech and language: who being convened before the Prelates of the said Temple, notwithstanding it was evidently proved and known that upon an error only & oversight, and not for any ill intent they were come into the Church, yet were they put to death as felions, and guilty of some heinous fact in the highest degree. The people of Acarnania complained unto King Philip, and informed him of this villanous part and hostile act by them committed: and obtained a grant from him, that they might be permitted with the aid of the Macedonians, to make war upon the Athenians. This army at first invaded the territories of Athens, and with fire and sword made waste & havock of all, and so with a rich booty of all sorts returned into Acarnania. These were the first quarrels on both sides, that stirred coals and kindled fire between them. Afterwards was defiance given, and open war proclaimed, by the generall decrees of both States. For when King Attalus and the Rhodians pursued after Philip, as he retired into Macedonia, and were come as far as Egina, then the said King passed over to Pyraeum for to renew and confirm the league with the Athenians. Against his coming the whole City went forth with their wives and children to meet him on the way: the Clergy with their rich vestments and goodly ornaments were ready to receive him as he entered the City: the very gods themselves in a manner abandoned their shrines to give him entertainment. Immediately was the people summoned to a generall assembly, that the King might deliver his mind before them all: but afterwards, upon more sage advice, it was thought to stand better with the honour and Majesty of a Prince, that he should set down in writing what he thought good, rather than in open place, either to blush himself in recounting his favors and good turns done unto the City, or in hearing the acclamations of the multitude in token of joy, to be abashed and ashamed of their grois and unmeasurable flattery. But in his letters which he sent unto the assembly, and were there openly read and published, first he made a rehearsal of the benefits that this confederate City had received at his hands. Secondly, he discoursed of the worthy exploits which he had performed against Philip. And finally he knit up all with an exhortation, that whiles they had himself, the Rhodians, and especially the Romans to friend them, they should put themselves in arms and begin war: as who, if they now forslowd the enterprise, and let slip the present opportunity, should hereafter seek in vain to find it, which once they had so retchlessly lost. Then had the Rhodian Embassadors audience given them, who lately had done the Athenians a great pleasure, in recovering and sending home unto Athens four long foists, which newly had been boorded and taken by the Macedonians. Hereupon with generall accord they decreed to denounce and wage war against King Philip. But first they did King Attalus incredible honour beyond all measure, and then likewise to the Rhodians. Then and never before there was some speech moved of adjoining unto the ren ancient tribes, one other tribe, which of the Kings name should be called Attalus. Unto the City of the Rhodians they gave in token of vertue, a Crown of beaten gold. And like as beforetime the men of Rhodes had granted free Burgeoisie of their City to the Athenians, so they of Athens now endured the Rhodians with their liberties and franchises. This done, K. Attalus returned to his fleet in the rode of Egina. The Rhodians then weighed anchor, and from Egina sailed to * Cea. From whence along the * Islands, they passed to the Rhodes:

A and in their voyage considered themselves with them all, excepting Andro, Perio, and Cybo, which were guarded by garriſons of the Macedonians. The King Attalus made his abode a certain time and entered into his action, by occasion of intelligence which he had ſent into Æolia, and Embaſſadors that were expected from thence. But as he could not prevail with the Ætolians to perſuade them to take arms, contenting themſelves with the peace that in ſome ſort they had concluded with Philip ſo himſelf, and the Rhodiens, whom no doubt, if they had preſſed and followed hard upon Philip, might have gained and enjoyed this glorious title, That they alone of themſelves had delivered Greece from ſervitude. By ſuffering him once again to croſs the ſeas as far as Helleſpontus, and to poſſeſſ himſelf of the commodious and impoſſible towns of Greece, thereby to re-enforce his power and gather more ſtrength, gave food and nourishment to the war, and in the end let the Romans go away with the honour both of managing and alſo of finiſhing the ſame. Philip carried with him yet a more princely mind and Kingly courage: who, although he was not able to match and make his part good ſo much as with Attalus and the Rhodiens his enemies, yet was he nothing at all daunted with the threatening threats of the Roman war; but ſent Philochus, a Captain of his, with a power of two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, to invade and ſpoil the territory of the Athenians, committed his Armado to the charge of Maſachus, to ſet ſail for Mareneus, and himſelf in perſon marched by land thither with another regiment of two thouſand footmen lightly appointed, and two hundred men of arms. Mareneus he forced at the firſt aſſault. But as for Ælius, after he had with much labour and travell laid ſiege thereto a long time, in the end he was Maſter thereof, through the treaſon of Ganymedes, deputed L. Gortimor there for King Prolemaus. After this he ſurpriſed and won other Caſtles, as Cyſſela, Dariſon, and Serphens. From thence he advanced forward to Cherſoneſus, where he gained Eleus and Alapreomneſus, which willingly ſurrendered: Callipolis alſo and Madysus, with ſome other peeces of ſmall account and reckoning. But the Abydens ſhut their gates againſt the King, and would not ſuffer ſo much as his Embaſſadors to ſet foot within their Cities. There lay Philip a long time before the town and beleaguered it: and ſurely had not Attalus and the Rhodiens forſtaked the time, it might have been ſaved and the ſiege raiſed. Attalus ſent thither three hundred ſouldiers and no more to lie in garriſon, and the Rhodiens one galley only with four banks of oars out of the navy when it rode at Tenardos. And afterwards when as Attalus himſelf was thither come, at what time as the townſmen could hardly hold out any longer againſt the ſiege, he made them a ſhew only near at hand of ſome help: other relief would he afford none to his allies either by land or ſea. The Abydens at firſt planted their engins and artillery along the walls, and with ſhot from thence not only diſtreſſed their enemies, and kept them from approach and entrance, but alſo annoyed them as they lay in harbour with their ſhips: but afterwards, ſeeing part of their walls ruinate and laid open, and perceiving beſides that the enemies had undermined and were come under the ground as far as the inner countermure, which the inhabitants in great haſte had raiſed within, forthwith they ſent Embaſſadors to the King to treat and ſettle about ſome conditions for delivering up the City. The townſmen capitulated and demanded, that the Rhodian Galley aforeſaid, with all her mariners, and the garriſon alſo of King Attalus, might be ſent away in ſafety, and themſelves permitted to depart the town every one with a ſingle ſuit only of apparel. But Philip made answer again that they had no peace for them at all, unleſs they would quit the place, and ſimply commit themſelves unto his mercy. This Embaſſage related unto them, ſet them in ſuch an heat and choler, that partly for ſpight and indignation, and partly upon deſpair, they fell into the like rage that the Saguntins did in times paſt. All the dames and wives of the City they commanded to be ſhut up within the Temple of Diana: their young boies and maidens that were free-born, the ſucking babes, together with their nurſes, they cauſed to be beſtowed within the common place of publike exerciſe: their gold and ſilver they took order to be brought into the market place: their rich attire, their coſly apparell and furniture, to be caſt into the two Gallies, the one of Rhodes, and the other of Cyzicum, which rid in the haven: and laſt of all, that their Priests ſhould be brought forth with their beaſts for ſacrifice, and altars erected in the miſt of the place. There firſt were certain men choſen of purpoſe: who ſo ſoon as they perceived the battailon of their countymen defeated and ſlain, fighting before the breaches of the wall, immediately ſhould run upon their wives and children, and kill them without mercy, caſt away into the ſea their gold and ſilver, and all the furniture aforeſaid that was in the Gallies, and ſet the edifices and houſes aſire, as well publike as private, in as many places as poſſibly they could. For the performing and execution of theſe premiſes, they were bound by an oath miniſtered unto them: the form whereof, with a curſed malediction thereto annexed, they pronounced word for word from the Priests mouth. Then, as many as were of lawfull age to bear arms, ſware likewiſe, That not one of them would depart out of the battell alive, but with victory. Thus remembering the oath they had taken, and how they called the gods to witneſs, they fought ſo reſolutely, that whereas the night would have parted the combat, the King terrified with their furious rage, firſt gave over the conflict. The chief and principall men of the City, whoſe charge was to play the more cruell and horrible part in this tragical act, ſeeing there remained but few alive after this ſkirmiſh, and thoſe grievouſly wounded and tired out of heart for wearineſs: the next morning early by day-break ſent their Priests with their inſules and veils of peace, to render the City unto Philip. Before the town was fully yielded, M. Emilius the youngſt of thoſe three Roman Embaſſadors which were ſent to Alexandria, hearing of the the straight siege of the Abydens came by the consent of the other two unto Philip. When he laid open this grievance, and made complaint. That he had warred upon Asterion and the Rhodians, and namely even then besieged and assailed Abydos most forcibly. And when the King answered that Asterion and the Rhodians with others, with cause on his part offered, began first to molest and trouble him. What for? Philip again were you molested and troubled first by the Abydens too? Philip who was not wont to be told the truth so plainly, thinking this rejoinder of his more bold and more pertinent to be offered to a King. Your youthfull age, quoth he, & fair face, and above all the Roman name maketh you hardy and audacious. But I would advise you all, first to remember your covenants, and to entertain peace with me. For in case ye once begin with me, and put me to it: I do you understand, that I also am fully resolved to make you feel the smart, and know that the realm and nation of the Macedonians is no less renowned for feats of arms than the Romans. Philip having dismissed the ambassador, and seized upon all the gold and silver that lay on an heap together, lost all the booty of men of quality that might have yielded him a round ransom. For the multitude of common people fell into such a fit of rage and madness, that all of a sudden they imagined those who let their lives in the conflict were betrayed, and casting one in another teeth their perjury and charging the Priests especially that they were false sworn in delivering them alive unto the enemy whom they had devoted and appointed to death: they ran at once from all parts to the pitifull massacre of their own wives and children; and when they had so done, they made no more ado, but by fire, by sword, by drowning, hanging, and one way or other, they wrought a quick dispatch and clean riddance of themselves also. The King abhorred to see them thus horn-mad, staid the bloody his own soldiers, saying that he would allow the Abydens three daies to dye in. During which term of time, the conquered Abydens exercised more fearful cruelty upon their own persons than ever the conquerors would have put in practice in the height of their heat and choleric fury. Inasmuch as there was not one of them came alive into the enemies hands; but such as either fast tied with bonds, or otherwise by some forcible means were staid from being their own hangmen, and the butchers of their proper bodies. Philip after he had placed a garrison at Abydos returned into his own Realm. Now when this miserable calamity of the Abydens had reached Philip to enterprise war against the Romans, like as Annibal afore him took heart by the wofull destruction of Saguntum to do the semblable: behold, he was encountered with post that brought news, how the Consul was in Epirus already, and had withdrawn his land forces to Apollonia, and bestowed his servitors at sea in Corinth, thence to winter.

In this while the Ambassadors who were sent into Africa had their dispatch and this answer from the Carthaginian. First, as touching Amilcar the Generall of the army and forces in France, they could do no more but banish his person and confiscat his goods. Then concerning the fugitive traitors and rebels which were run from the Romans, they had sent home again unto them as many as they could reach out and come by: and to that purpose they would address Ambassadors themselves unto the Romans, to satisfy the Senat in that behalf. And presently they sent to Rome two hundred thousand Modii of wheat, and other two hundred thousand into Macedony to the army there. From thence the Roman Ambassadors went forward to the King in Numidia. To King Masaniissa they delivered the presents which the Romans sent, and declared unto him their commission: at whose hands they received a thousand Numidian horse, whereas he offered them two thousand: himself took order for their embarking, and so dispatched them into Macedony, with provision of two hundred thousand measures of wheat, and as many of barley. A third Embassage they had to Vermis, who met the Ambassadors as far as the utmost marches of his Realm, and to their disposition and discretion referred the drawing and penning of all conditions of peace as they would themselves: saying withall, that he held any peace whatsoever, that he should have with the people of Rome for good and just. So there were presented unto him certain articles and conditions of peace, and for the ratifying thereof he was enjoined to send his Ambassadors to Rome.

Much about the very same time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Vice-Prator returned out of Spain: who having declared in the Senat his valiant and fortunate exploits, that for many years together he had achieved in Spain: and in consideration thereof, demanded that it might be lawfull for him to enter the City in triumph: the Senat judged that his noble acts deserved no less than he sued for: but they had no such precedent from their ancestors, that he should be allowed to triumph, who had warred neither as Dictator, nor Consul, nor Prator: and as for Lentulus in quality of Vice-Prator only, and not of Consul or Prator he took upon him the charge of the Province of Spain. Howbeit, in the end they came down to this point, that he should ride into the City on horseback as Orant. But T. Sempronius Longus a Tribune of the Com. interposed his negative, alleging that they had as little example to shew for that: and no practise or custome at all of their ancient predecessors. But in fine, the Tribune gave place to the generall accord of the LL. O. and was content to be over-ruled. So after the order set down by the Senat, L. Lentulus entered Rome in that solemnity and pomp before named. He presented in shew of the pillage that he had got, 44,000 pound weight of silver, 2,450 pound weight of gold. To his soldiers he distributed out of the spoil, 100 Asces apiece.

Now was the army of the Consul translated already from Arelum to Ariminum, and five thousand Latine allies were passed out of France into Etruria. Therefore L. Furius departed from Ariminum.

A Arminius, made haste by taking great journeyes to come against the Gauls, who then laid siege to Criminus, and encamped within a mile and an half from the enemy. Means and opportunity he had to do a notable exploit, and win a good hand of the enemies, if immediately upon his first coming he might have assailed their Camp: for they wanted to and fro in scattering wise up and down the country a foraging, and had left no sufficient guard for the defence of their Camp. But he feared greatly that his souldiers were weary and tired, because the companies marched apace thither in exceeding great haste. Howbeit the Gauls being called back by the hooping and hollowing of their fellows, let go their booty which they had in manner as good as in their hands, and returned to the Camp, and the morrow after ranged themselves in battell array. The Romans were not behind for their parts, albeit they had hardly time enough to set themselves in order,

B the enemies ran so suddenly, and made such haste to fight. The right wing (for the army of the allies was divided into wings) was placed in the vanguard: the two Roman legions in the reeward; M. Furius led the right wing, M. Caelius had the conduct of the legions; and L. Valerius Flaccus (all three Lieutenants) commanded the Cavalry. The Prator kept with him two Lieutenants, En. Laetorius, and P. Titinius, by whose means he might look about from every part, and be ready to oppose himself against all sudden attempts whatsoever of the enemies. At the first, the Gauls hoped that with their numbers they should be able to tread down and trample under their feet that right wing of allies which was in the forefront: and to that effect they reduced their multitudes into one place, and charged upon it with all their might and main together. But seeing that enterprise sped not well, they endeavoured to environ the corners and sides, and to compais the enemies round about: which they thought they might soon do, being so many as they were in comparison of so few: which when the Prator perceived, to the end that he also might spread out his battillions at large, he displayed the two legions in the reeward, so as he compassed on both hands that wing which fought in the vanguard and therewith vowed two Chappels to Jupiter, if that day he might be so fortunate as to vanquish his enemies. To L. Valerius he gave direction, that of one side he should with the Cavalry of the two legions, and on the other side with the horse belonging to the allies charge upon the wings of the enemies, and not suffer them in any case to enclose the battell about. Herewithall himself also, espying the middle battailon of the Gauls to be but thin, by reason they were stretched out from thence to the corners and points of each hand, commanded his souldiers to keep close together, to advance forward and break through their ranks. So were the wings of the Gauls by the horsemen discomfited, and they in the midst repulsed back & chased by the footmen: and when the enemies thus at once on every hand were beaten down and killed, they shewed their backs, and fled as fast as they could to the camp. The horse pursued them in the rout and chase; and anon the legionary footmen made after also, and gave an assaile upon their Camp. There escaped from thence not all out six thousand: slain there were and taken prisoners above 35000; with seventy banners and ensigns, and more than two hundred French wagons, charged and laden with much pillage. In this conflict, Amilcar the General of the Carthaginians lost his life, and three Noblemen of the French, Leaders of mark and name. The Placentine captives, to the number of two thousand men of free condition, were delivered again to them of their own Colony. This was a goodly victory: and upon the letters which came with tidings thereof to Rome, received there with great joy: and ordained it was, that a solemn procession should be held for the space of three daies. Of Romans and allies one with another there died in this battell two thousand: most of them were of that right wing, upon which the enemies in the beginning of the conflict most of all discharged their fury.

Albeit the Prator had brought the war to a good pass, and in manner finished it, yet the Consul also C. Aurelius, having accomplished his necessary affairs at Rome, made no stay but took his journey into France, and received the victorious army of of the Prator. The other Consul who came into his Province but a little before the end of Autumn, wintered about Apollonia. The Roman galleys which from the Almado that lay in dock at Corcyra, were sent as is aforesaid, to Athena with C. Claudius, were no sooner arrived at Pyraeum, but they mightily comforted

F the allies, whose hearts were well-nigh done: for neither were there any more inrodes now by land as there were wont to be from Corinth side by the way of Megara along into their territories; and the sea of war and Piracy ships which from Chalcis had made not only the seas dangerous to the Athenians, but also the maritime & sea coasts, durst not now approach nearer than to the cape of Sunium, nor venture into the open main sea from out of the straights of Euripus. Over and besides, there came in to them three Rhodian galleys with four banks of oars: these were also three open ships of Athena well rigged and appointed, for to keep the quarters that lay along the river. Claudius was well appaied, and thought he had got enough for the present in case the City and Territory of Athena might be sufficiently guarded by this fleet. But seeing there presented unto him in decent besides of far greater importance and consequence. Cera Ocan banished persons of Chalcis, expelled from thence by the wrongs and violence of those that sided with King Philip, advertised him, that the City of Chalcis might be easily surprized without any countenance or resistance at all: for, not only the Macedonians ranged abroad every where up and down, because there were no enemies near at hand to fear: but also the townsmen presuming upon the garrison of the Macedonians, neglected the guard of the City. Upon the assurance of these words, he set forward: and although he was arrived at Sunium with so good speed, that he might with ease have fallen to the entrance of the Straights of Euboea, yet for fear of being being discovered (when he was once got past the cape) he kept his fleet within the bay till night: and at the shutting in of the evening he weighed anchor and sailed forth, and having a calm sea he arrived before Chalcis a little before the break of day, and pitched his forces against those parts of the City that were least peopled: and with the help of some few soldiers he scaled and got the Tower that stood next with the wall about it, while in some places the soldiers were found asleep and in others not at all to be found. Then they advanced forward unto those parts that were more inhabited, and stood thicker with houses: where, after they had killed the guard and broke open a gate, they received into the town all the rest of their soldiers. Whereupon, there was running now on every hand into all parts of the City, and much hurry and confusion; which was the greater, because the enemies had set fire on the houses about the market place. The Kings garners also were of a light fire, together with the arsenal and armory, where there was exceeding store of provision, of engines, of artillery and other ordnance and instruments for war. After this they fell to execution and to massacre in every place, as well those that fled as those that made head: so as they missed not one that was of age meet to bear arms, but either he was killed or put to flight. Sopater likewise the Acarnanian Captain of the garrison was there slain. All the pillage was first brought and piled up together in the common place of the City, and afterwards embarked. The common Goal besides was broke open by the Rhodians, and the prisoners and captives let out, whom Philip had there lodged as in a place of surest guard and custody. Then they overthrew the Images and statues of the King and brake their necks: which done, they founded the retreat, went a shipboard, and returned to Pyraeum from whence they came. But if the number of Roman soldiers had been such, that they might have kept Chalcis still with a garrison, without quitting and abandoning the defence of Athens, a great matter had been got in the very beginning of the war: to wit, the City of Chalcis and the passage of Enripus had been taken from the King. For as the narrow pass of Thermopylae stoppeth the wayes into Greece by land, so the streights of Enripus maketh all sure by sea. Philip at that time lay in the City Demariae, where, after he heard the news of the calamity befall upon a confederate City, albeit now it was too late to help when all was lost: yet because he would be revenged (which is a thing that cometh near to the nature of aid and succour) he went forth immediately with five thousand footmen lightly appointed and nimble, and three thousand horsemen, with all the speed and haste he could to reach near unto Chalcis: making full reckoning that the Romans might be surprised on a sudden: but being disappointed of this hope, and thither come where he could see nothing else but a pitious spectacle of a friend City half ruinate and still smoking, and so few people left alive, that they hardly were able to bury their dead, he returned as hastily as he came, and having passed over Enripus at a bridge, he led straight to Athens by the way of Baeis, with a deep persuasion and hope that a like enterprise unto the Romans should have the like issue. And verily he had not missed of the fensible effect, correspondent to his designs, but that a certain watchman (one of those whom the Greeks call Hemerodromos: that is, post and carrier: that in one dayes space will run and rid a mighty deal of ground) descried from a watch-tower the Kings troops, marching: whereupon he ran out afore, and came to Athens ere midnight. There were they all asleep, and as reckless as they of Chalcis were a few daies past, which was the loss of their town. The Praetor of the Athenians, and Dionippus the Captain of a regiment of hired strangers and soldiers, awoke at this so fearfull and sudden tidings and got up, assembled the soldiers into the market-stead, and commanded to sound alarm from the highest place of the City, that all men might take knowledge that the enemies were near at hand. By which means they ran every man from all parts to the gates and up the walls. Within few hours after, and somewhat before daylight, he approached the City: and seeing many lights every where, hearing also a noise of people running to and fro (as in time of such a tumult) he baid his march, and commanded his soldiers to sit them down and rest themselves, intending to proceed by overt and open forces, once covert and crafty courses sped no better: and so at length he came before Dipylon. This Dipylon is a gate, standing in the very front of the City, greater and wider a great deal than the rest. Both within and without that gate are large and broad streets, so that both the inhabitants within may march an army, and lead in battell array from the common place directly to the gate, and also the enemies without have room as will to conduct a power as well of horse as foot, by means of a spacious causey or high-way, which reacheth out almost a mile in length from the foresaid gate and leadeth to the place of exercise or school called Academie. At this quarter of the City the Athenians, together with the garrison of Artalus, and the regiment of Dionippus, stood forth, and entered the causey above named, having first within the gate let their men in order of battell. Which when Philip saw, he made full account, that he had his enemies as he would himself to do his pleasure with them, and that now he should have his fill of a massacre and slaughter that he had wished for so long: (for there was not a State or City in all Greece that he misteered more than this of Athens.) And therefore he exhorted and encouraged his soldiers, that they should have their eye upon him ever as they fought, and know well this, that where the King was there should the banners and standards be displayed, there should the strength and force of the battell be: and so he set spur to his horse, and ran with full career to charge the enemies. Thus was he not only carried away with heat of choler, but awished also with a desire of glory, so treating it a goodly thing, and a another tending to his great honour, for to be seen fighting in the view of a great multitude of people that had taken up and filled the battlements of the walls.

ships coming from Pyraeus, and a fresh garrison received into the place, caused him to persevere to the end of the winter. After this the King divided his power, and sent one part of his army against Artemis, under the conduct of Phileas, and himself with the other marched to Pyraeus, that while Phileas kept the Athenians within the City, by approaching their walls, and threatening to besiege and attack it, he might himself with facility win and gain Pyraeus, whereas there was left but a small and slight guard. But he found as hot a piece of service about the fortress of Pyraeus, as before at Eleusina, by reason of the same Ionians in manner that defended as well the one as the other. So on a sudden he departed from Pyraeus, & marched directly toward Artemis. From whence he was repulsed and chased by a sudden fall both of horse and foot, made from the freights of the wall half ruin'd; which wall stretching out as it were, two arms, joyned the port Pyraeus to Artemis. So he left battering and assaulting the City, and passing again his army with Phileas, he went out to forrage and spoil the country; and as in his former success he identified himself in demolishing the tombs all about the City, so because he would leave nothing entire and safe, he commanded the chapels of the Gods, which were consecrate in every village and hamlet, to be pulled down, rased, and burnt.

The country of Attica was marvellously beautified and embellished (as it were) with goodly peeces of work in that kind, (by reason as well of the store they had of native marble, as also of their industrious and excellent workmen) which ministered matter and occasion unto him of this outrage and madness. For not contented and satisfied with the ruin of the Temples, and casting down of images, he commanded that the very stones should be broken and barter'd in peeces, that left being whole and found they might serve to make up and stop the breaches of the ruins. And after that his fell mood and anger was not so much satisfied and satiate, as it wanted matter to work upon in that place, he departed out of his enemies country into Bœotia, and performed no other deed in Greece worthy of remembrance.

Sulpicius the Consul at that time lay in camp between * Apollonia and * Dyrrachium, near the river Apus; and having caused T. Apollonius the Lieutenant to come thither, he sent him with part of his forces to watch the borders of his enemies. Apollonius after he had foraged the frontiers of Macedony, and forced at the first assault certain holds, as Corrhagum, Gerrhenium, and Orgosum, came with his army before Amphipolis, a City seated in the narrow freights of a certain passage. And first he called forth the principal and chief citizens to a parly, and assaid to persuade and induce them for to commit themselves under the protection and safeguard of the Romans: but afterwards seeing they trusted upon their greatness, the strong walls and situation of the Town, and therefore made no reckning of his motives, but rejected them, he assailed it by force of arms, and won it in the end. All that were above fourteen years of age he put to the sword: the whole pillage he deak amongst the souldiers; the walls he rased, and set fire on the Town. The fear of like misery was the cause that Copio, a Town of good strength and well fortified, was yielded to the Romans without assault, or any sword drawn. There he left a garrison: and after that, he forced Ilium, a Town better known for the name that it carrieth of the other famous Ilium in Asia, than for any thing else. As the Lieutenant returned with a great booty to the Consul, one Athenagoras a Captain under the King, charged upon the tail of the arreergard, disordered the hindmost, and impeached their passage over the river: but the Lieutenant, at their cry and suddain affright rode in all haste back, caused them to turn again and make head, set them in battail ray, and bestowed all their bag and baggage in the mids upon a heap. The Kings souldiers not able to abide the violence of the Romans, were many of them slain, and more taken prisoners. So the Lieutenant having retired his army in safety, was immediately sent back unto the Consul to the Armado.

The war being thus begun, and the exploit of this first expedition happily performed, the Princes, Potentates, and LL. that bordered upon the Macedonians, repaired into the Roman camp, to wit, Pleuratus the son of Scerdiletus, Aminander King of the Athamans; and from Dardania, Diao the son of Longarus. This Longarus had waged war aforesime in his own name and quarrel, with Demetrius the father of this Philip. These States offering and promising their aids unto the Consul, had this answer from him, That for the Dardanians and Pleuratus, he would use them; N when he entred with an host into Macedony. As for Aminander, he gave him in charge the while to solicit the Ætolians to war. The Embassadors of Attalus (for they also were come at the same time) he dispatched with this order, That their King should attend the coming of the Roman fleet at Egina, where he wintered: with which and his own jointly together, he should assail Philip at sea, like as he had done beforetime. Embassadors also were addressed to the Rhodians, that they likewise should have their hand and be seen in this war. Philip for his part followed not to make preparation (for now by this time was he come into Macedony) and sent with part of his forces for to keep the freights of the passage of Palagonia, his son Persens, a very child of young years, having chosen certain of his trusty friends, to direct and govern his tender age. As for Stelmus and * Peparethus, two Towns of no small importance he destroyed, for fear the enemies fleet should seize upon them, and with their pillage content and pay themselves. He sent likewise Embassadors to the Ætolians (a nation inconstant and inquisit by nature) that they should not upon the arrival of the Romans change their allegiance. Now the Diet or general council of all the States of Ætolia, which they call Panætolium, was to be held at a certain day appointed. And therefore to prevent and meet with all dangers, both the Kings Embassadors made hast to be present thereat; and also L. Fulvius Plautius presented himself there, as sent Embassador from the Consul.
